CAMMACK v. CAMMACK. (L. A. 9514.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 27, 1928.

Parent and child ⚷2(3)—Order awarding custody of minor children to mother is discretionary, and cannot be set aside except for abuse of discretion (Civ. Code, § 246).

Order awarding custody of minor children to mother, under Civ. Code, § 246, is discretionary with trial judge, and may not be set aside except for abuse of discretion.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Proceeding by Kate S. Cammack against Fred R. Cammack. From an order denying defendant's motion for custody of the minor children, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. H. Woodard and Otto A. Gerth, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John E. Manders and Miller & Thornton, all of San Francisco, and Joseph Scott and Benno M. Brink, both of Los Angeles (Rolla Bishop Watt, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order denying his application to have the care, custody, and control of Frank Strawn, aged 10, and Mary Jane, aged 8, the minor children of the parties, transferred from the plaintiff, their mother, to the defendant. The appeal is based upon the contention of the defendant that the evidence is insufficient to support the conclusion of the trial court that the mother is a fit and proper person to have the custody of her children.

The order was discretionary, and may not be set aside except for an abuse of discretion. A review of the record discloses that the evidence was sufficient to support the order and that the trial court was properly guided by the considerations prescribed by section 246 of the Civil Code. No abuse of discretion is shown.

The judgment is affirmed.

MABREY et al. v. McCORMICK et al.★
(Sac. 4119.)

Hearing Denied in Bank Dec. 27, 1928.

1. Mechanics' liens 🔑281(3)—In action to enforce contractor's lien, defendants held not estopped to deny cost plus contract because items charging commission appeared on bills.

In action to enforce contractor's lien, defendants are not estopped to deny that work was done under cost plus contract by reason of fact that items charging 10 per cent. commission appeared on bills rendered them, since, if contract was for agreed sum, defendants might well be unconcerned as to items on statements.

2. Mechanics' liens 🔑161(4)—Contractors suing to enforce lien held not entitled to interest prior to judgment, where defendants were willing to settle under true contract (Civ. Code, § 3287).

In action to enforce contractor's lien, interest prior to judgment as damages held not allowable, under Civ. Code, § 3287, where defendants were always ready and willing to settle under true contract but plaintiffs abandoned work and insisted on recovery on different basis.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by Charles S. Mabrey and another against Archie McCormick and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Thomas B. Leeper, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Joseph M. Raines, of Fairfield, and Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. We are called upon to determine whether the findings and judgment in this case have support in the evidence. Having thoroughly examined the record, we find that testimony upon the disputed questions of fact is about as acutely conflicting as it could be. This conflict the trial court resolved in favor of defendants, and its action will be upheld.

Plaintiffs sued to enforce their contractors' lien and to recover the sum of $5,376.78 under an alleged contract on the basis of cost plus 10 per cent. for the rebuilding and remodeling of defendants' farmhouse. Defendants, answering, alleged that, by the contract between the parties, plaintiffs undertook to furnish all necessary materials and perform all work needed on said building at a cost not to exceed $5,700. The court found the latter agreement to be the true contract made by said parties. It was further found that plaintiffs failed to complete the work; that they abandoned the contract, and as a result defendants were compelled to and did expend $1,016.60 for labor and materials to finish the building; that, in addition, defendants had paid plaintiffs on account the sum of $2,222.90; that there was therefore due plaintiffs upon said contract price of $5,700, the balance of $2,459.50, plus $1 for recording their lien, and $25, cost of extra work installing a buffet in said house—that is, a total of $2,486.50. Judgment in said sum was entered for plaintiffs, from which they have appealed.

[1] There is competent evidence that the contract was not upon a cost plus basis, but was for said agreed sum, nor are defendants estopped to deny said cost plus contract, by reason of the fact that items charging 10 per cent. commission appeared upon the bills rendered them. There is testimony that said bills were considered as rendered under the agreed sum contract, and that the itemization was disregarded in so far as it might have been thought to indicate a change in the arrangement under which the work was proceeding In other words, if, as the court found, the contract was in fact for an agreed sum, defendants might well have been unconcerned as to the items on the statements. This was the view of the trial court, and there is no evidence legally sufficient to compel an opposite conclusion. There is therefore no room for operation of the law of estoppel, and authority need not be cited upon this point. Our conclusion that the findings and judgment have support in the evidence is determinative of this appeal.

[2] Plaintiffs claim interest from the date of the third bill rendered by them, at which time they state the amount due became certain (section 3287, Civ. Code). Had the court found for them, this contention would be sound. Here, however, the record shows no refusal of defendants to settle with plaintiffs under the true contract. Defendants, being ready and willing to settle thereunder, were not at fault, because plaintiffs not only abandoned the work, but insisted on recovery upon a different basis. In other words, by reason of the action of plaintiffs, the amount due was unliquidated until determined by judgment of the court; hence interest prior to judgment, as damages, was not allowable. Macomber v. Bigelow, 126 Cal. 9, 15, 58 P. 312; Curtin v. State, 61 Cal. App. 377, 393, 214 P. 1030; Easterbrook v. Farquharson, 110 Cal. 311, 42 P. 811; Stimson v. Dunham, 146 Cal. 281, 79 P. 968.

KING v. GRASS VALLEY GOLD MINES CO.

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 5, 1928.

Corporations 🔑308(2)—Agreement implied to pay reasonable worth of services of corporate officers performing onerous services, though no compensation is previously fixed.

Presumption that certain corporate officers render services gratuitously, in absence of previous express contract, does not apply to onerous services which could not reasonably be expected to be performed for nothing, although no compensation therefor is previously fixed; and in such cases there is implied agreement to pay what services are reasonably worth.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; Raglan Tuttle, Judge.

Action by Roy J. King against the Grass Valley Gold Mines Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. H. Armstrong and Frank R. Wehe, Jr., both of Grass Valley, for appellant.

W. E. Wright, of Nevada City, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. Plaintiff, claiming to have performed services for defendant as a mining engineer, mine manager, and superintendent, filed his complaint setting forth three causes of action. By the first and third counts he sought to recover under a contract in writing the sum of $6,000 for his said services. Said contract was found to be void by reason of a mutual mistake of law, and relief on those two counts was denied. The second, or quantum meruit count, alleged that plaintiff performed work, labor, and services for defendant which were reasonably worth the sum of $2,000. The court found that said services were of the value of $1,500 only, and rendered judgment on said count in that sum for plaintiff. Defendant now prosecutes this appeal therefrom, praying for reversal upon the sole ground of failure of proof.

Plaintiff was the only witness produced by either party at the trial. His testimony, uncontroverted by any witness for defendant, supports his claim for reasonable compensation, and the court was justified in finding that he did in fact perform such work, labor, and services as would entitle him to recover upon said quantum meruit count. In short, we see no reason here for withholding application of the rule announced in the case of Bassett v. Fairchild, 132 Cal. 637, 64 P. 1082, 52 L. R. A. 611, to the effect that the presumption that certain corporate officers render their services gratuitously, in the absence of previous express contract, does not apply to onerous services, which could not reasonably be expected to be performed for nothing, although no compensation therefor is previously fixed; and in such cases there is an implied agreement to pay what the services are reasonably worth.

Judgment affirmed.

STREICHER v. HEIMBURGE et al.

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 28, 1928.

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑83(4)—Failure of arbitration under lease does not destroy lessee's rights, where new estate has vested, but equity will fix rent and maintain integrity of lessee's tenure.

Where new estate has vested under lease providing for arbitration, failure of arbitration provisions does not destroy or forfeit lessee's rights, but, if need be, court of equity will intervene to fix reasonable rental and decree specific performance and thus maintain integrity of tenure of lessee.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑83(2)—Fixation of rental prior to expiration of original term held not condition precedent to vesting of new leasehold interest under renewal clause of lease (Civ. Code, §§ 707, 708, 1436).

Under lease granting to lessee option to renew lease for additional term on same covenants and conditions except as modified, which only provided for modification of provision respecting rental in original lease, which was made covenant and not condition, and providing for no conditions precedent to vesting of original term and imposing on lessee burden of making improvements, fixation of rental prior to expiration of original term of lease was not condition precedent to vesting of new leasehold interest under renewal clause, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 707, 708, 1436.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑83(1)—Rule that grant is interpreted favorably to grantee applies in construing renewal clause in lease (Civ. Code, § 1069).

In construing clause in lease granting option to renew, grant is to be interpreted in favor of grantee, under Civ. Code, § 1069.

4. Landlord and tenant 🔑83(1)—Rule construing contract most strongly against party causing uncertainty applies to renewal clause in lease (Civ. Code, § 1654).

Rule specified in Civ. Code, § 1654, providing that, in case of uncertainty, language of contract should be interpreted most strongly against party causing uncertainty, is applicable in construing renewal clause in lease.

5. Landlord and tenant 🔑83(1)—Interpretation of renewal clause in lease depends on entire instrument in determining whether provision for rental is condition precedent or subsequent.

In construing renewal clause in lease to determine whether provision for fixing rent was condition precedent or subsequent, true interpretation depends on consideration of entire instrument, notwithstanding use of words which ordinarily introduce conditions.

6. Landlord and tenant ⚷83(2)—Rule requiring appropriate words to create condition and construction in accordance with parties' intention held applicable to renewal clause of lease.

Rule providing that condition to be created in grant must have appropriate words appended thereto importing that continuance of estate is to depend on condition and that construction should follow probable intention of parties held applicable, where condition precedent is claimed to renewal of lease.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by Celia Streicher against Max Heimburge and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal, 262 P. 774.

Arthur F. H. Wright, Adam Thompson, and Gordon Thompson, all of San Diego, for appellants.

A. Haines, Wright & McKee, and C. M. Monroe, all of San Diego, Arthur Joel, of San Francisco, and Haines & Haines, of San Diego, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. This appeal is controlled by the proper interpretation to be given a renewal provision in a lease of real property. The action is in unlawful detainer. The prayer is for restitution of the premises and for triple rental. The court directed a verdict for restitution of the premises to plaintiff, and submitted to the jury the sole issue of damages for the alleged unlawful withholding thereof. Judgment for plaintiff followed. Defendants have appealed.

On the 14th day of October, 1920, one Howard leased to defendants and appellants the ground floor and basement of a certain building situated in the city of San Diego, known as the Dalton building, for a term of five years commencing December 1, 1920, and ending November 30, 1925, the lease containing, however, a provision that the lessees should have the right or option to renew the lease for an additional term of five years, which provision was couched in the following language:

"Provided, and upon condition that the lessees and their successors in interest have at all times faithfully and punctually performed each and all of the covenants and conditions of this lease on the part of the lessees, the lessor grants to the lessees, and their successors in interest, the right or option to renew this lease for an additional term of five (5) years, upon the same covenants and conditions as are herein contained, except as modified by this paragraph, and except further that there shall be no right or option to further renew or extend this lease, provided that this option is accepted by a writing delivered to the lessor by the lessees, or their successors in interest, at least six (6) months prior to the expiration of the term of this lease, and provided further that the rent to be paid is agreed upon as follows. The parties are to agree in writing upon the rent to be paid during such renewed term, if they are able to do so. If within thirty (30) days after the acceptance of this option on the part of the lessees, by the delivery of the written acceptance aforesaid, the parties are still unable to agree upon the rent to be paid, then the lessor or his successor within ten (10) days shall in writing appoint an appraiser, and the lessees or their successors within ten (10) days shall in writing appoint an appraiser, and the two appraisers so appointed shall determine the rent to be paid for said time. Or, if the two appraisers so appointed are within ten (10) days unable to agree upon said rent, then they shall in writing immediately appoint a third appraiser, and the majority of the three so appointed shall determine said rent. If either of the parties fail or refuse to appoint an appraiser within the time aforesaid or within ten (10) days after new appraisers should be appointed by the parties as next provided, then the other party shall appoint both appraisers, who shall determine the amount of said rent; or, if the appraisers so appointed are unable to agree within the time aforesaid, and then fail or refuse to appoint a third appraiser as aforesaid, or if they appoint a third within that time, but a majority of the three refuse or are unable to agree within ten (10) days, then the parties within ten (10) days thereafter shall each in writing appoint a new appraiser, and the two so selected shall determine said rent, or if they are unable to do so, they shall appoint a third appraiser as aforesaid, and the majority of the three so appointed shall determine said rent; and this process of appointing and reappointing appraisers shall be continued, within the time and in the manner aforesaid, until either the parties themselves or appraisers for them determine the amount of said rent. The appraisers so appointed shall in all instances be business men of said City of San Diego, and shall reduce to writing and deliver to each party, a statement of the amount of rent determined upon."

On the 23d day of January, 1925, respondent, Celia Streicher, acquired the reversionary estate in the premises from Howard. There is no contention that the lessees did not at all times faithfully and punctually perform all the covenants of this lease on their part to be kept and performed. It is further conceded that on the 6th day of May, 1925, and more than six months prior to the expiration of the first term of said lease, appellants in writing gave notice to respondent of their exercise of the option to renew said lease. The parties failed to agreed within 30 days after May 6, 1925, upon rent for the renewal term of said lease; thereafter plaintiff and defendants each appointed one of ten successive sets or pairs of appraisers or arbitrators to determine the amount of rent to be paid during such renewal term. These appointments extended over a period beginning June 8, 1925, and ending November 30, 1925. Neither of said boards of appraisers were able to agree upon a rental or even upon the appointment of a third member of any board of appraisers. On December 2, 1925, respondent refused to appoint any other appraiser to determine the rental for said new period. At that time she took the position that the fixing of the rent during the life of the original lease was a condition precedent to the creation of the new term, and, that condition having failed, appellants became tenants from month to month under provision 13 of the lease. On December 1, respondent served 30 days' notice upon appellants to vacate the premises. It also appears that after November 30, 1925, appellants of their own motion selected a board of appraisers, claiming to act under said paragraph 20, and these two appraisers did agree upon an amount as rent to be paid during said alleged new term. Mutual arrangements were made between the parties so that appellants continue in possession of the premises pending this appeal.

The court below held that the right to renew said lease never accrued to appellants, and that they became tenants from month to month only of the premises. The position of appellants upon this appeal is that, on the expiration of the first term provided for in said lease, a new term vested in them by virtue of their faithful performance of the covenants of the original lease and by reason of their exercise in time of the right or option to have the same renewed; that the provision respecting the rent to be paid was a covenant or at most a condition subsequent.

Respondent's position, however, is that said provision respecting rental, together with two other co-ordinate and correlative provisions are severally conditions precedent to the vesting of said new term, and that, one of said conditions precedent not having been met during the life of the original lease, the attempted renewal did not ripen into an estate, and appellants lost the right to continue in possession of said premises except as tenants from month to month under paragraph 13 of the original lease. Respondent, in contending that said provision respecting rent is a condition precedent to the vesting of the new term, assembles her arguments under the following heads:

> "(1) It is couched in apt and appropriate language for such a condition; (2) It is a substantive provision initiated distinctly from all others and is complete in itself and expressly made a 'further' proviso; (3) The proviso covers the whole consideration for a renewal term; (4) The proviso is not only conjunctively and copulatively associated with two other unquestioned conditions precedent, but it is expressly made a 'further' condition and completes the trio of such conditions."

Appellants rely upon the now well-understood principle announced in a long line of cases. For example, Kaufmann v. Liggett, 209 Pa. 87, 58 A. 129, 67 L. R. A. 353, 103 Am. St. Rep. 988, a leading case often cited with approval and squarely in point here, if appellants' construction of the renewal provision is correct, the lease provided that the lessees should have the privilege of a renewal; that the rental, in event the lessees elected to renew, should be fixed by arbitrators selected in a specified way; also that, if the arbitrators and umpire failed to agree within a fixed time, then others should be chosen in the same manner. However, there was no provision in the lease covering the contingency of the failure of the second set of arbitrators to agree. The lessees exercised their privilege of renewal and gave the stipulated notice; both sets of arbitrators failed to agree. The landlords then gave notice to the lessees to surrender possession of the premises. Thereupon the lessees filed a bill in equity, praying that the court determine the amount of rental to be paid under the renewal. Holding that it had complete jurisdiction in equity to fix the amount of the rental to be paid by the lessees during the extension of 5 years and to enforce specific performance of the agreement providing for such extension, the court said:

> "After careful consideration of this question in the light of the elaborate argument of counsel for the appellant, we agree with the conclusion of the court below that the fixing of the rental value of the premises for the period in dispute in this case is not of the essence of the contract, but that the right of renewal constituted the substantial element in this portion of the agreement. It was that feature which, in great measure, justified the lessees in erecting upon the premises a large and costly building, adapted to the needs of their business."

In the case of Nakdimen v. Atkinson Improvement Co., 149 Ark. 448, 459, 233 S. W. 694, 697, the court said:

> "In the present case, the essence of the contract was the renewal of the lease for another term of 10 years, and the fixing of the rental for that period was merely ancillary to the main contract. Where the provision for an appraisal is incidental and subsidiary to the substantive part of the agreement, the party refusing to name an appraiser or arbitrator cannot be heard to complain where the court performs or provides for the performance of such service. The court, in fixing the reasonable rental value, treats the method as a matter of form, rather than substance. So it may be said in the present case that the clause of the contract providing for a board of arbitrators to fix the rental value of the premises does not render the contract void as being too indefinite to be enforceable."

580; Houston v. Barnett, 90 Or. 94, 175 P. 619.

[1] Respondent immediately attempts to distinguish the above line of authorities because of the absence of appropriate language making the renewal depend upon a condition precedent. Admittedly, in those cases the fixing of the rent by arbitration was not made a condition precedent to the vesting of the leasehold estate and consequently we need not pay any further attention to the principle of law well understood that where the new estate has vested under a lease providing for arbitration, a failure of the arbitration provisions does not destroy or forfeit the lessees' rights, but, if need be, a court of equity will intervene to fix the reasonable rental and in effect decree specific performance and thus maintain the integrity of the tenure of the lessee. See numerous cases cited in Glenn v. Bacon (Cal. App.) 260 P. 558, 564.

We must therefore give our special consideration to the meaning of the lease before us, having in mind sections 707, 708, and 1436 of the Civil Code. Speaking of it as a whole and not of paragraph 20 alone, it will be noted that said lease contains repeatedly the words "covenants and conditions" used together. It will also be noted that in one or two instances the word "condition" appears without association with the word "covenant." A noticeable thing, however, is that there were no conditions precedent to the vesting of the original term. Every provision therein is a covenant, or at most a condition subsequent, and whether a given provision is the one or the other is immaterial, because under paragraph 18 a forfeiture is provided for the failure to observe either. It should also be noted that the lease provides that the lessees shall at their own expense make such improvements upon the property as may be assented to by the lessor. In other words, the lessees assume all burden of keeping the premises in repair and also of alterations and changes that may be necessary for the business which they are to conduct upon the premises. It is no stretch of the imagination to see that under this lease the lessees would be warranted in making and perhaps did make permanent improvements with the thought in mind of the renewal period as well as the old term of the lease.

Coming now to paragraph 20, it may be conceded that the provision respecting observance of the covenants and conditions of the lease before right of renewal accrued is a condition precedent, although situations are easily supposable where a court of equity could decree contrary to the contention of the lessor that the new term had vested. We may concede also that the right of renewal depended upon the giving of notice to the respondent within the time and in the manner stated in said paragraph, but here again a situation might be easily supposed where a court of equity would be warranted in decreeing the vesting of the new term, notwithstanding the failure of the lessees to literally live up to said requirements. See Fountain Co. v. Stein, 97 Conn. 619, 118 A. 47, 27 A. L. R. p. 976, and note.

[2] But the most noticeable of the provisions of paragraph 20, when paraphrased is:

> "* * * The lessor grants to the lessees * * * the right or option to renew this lease for an additional term of five (5) years, upon the same covenants and conditions as are herein contained, except as modified by this paragraph. * * *"

It is thus seen that the renewal term will have the same covenants and conditions as in the original lease, except as modified by the paragraph under consideration. It is "covenants and conditions" found in the original lease that are to be modified by the present paragraph. But the only "condition" or "covenant" modified, or attempted to be modified, by this paragraph 20, is the provision respecting the amount of rental and the amount of rental in the original lease is a covenant and not a condition. Moreover, when we approach the words "and provided further," we see in them a qualification of the words "covenants and conditions" found above and in turn a qualification of covenants and conditions found also in the original lease. It follows that this clause respecting rental introduced by these words may logically be either a covenant or a condition but hardly in any event a condition precedent. At least we are not by reason of its relation to other clauses bound to declare it such a condition.

Again, time is not made the essence of the provision which of itself argues strongly that it is a covenant or agreement, and not a condition. This construction is further emphasized by the words:

> "* * * And this process of appointing and reappointing appraisers shall be continued, within the time and in the manner aforesaid, until either the parties themselves or appraisers for them determine the amount of said rent."

The words "within the time" refer, not to the expiration date of the original lease, but refer to the ten-day periods which precede them respecting the appointment of arbitrators. The language just quoted shows that it was in the contemplation of the parties that although they themselves might not agree during the first 30-day period, they might agree during the period of the arbitrators' activities. If it had been the intention of the parties that the new estate should not vest prior to the fixation of the rental, it should have been so declared by the lessor. But nothing is declared to be the result of a failure of all efforts to effect a rental figure. "If the right to renewal had been intended to depend upon the rent being fixed in advance, it would not only have been the easiest, but most natural, thing to have said so." Kaufmann v. Liggett, supra, at page 356 of 67 L. R. A. (209 Pa. 95, 58 A. 132). Perhaps the strongest reason that may be urged that it was never intended that this be a condition precedent is the fact that this provision in and of itself would give to the lessor the power to absolutely nullify the whole right of renewal under this lease, for, by failing to agree, or by failing to appoint proper appraisers who would agree, the lessor under that construction of the provision always had within her the power to prevent a renewal of the lease.

[3, 4] In the construction of a clause of this character, too, we are fortified by the rule that a grant is to be interpreted in favor of the grantee. Civ. Code, § 1069; Hasman v. Union High School, 76 Cal. App. 629, 632, 245 P. 464. The rule announced in section 1654 of the Civil Code is also applicable; it is:

> "In cases of uncertainty not removed by the preceding rules, the language of a contract should be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist. The promisor is presumed to be such party. * * *"

This doctrine has been specially applied to leases in the case of Glenn v. Bacon, supra. It is stated in Kaufmann v. Liggett, supra, as follows:

> "As a general rule, in construing provisions of a lease relating to renewals, where there is any uncertainty, the tenant is favored, and not the landlord, because the latter, having the power of stipulating in his own favor, has neglected to do so, and also upon the principle that every man's grant is to be taken most strongly against himself. Taylor, Land & T. (9th Ed.) § 81."

See, to the same effect, Commonwealth v. Arcuroso, 283 Pa. 84, 128 A. 668; McClintock & Irvine Co. v. Ætna, etc., Co., 260 Pa. 191, 103 A. 622, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 1078; 16 R. C. L. 884; Hacquard v. Sweetwine, 92 W. Va. 681, 115 S. E. 797, 799; 24 Cyc. 991.

[5] We are also confirmed in the construction placed upon these provisions by the rule as to conditions subsequent announced in such cases as Hawley v. Kafitz, 148 Cal. 393, 395, 83 P. 248, 249, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 741, 113 Am. St. Rep. 282, where it is said:

> "There must be language used which is so clear as to leave no doubt that the grantor intended that an estate upon condition subsequent should be created—language which ex proprio vigore imports such a condition."

Many cases may be found where the words "provided" or even "on condition that" have been used and nevertheless held to be covenants and not conditions. The true interpretation depends upon a consideration of the whole instrument, and from the whole instrument a deduction must often be made that the provision under consideration is a covenant and not a condition, and this too notwithstanding use of the words which ordinarily introduce such a condition. See Fitzgerald v. Co. of Modoc, 164 Cal. 493, 129 P. 794, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1229; Victoria Hospital Ass'n v. All Persons, 169 Cal. 455, 460, 147 P. 124; Quatman v. McCray, 128 Cal. 285, 60 P. 855; Los Angeles University v. Swarth (C. C. A.) 107 F. 798, 54 L. R. A. 262. A quotation from Post v. Weil, 115 N. Y. 361, 366, 22 N. E. 145 (5 L. R. A. 422, 12 Am. St. Rep. 809); is appropriate here.

> "Mere words should not be and have not usually been deemed sufficient to constitute a condition, and to entail the consequences of forfeiture of an estate; unless from the proof such appears to have been the distinct intention of the grantor and a necessary understanding of the parties to the instrument. Nor should the formal arrangement of the words influence us wholly in determining what the clause was inserted to accomplish; but in this, as in every other case, our judgment should be guided by what was the probable intention; viewing the matter in the light of reason."

[6] The rule has again been stated as follows:

> "To create a condition in a grant, apt and appropriate words must be appended thereto, which, ex vi termini, import that the vesting or continuance of the estate is to depend upon the condition, but mere words should not be, and have not usually been, determinative of whether a clause was intended to operate as a condition or a covenant. In every case the construction should follow the probable intention of the parties, viewing the matter in the light of reason. Thus, the words in a deed 'upon the express condition,' introducing restrictions upon the use of the property conveyed, tho apt and appropriate to create a condition, are to be taken to import a covenant where it is evident that the parties so intend, even tho there is a provision for forfeiture in case of breach of the condition or covenant." 7 Cal. Jur. 712.

There is equal reason for applying this doctrine to a case where a condition precedent is claimed.

We are therefore satisfied to pronounce the conclusion that, taking this instrument as a whole and viewing it from all standpoints, it was never intended that the fixation of rental prior to the expiration of the original term of the lease was a condition precedent to the vesting of the new leasehold interest. It also, of course, follows that, were the lessees trying to avoid the obligation of the renewed lease, they could not rely upon the failure of the arbitrators to agree as a defense. We regard such cases as Stout v. North, 211 Mo. App. 245, 252, 242 S. W. 119, and Burge v. Purser, 141 Miss. 163, 106 So. 770, as strengthening rather than weakening this conclusion, for in these cases affirmative conditions existed in the original lease, such as security for the rental. These cases are but to the effect that, in addition to the notice of election to exercise the option, the affirmative conditions of the old term must be met before the new term vests. The appellants therefore have the right of possession, but cum onere. Whether the rental, however, shall be the amount provided for in the original lease, the amount fixed by the appraisers appointed ex parte, or whether in the absence of an agreement of the parties a court of equity shall fix it, are questions not germane to this appeal.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider the second point made by appellants, that, in an action of this character, the 3 days' notice provided for by section 791 of the Civil Code must be given.

The judgment is reversed.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Action by Joseph Cavalieri against Louise Hess. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. O. Stemmler, of Stockton, and J. C. Webster, of Sonora, for appellant.

Rowan Hardin, of Louisville, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court in and for the county of Tuolumne in favor of defendant in an action for specific performance and for damages resulting from the failure of defendant to perform under a certain agreement set forth in the complaint. The description of the property in the agreement between the parties was:

> "All that portion of the east one-half of northwest one-quarter and west one-half of northeast one-quarter of section five, township one north, range fifteen east, M. D. M., which lies northerly of Sullivan's creek, in the county of Tuolumne, state of California, and being the same property distributed to the party of the first part by decree of distribution given, made and entered on the 18th day of May, 1904, in the matter of the estate of George Mayer, deceased, in the superior court of the county of Tuolumne, state of California, together with the improvements thereon."

The findings disclose:

> "That passing through said property in an easterly and westerly direction is a road commonly known as and called the Sonora and Mono road. That in the year 1885, one George Mayer sold and conveyed to Bridget Wolfling and Michael Wolfling all that portion of the E½ of the NW¼ and W½ of NE¼ of Sec. 5, T. 11 N., R. 15 E., M. D. M., which lies northwesterly of said Sonora and Mono road, except two corrals opposite what was formerly known as the Northup or Bergel place. That at the time said agreement was entered into between plaintiff and defendant, the only land owned by defendant north of said Sonora and Mono road was the lands embraced within the two corrals mentioned in the deed from George Mayer to Bridget Wolfling et al.
> "That at and prior to the time said agreement was executed both plaintiff and defendant were ignorant of the true and correct legal description of the property which said defendant owned at said time and which plaintiff desired to purchase, and before said agreement was entered into, defendant caused the boundaries of her land to be shown to plaintiff, all of which said lands were enclosed by fence. That plaintiff knew before the execution of said agreement from the boundaries so shown to him, that the land which defendant was selling and which land he desired to purchase did not include or embrace the portion of land theretofore sold by Geo. Mayer to Bridget Wolfling, * * * and said plaintiff knew before the said agreement was executed that defendant did not own or claim to own and did not have possession of or claim the right to the possession of the said land described in the said deed from Geo. Mayer to Bridget Wolfling aforesaid, and said plaintiff knew before the execution of said agreement, that said lands described in said deed from Geo. Mayer to Bridget Wolfling were in the possession of Mr. Sanguinetti, and said plaintiff was not in possession of said lands, and knew at the time that he was making the payments under the said agreement that his purchase did not include said land described in said Mayer to Wolfling deed. That through a mistake in the legal description of the land in the decree of distribution in the matter of the estate of Geo. Mayer, deceased, the said tract formerly sold by said Geo. Mayer was included in said decree of distribution and in preparing the said agreement the description as appearing in said decree of distribution in the estate of Geo. Mayer, deceased, was used in describing the said lands of defendant. That under the terms and provisions of said agreement said plaintiff was placed in possession of the lands then owned by defendant in the month of April, 1923, and was told at that time by defendant, and plaintiff knew, that defendant did not own any lands north of the county road except the two corrals opposite the Hess residence, formerly the Bergel place, and defendant knew that a property division fence separated the said two corrals from the property formerly owned by Wolfling, and at the time said agreement was entered into, was in the possession of a Mr. Sanguinetti, and plaintiff knew that he did not have any right to the possession of the said land theretofore sold by Geo. Mayer to Bridget Wolfling, and said plaintiff knew at all times that the lands which he was purchasing from defendant consisted of approximately 35 acres. That if the tract formerly sold by Geo. Mayer to Bridget Wolfling had been included, that the tract would have contained approximately 58.42 acres.

"That the mistake in the description of lands so contained in said agreement was not discovered until observed by Mr. Eric J. Segerstrom in preparing the final papers for transfer of the title of the lands of defendant. That when said mistake was observed, the said plaintiff was informed of the same, prior to the execution and delivery of the deed under the terms of said agreement, and knew before the deed was executed and delivered to him that such mistake had been made in describing the lands in the said agreement and made no objection to such correction of the land description and was agreeable to the correction of the description in the said deed so as to properly and correctly describe the said lands which said plaintiff had agreed to purchase from defendant; that the said deed so delivered to plaintiff on or about the 25th day of January, 1926, did correctly and fully describe the lands which plaintiff had in fact agreed to purchase, and which lands defendant had in fact agreed to sell, and defendant has fully complied with the terms and conditions of the said contract of purchase and sale between plaintiff and defendant.

"That defendant did not agree to convey and plaintiff did not in truth and fact agree to purchase the amount of 18.44 acres or any other amount of land in addition to the said land described in the said deed delivered by defendant to plaintiff, that plaintiff has received by said deed all of the land which he in truth and fact agreed to purchase and all of the land he paid for; that the said portion of lands sold and conveyed by Geo. Mayer to Bridget Wolfling and which said lands were included by mistake in the description of lands set forth in the said agreement formed no part or portion of the consideration paid or agreed to be paid for defendant's said lands by plaintiff. That the principal thing and matter of value in said transaction of sale from defendant to plaintiff, was the residence building and out buildings on said property known as the Hess residence property and the location of said buildings as a business property to operate a service station and soft drink establishment, that the said 18.44 acres more or less included by mistake in the said agreement is not more valuable than other portions of said land described in said agreement of sale by reason of the timber thereof or for any other reason or at all."

[1, 2] The foregoing findings show a mutual mistake as to the legal description of the lands sought to be included in the contract of sale. It is clear that a court of equity will not order specific performance of such a contract. Civ. Code, § 3391, subd. 4. There is also present in the case the element of estoppel. The plaintiff, by accepting the deed to the property owned by defendant, without objection, and with full knowledge that it did not conform to the description contained in the contract, waived his right to insist upon a strict compliance with the terms of the contract. The case of Smiley v. Read, 163 Cal. 644, 126 P. 486, presents substantially the same legal situation as we are considering here. In that case it was said:

"It makes no difference how soon after the consummation of the sale plaintiff made his objection. His duty was to assert his unwillingness to accept the land offered at the time of the tender. Failing to do this he was estopped from demanding the fraction of an acre representing the difference between the amount of land mentioned in the contract and that specified in the certificate of title."

In re PHELPS' ESTATE. (S. F. 12593.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 26, 1928.

1. Trusts ⚷274(3)—Testamentary trustee's and attorney's fees held properly charged against corpus of estate, leaving balance of unexpended income in trustee's hands to apply on accumulated annuities (Code Civ. Proc. § 1563).

Where bequests to annuitants was specific, testatrix intended that net income should be devoted to them as preferred class, and there was sufficient estate to care for expenses of administration without jeopardizing other specific legatees, order charging testamentary trustee's and attorney's fees against corpus of the estate, leaving balance of unexpended income in trustee's hands to apply on accumulated annuities in accordance with testatrix's intention, was both just and legally proper, though estate is liable for administration expenses in proportion to value or amount of several devises or legacies, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1563.

2. Trusts ⚷274(3)—Net income should be devoted exclusively to satisfaction of specific bequests, where testatrix so intended, though testamentary trustees are entitled to reimbursement for expenses incurred in good faith and administration expenses are usually payable from income.

While testamentary trustees generally are entitled to reimbursement for expenses incurred in good faith in execution of trust, and expenses of administration are usually payable from income, net income should be devoted exclusively to satisfaction of specific bequests, where testatrix plainly so intended.

3. Executors and administrators ⟹513(9)—Provision on approval of testamentary trustee's account for payment of his and attorney's fees from income held not to preclude court from charging such fees against corpus of estate on settlement of subsequent account.

That probate court on approval of testamentary trustee's account provided for payment of his and attorney's fees from income bequeathed to annuitants did not bind court to charge such fees to income instead of corpus of estate on settlement on subsequent account; such approval not being of such finality as to foreclose court from making order appropriate to facts presented on hearing of later account, especially in view of final decree directing distribution of property specifically devised and bequeathed to life tenants with residue to trustees.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Josephine A. Phelps, deceased. From an order settling the account of W. F. Edward T. McLean in pro. per.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from an order settling the sixth account of W. F. Chipman, trustee, in the matter of the estate of Josephine A. Phelps, deceased, and particularly from those portions of the order directing the transfer of trustee's fees and attorney's fees from charges against income to charges against principal and directing the trustee to make the payment of $12,950.27, as income, to Eugenie H. Schroeder, an annuitant under the will.

Josephine A. Phelps died testate on December 5, 1916, in the county of San Mateo. The will, admitted to probate, created a trust for the benefit of certain named beneficiaries, including the appellants, Florence Lansing and Clara Ethel Cooley. By the terms of the will, life estates in certain properties were vested in Virginia A. Lord and Eugenie H. Schroeder, sisters of the decedent. W. F. Chipman and Union Trust Company were appointed executors of the will and also trustees to carry out the provisions of the trust. Prior to distribution the court made an order directing the executors to sell property of the estate and to pay to Virginia A. Lord certain sums claimed by her to be due under the terms of the will. Upon an appeal by the executors, the order was reversed. Estate of Phelps, 179 Cal. 703, 178 P. 846. The executors filed their final account and report and petition for distribution. The account was approved and distribution ordered. On appeal from the decree of distribution attacking the validity of the trust, the same was declared valid and operative except in certain particulars not involved herein. The decree of distribution was reversed, with directions to enter an order distributing to the several specific devisees and legatees the property devised and bequeathed to them under the valid portions of the will, and to distribute the remainder to the trustees, to be held by them upon the trusts declared in the will. Estate of Phelps, 182 Cal. 752, 190 P. 17. Thereafter, and on July 22, 1920, the executors submitted to the probate court their second and supplemental final account and report and petition for distribution. On September 20, 1920, the account was approved and distribution ordered to the life tenants and the residue to the trustees.

By the terms of the fifth article of the will the beneficiaries were established as class A and class B. The class A beneficiaries were five brothers and sisters of the decedent. As to them the trustees were directed to pay monthly out of the net income of the estate annuities aggregating $900 per month. The will further provided that, should the income in any month be insufficient to pay all of said annuities in full, the trustees were directed to pay the annuities to Virginia A. Lord and Eugenie H. Schroeder in full and prorate the balance among the remaining annuitants, and that, whenever there should be more than sufficient to pay all of said annuities in full, the trustees should pay such annuitants as had not received their annuities in full a sufficient sum to make up such deficit, but without interest. The trustees were then directed to sell from time to time, when sales might in the judgment of the trustees be profitably made, sufficient of the estate to yield a fund of $240,000. Upon the accumulation of such fund the trustees were directed to invest the same and from the income thereof pay to the annuitants certain specified percentages thereof, respectively, in lieu of the annuities theretofore provided for. Provision was then made that, in the event that any of said annuitants should not be living at the time of the accumulation of said fund of $240,000, or if then living should afterward die, the fund of $240,000 was to be paid to certain named heirs of the annuitants.

As to the class B beneficiaries, the trustees were directed, as sales of the estate should be made, to pay legacies in specified amounts to twenty-nine different persons, corporations and associations, and in the order named. The first five legacies aggregate $115,000. The sixth and seventh are in favor of the appellants herein, and are in the the sum of $15,000 each. The remainder of the estate, as to the disposition thereof provided for in the fifth article, was directed to be paid in equal shares to two of the sisters, Virginia A. Lord and Eugenie H. Schroeder, and to a nephew, W. F. Chipman, if living, and, if dead, to their heirs.

The second order of distribution decreed that the right to the annuities provided for in the class A schedule of beneficiaries should vest in the respective annuitants at the dates the same became or should become payable, and that said annuities "are hereby decreed to be a preferred charge on the whole of the net income of said estate, other than the fund of $240,000, after the same has been accumulated, whenever realized." From the second decree of distribution no appeal was taken.

Some time after the entry of the second decree of distribution and prior to February 21, 1927, the Union Trust Company resigned as trustee, and W. F. Chipman became and has continued to act as sole trustee. On February 21, 1927, W. F. Chipman filed his sixth account and report as trustee, showing that at that date he had in his possession assets of the estate valued at $389,818.63. This account also shows that all of the expenses of the estate accruing prior to the sixth account have been paid; that the income from the estate covered by the report was the sum of $19,383.15; that $10,000 on account of trustee's fees and $17,000 on account of attorney's fees, theretofore allowed by the court, had been charged to income, and that other expenses of the estate in the sum of $8,432.88 had accrued. If this charge of $27,000 for trustee's and attorney's fees and the additional charges for other expenses were made against income alone, the result would be not only an overdraft of $14,049.73 on the income account, but no funds whatever would be available for the annuitants. The terms of the will indicate very clearly that it was the intention of the testatrix to provide a monthly income for the annuitants who were first in her thought and affections. The testatrix expressly stated in her will that she believed her estate sufficient to provide for the monthly payment of the annuities and the specific bequests. She certainly contemplated that the estate would be so administered that the annuitants should obtain some benefit from her bounty during their lifetime. Instead of accomplishing that purpose, and due to the delays in administering the estate, the annuitants have been deprived of their income, and, if no greater progress is made, the trust estate will not be closed during the lifetime of any of them, nor at all until the accumulating annuities are liquidated. The outlook is not encouraging, for the reason that the expenses of administering the trust are continually exceeding the income, and more than ten years have elapsed since the executors were appointed. Two of the five annuitants have died, and the other three have passed the allotted time of three-score and ten.

[1] This was the situation confronting the probate court when it was called upon to approve the sixth account. The court determined that the general expense accruing during the period covered by the account be charged against the income account, but that the trustee's fees and the attorney's fees should be charged against the corpus of the estate, leaving a balance of $12,950.27 of unexpended income in the hands of the trustee to apply on the accumulated annuities, amounting to $39,333.34. The decision of the court in this respect was eminently just and in accordance with the obvious intention of the testatrix, and should be allowed to stand unless there is some insuperable legal obstacle to prevent it.

We think the order may be legally justified. In the first place, the decree distributing the estate to the trustees provided that the annuities should be a preferred charge on the whole of the net income of the estate. The plain intention of the testatrix was that this should be so. Section 1563 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides, among other things, that the estate is liable for the expenses of administration in proportion to the value or amount of the several devises or legacies, but specific devises or legacies are exempt from such liability if it appears to the court necessary to carry into effect the intention of the testator and there is other sufficient estate. There is ample in the residuary estate to provide for the sums allocated by the court to payment from the corpus and the residuary legatees are not appealing from the order. Therefore, since the bequests to the annuitants were specific, and since it was the intention of the testatrix that the net income should be devoted to the annuitants as a preferred class, and since there is sufficient estate to care for the expenses of administration without jeopardizing the other specific legatees, including these appellants, the order appealed from is not open to successful attack.

[2] The appellants cite and rely upon Estate of Gartenlaub, 185 Cal. 648, 198 P. 209, 16 A. L. R. 520, which holds that as a general rule testamentary trustees are entitled to reimbursement for expenses incurred in good faith in the execution of the trust, and that the expenses of administering the estate are usually payable from income. Such, no doubt, is the general rule. In its application, however, cognizance must necessarily be taken of the intention of the testator, and if, as here, it be clear that it was intended that the net income should be devoted exclusively to the satisfaction of specific bequests, the case is within the rule. There is nothing here decided inconsistent with the general rule.

[3] It is further insisted that, since the probate court, on the approval of a prior account, provided that the trustee's fees and the attorney's fees be paid from income, there was no alternative for the court in the consideration of the present account but to charge such fees to income. We do not think that there was such finality in the approval of the prior account as would foreclose the court from making an order with reference to the account in hand appropriate to the facts and circumstances presented on the hearing of the later account, especially in view of the terms of the final decree of distribution.

The order is affirmed.

UNITED FRUIT DISTRIBUTING CO. v. STONE et al. (Civ. 6408.)★

Rehearing Denied Dec. 20, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 21, 1929.

1. Sales ⊂⇒363—Whether demand was properly made on plaintiff for delivery of fruit sold held for jury.

Under contract treated by parties as a sale of fruit, whereby defendants agreed to purchase certain lots of fruits under contract to plaintiff from growers, whether demand was properly made on plaintiff for delivery of fruit, rather than demand made on each grower, held question of fact for jury.

2. Trial ⊂⇒191(3)—Requested instructions assuming that title passed under contract, which was question of fact and not of law, held properly refused.

Requested instructions assuming that contract in question passed title were properly refused, where contract was silent on subject; since whether title was passed was question of fact, and not question of law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by the United Fruit Distributing Company against S. C. Stone and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Crawford & Crawford, of Lakeport, and Robt. H. Schwab, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Benjamin C. Jones, of Lakeport, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action to recover a judgment for money. The defendants answered, and a trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendants, and from a judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed.

In its complaint the plaintiff pleaded its case in two counts: (1) For goods sold and delivered, and (2) for a balance due on an open book account. The answer denied all of the material averments in the complaint. In an amended answer the defendants set up a written contract, alleged to have been executed by the parties, and thereupon they alleged that the plaintiff had wholly failed to perform the same. In asking permission to make the amendment the defendants stated in open court that their purpose was to clearly present the issue that there had been no delivery. The plaintiff asserts that there was no evidence to sustain the verdict, and it addresses its contention to each count separately. In the view we take of the case we will consider both points together.

As throwing much light on the controversy, certain surrounding circumstances are of importance. Big Valley in Lake county is given up very largely to the production of pears. The pears are, to a large extent, harvested, packed, and shipped east. There are many individuals, partnerships, and corporations engaged in handling the shipments after the fruit is packed. However, there are not many concerns who are actually engaged in packing. It is therefore not uncommon to find several shippers who are having their packing done in one and the same packing house. Among other packing houses one is conducted by E. S. Griffitts. He packed for many persons, including United Fruit Distributing Company, the plaintiff, and one of the companies engaged in shipping. The shippers sometimes act as consignees, and sometimes they purchase outright either for themselves or for others. One of the defendants, S. C. Stone, was a grower and had a crop of his own, and furthermore conducted a drying yard. Prior to the 18th day of August, 1925, M. H. Stitt, as the agent of the plaintiff, had purchased from various growers the whole or a part of the crop of such growers. Those purchases were evidenced by written instruments which were made by using certain blanks, which blanks were filled out and certain passages were scratched, thus evidencing the contract. S. C. Stone had been in the company of Mr. Stitt when some of the contracts were being negotiated. Later a written instrument was executed, which is the principal document involved in this case. A copy of it is as follows:

"Finley, Calif., Aug. 18th, 1925.

"S. C. Stone of Finley, Calif., hereby agrees to buy and the United Fruit Distributing Company of Sacramento hereby sells to S. C. Stone the following lots of fruit (Bartlett pears) now under contract to the United Fruit Distributing Company. The H. E. Cookson, J. A. Sylar, G. L. Daily, C. W. Carpenter, D. P. Sylar, W. J. Slattery and the Levensaler & Slattery lots at Seventy dollars per ton orchard run. The B. J. Pardee, E. A. Lamb, Paul Shirley, Fannie Hudson and G. W. Johnson lots at Seventy-five dollars per ton orchard run. The Wm. Gordon and M. A. Spencer lots at Seventy-three dollars per ton orchard run. Any advances or moneys paid out by the United Fruit Distributing Company to any of above growers to be charged to the account of S. C. Stone.

"In consideration of the United Fruit Distributing Company furnishing the funds to handle the above contracts S. C. Stone agrees to ship what Bartlett pears not contracted to the Stewart Fruit Company with the United Fruit Distributing Company.

"S. C. Stone.
"United Fruit Distributing Co.
"By M. H. Stitt."

The second paragraph of the contract is not at all involved in this litigation. It is an admitted fact that the fruit grown on the Stone place was turned over to the United Fruit Distributing Company, and was by it shipped to the east, and thereafter it was fully accounted for. Although the instrument is not clear, it will be seen at once that the plaintiff might contend that after the execution of the instrument dated August 18, 1925, it would be entitled to claim that not only the fruit grown by Mr. Stone should be turned over to it for eastern shipment, but that the fruit grown by the other growers, Cookson et al., should also be turned over to the plaintiff for eastern shipment. On the other hand, it is true that the defendants might reasonably contend that, having purchased from the plaintiff the several lots of fruit grown by Cookson et al., that they were entitled to have the same delivered to them, and that they could thereafter ship the fruit so purchased through the plaintiff's organization, or otherwise as they might determine. These questions were all presented to the trial court sitting with the jury, and have all been determined in favor of the defendants.

[1] The instrument dated August 18, 1925, was a sale or it was not. If it was not a sale, then the plaintiff may not complain. If it was a sale, it was a sale of the fruit mentioned in the contracts theretofore executed by each grower and the plaintiff, or it was a sale of several written contracts. On the trial of the case both parties treated the instrument dated August 18, 1925, as a sale of fruit. The defendants introduced evidence to the effect that when the fruit was ready for delivery they made a demand on the plaintiff that the fruit be delivered to them. The demand was not complied with. The plaintiff now makes the point that the demand should have been made on each grower. The record shows that the growers had sold to the plaintiff, and that by the terms of the contracts some agreed to deliver at the plaintiffs' packing shed, that is, the Griffitts' packing shed, and not knowing that the fruit had been resold, they did in fact deliver at that shed. Other lots were brought to the Griffitts' house, but by whom does not appear, and they were in process of being so delivered on or before August 18, 1925. Notwithstanding it had resold the fruit to the defendants, the plaintiff received the fruit, packed it, and shipped it east to be resold. Under these circumstances it was a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the demand was properly made on the plaintiff. In this behalf it is pertinent that when Mr. Stone made a demand on Mr. Stitt to deliver the fruit to him, Mr. Stitt made certain replies, but did not contend that Mr. Stone should address his demand to the individual growers and not to the plaintiff. Neither did Mr. Stitt at that time turn to Mr. Stone and make the claim that pursuant to the provisions of the contract dated August 18, 1925, the plaintiff was entitled to receive the fruit, pack it, and ship it for Mr. Stone's account. On the contrary, he asked Mr. Stone if he had resold it, and for what price. On hearing the price he merely replied, "The fruit is worth more money." There was evidence in the case which, if the jury believed it, fully warranted the jury in bringing in the verdict which it brought in.

Certain contentions are made by counsel in this court which do not require extended notice. The defendants assert that the instrument dated August 18, 1925, was not a sale. That contention presents a theory that was not presented to the trial court. The plaintiff contends that the instrument dated August 18, 1925, was a sale of contracts and not a sale of fruit. As to that point we make the same comment and add thereto that from the time that the attorney for the plaintiff made his opening statement, and thereafter throughout the trial in the lower court, the plaintiff was contending that it was entitled to a balance due as on an express contract for the sale of pears.

[2] The plaintiff requested and the trial court refused to give two different instructions. Each of the proposed instructions assumed that the contract dated August 18, 1925, passed the title. The contract is silent on the subject. As to whether title passed was a question of fact and not a question of law. Turner, Kuhn & Fraser, Inc., v. Jones, 61 Cal. App. 732, 734, 215 P. 1033. The question of fact should have been submitted under appropriate instructions together with all other questions of fact.

The judgment is affirmed.

HEULER v. HEULER.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 17, 1929.

1. Wills ⚷69—"Will" is instrument legally and intentionally disposing of property, to become effective only after death.

A will is an instrument in or by virtue of which a qualified person legally and intentionally directs the disposition of his property, to become effective only following the death of such person.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Will (Testament).]

2. Wills ⚷94—Will need not use any particular form of words, but must of itself or with surrounding circumstances unmistakably express animus testandi.

Though no particular form of words need be used in a will, it must be readily discernible therefrom that primary purpose of testator is to make a will, and that either in or of itself, or in connection with circumstances surrounding its execution, the very paper or document be clearly, unmistakably, and with legal certainty expressive of the animus testandi.

3. Wills ⚷88(1)—Instrument entitled "Marriage Contract," signed by decedent and intended wife, reciting agreement as to disposition of property in case of death, held not probatable as will.

Instrument entitled "Marriage Contract," signed by decedent and his intended wife, reciting that parties were to be married on the day following, and that it was agreed that, if decedent predeceased wife, she should be entitled to a life estate in one-third of his estate, with remainder to certain of his children by a former marriage, and that remaining two-thirds of his estate should be divided equally among such children, followed by provisions relating to disposition of intended wife's property, if she predeceased him, held not entitled to probate as decedent's will, animus testandi being lacking.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter J. Desmond, Judge.

Proceeding by George E. Heuler for the probate of the will of George T. Heuler, deceased, opposed by Christina Heuler, contestant. From an order admitting the will to probate, contestant appeals. Reversed.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal from an order admitting to probate, as the last will of George T. Heuler, deceased, a certain document denominated a "marriage contract."

[1, 2] Before considering the contents of the writing in question, it may be well to freshen the recollection with reference to the prevailing legal principle which may be applicable to the situation herein presented: A will is an instrument in or by virtue of which a qualified person legally and intentionally directs the disposition of his property, to become effective only following the death of such person. Although in its preparation it is unnecessary that any particular form of words be used, it is indispensable that it may be readily discernible therefrom that the primary purpose of the testator be that he make a will, and that either in and of itself, or in connection with circumstances surrounding its execution, the very paper or document be clearly, unmistakably, and with legal certainty, expressive of the animus testandi, or intention of the maker thereof to give direction for the disposition of his property after his death. Estate of Henning, 186 Cal. 307, 199 P. 39; Estate of Lowe, 178 Cal. 111, 172 P. 583; In re Keith, 173 Cal. 276, 159 P. 705; Estate of Meade, 118 Cal. 428, 50 P. 541, 62 Am. St. Rep. 244; In re Richardson, 94 Cal. 63, 29 P. 484, 15 L. R. A. 635; In re Major's Estate (Cal. App.) 264 P. 542; Estate of Beffa, 54 Cal. App. 186, 201 P. 616.

With so much in mind, and for the purpose of determining its legal effect so far as its testamentary qualities are concerned, the instrument which was presented for probate herein may be considered. It was in German script, dated and written by Heuler, signed by him and his intended wife, and later "witnessed" by two persons. The English translation of the document follows:

"Marriage Contract.

"The following agreement between George T. Heuler, on the one part, and Christina Wagner on the other part, was effected on Monday, the 4th of January, 1909. George T. Heuler is entering the state of matrimony on Tuesday, the 5th of January, 1909, after this mutual, and legally witnessed agreement. If George T. Heuler departs from this life first, so shall Christina Wagner receive her legal third share only under the following conditions. After an honest, conservative estimate shall the third part of my estate be converted into cash and given over to a trust company where Christina Wagner may draw the interest thereof every six months until the end of her life.

"The other two-thirds shall be divided equally among my three children out of my first marriage, or their heirs, on their survivors. Also, shall my three children, George, Leo, Erna, after the death of the above mentioned Christina Wagner, receive the above mentioned capital.

"If, on the other hand, Christina Wagner departs from this life before George T. Heuler, so shall George T. Heuler, her husband, inherit all moveable property which she now owns or shall own, without reservation, without interference from her relatives.

"[Signed] George T. Heuler.
"(——) Christina Wagner."

At the time the document herein was executed George T. Heuler was an unmarried man of the age of 59 years. Prior to the execution of the instrument, Heuler had been twice married—first, to a woman by whom later he had three children, including the appellant herein; and, secondly, to another woman by whom he had one child. From each of such women he had been divorced. It was his expectation that on the day following the date of the "marriage contract" he would marry the woman with whom he was making what may be termed the antenuptial agreement. After this agreement was executed, Heuler sent a copy thereof to each of his three children by his first wife. The record does not affirmatively disclose that Heuler ever spoke of the document as constituting a will. To the contrary, his widow testified that she never heard him refer to the instrument as his will. She further testified in part:

> "He came in the kitchen and told me to sign that, and he didn't give me a chance to read it."

At the time when the "marriage contract" was executed, Heuler said nothing to Mrs. Heuler about making a will, nor did he at the time of its execution or at any time thereafter ask her to make a will. Some 15 years after the instrument in question was executed, Heuler personally dictated another instrument purporting to be a will, but which, because of defects in the manner of its attestation by witnesses, was refused probate. The opening statements of that will were:

> "This is my last will and testament. I hereby name my son George E. Heuler as executor of my will and property, personal and real estate, stocks, bonds, etc. The property is to remain intact and the income thereof of my entire property and belongings is to defray the living expenses of my wife, Mrs. Christina Heuler, born Christina Wagner, until her death."

Prior to the time when the last-mentioned instrument was signed by Heuler, on several different occasions, he spoke of the advisability, if not of the necessity, of his making a will, in order not only that his wife might be adequately protected, but as well for other purposes.

Considering the instrument itself, together with the evidence relating to its execution as hereinbefore outlined, it would appear that, with the possible exception hereinafter noted, in no case in the state of California has the court, in announcing appropriate legal principles or conclusions, gone so far as to indicate that the document in question should be regarded and probated as a will. To the contrary, both the Supreme Court and the Appellate Courts of this state have been most consistent in declaring that documents much stronger in language, executed in circumstances far more favorable to a conclusion of "animus testandi" on the part of the maker thereof, failed to comply with the requirements necessary to the establishment of a legal will. A reference to some of the authorities may be helpful.

In the case entitled In re Richardson, 94 Cal. 63, 29 P. 484, 15 L. R. A. 635, it appears that a man wrote a letter to his sister, a copy of which is as follows:

> "Los Angeles, Cal., October 1, 1890.
> "Nina—I wrote you yesterday, hastily; answer my letter at once; I want to know everything about mother, and all about you—your children. I have reached the point of perfect independence, pecuniarily. My health is probably ruined, and I want to anticipate possibilities. You and your children get everything. Your boy I want given the best of educations. I would like him to go to Harvard. I would like to have him a lawyer; don't bring him up a prejudiced Southerner; but teach honor; make it dearer than life, and he must, with the blood in his veins, be a man. Write me. As soon as I possibly can, I will be in Savannah. Brother."

Regarding the sufficiency of the document as a legal will, the following excerpts are taken from the opinion of the Supreme Court:

> "The language of the letter which is propounded as the last will and testament of the deceased is not, to our minds, testamentary in its character.
> "There is nothing in the circumstances and surroundings of the writer which unmistakably evince that it was his intention that the letter in question should be a testamentary disposition of his estate. * * *
> "He was not in extremis, nor is there anything to show that he contemplated immediate or very proximate dissolution, which might necessitate a final disposition of his estate. * * *
> "It is not for courts to declare that to be a testamentary disposition of his estate when it does not clearly appear that such was the intention of the individual executing it."

In each of several other California cases the language appearing in the document itself, as well as attendant circumstances, were at least as expressive of "animus testandi," as were the words and the conduct of George T. Heuler in the instant case. Nevertheless each of such documents was refused probate as a will. In this connection, attention is specially directed to Estate of Meade, 118 Cal. 428, 50 P. 541, 62 Am. St. Rep. 244; Estate of Anthony, 21 Cal. App. 157, 131 P.

96; In re Major's Estate (Cal. App.) 264 P. 452; Estate of Seiler, 176 Cal. 771, 170 P. 1138, 179 P. 389; Estate of Henning, 186 Cal. 307, 199 P. 39. See, also, Estate of Branick, 172 Cal. 482, 157 P. 238; Estate of Wheatley, 184 Cal. 399, 193 P. 934; Estate of Scott, 128 Cal. 57, 60 P. 527.

Although not set forth in the opinion, from the record in Estate of Lowe, 178 Cal. 111, 172 P. 583, it appears that the facts were somewhat analogous to those in the instant case. Therein a husband and a wife each signed an instrument purporting to be an "agreement and lease," by which the property rights of each of the parties one toward the other were "settled," and a 50-year lease of certain property was demised by the husband to the wife, with the apparently attempted proviso that, if the wife should die before the end of the term, the lease should terminate. The instrument also contained a paragraph which was strikingly similar to that which in the instant case is relied upon as showing testamentary intent. It is as follows:

> "It is understood that by reason of this settlement all the separate property of the husband will at his decease, subject to said lease, go to his children, unless otherwise disposed of by him, and all the separate property of the wife, will at her decease go to her heirs at law (cutting off the husband) unless otherwise disposed of by her."

In addition thereto, at a date several years subsequent to that of the original instrument the husband signed and appended thereto a paper of which the following is a copy:

> "It is further provided and mutually agreed by and between the said parties above named in the annexed agreement and lease, that, in addition to the same, for the better support during the lifetime of the said Louesa Lowe, his wife, that in case she shall survive the said Amos Lowe, her husband, she, the said wife, shall be allowed out of the income of the property of Amos Lowe, her husband, Twenty Dollars monthly each and every month during her lifetime, also the household goods."

In ruling upon the sufficiency of the instrument there propounded as a will, the Supreme Court said:

> "* * * The writing on its face purported to be a mere agreement between husband and wife for the support of the latter, and was annexed to an earlier writing of like character signed by the two. * * * Manifestly the paper was not drawn and signed animo testandi" —citing cases.

Although in Estate of Spitzer, 196 Cal. 301, 237 P. 739, the language used by the testator in a letter written by him perhaps was no stronger in its indication of testamentary intent than was that used by either of the persons in either of the authorities to which reference herein has been had, nevertheless, from evidence and declarations made by the testator in connection therewith, as well as from other surrounding circumstances, the court was of the opinion that such letter was sufficient to constitute a holographic will. See, also, Estate of Skerrett, 67 Cal. 585, 8 P. 181.

[3] Considering the language of the instrument in question in the instant case, it will be noted, first, that its author called it a "marriage contract." Thereafter, in two different places therein, the instrument was referred to as an "agreement." He said "the following agreement * * * was effected on Monday, the 4th of January, 1909," and that he was "entering the state of matrimony on Tuesday, the 5th of January, 1909, after this mutual and legally witnessed agreement." Although a later document dictated by Heuler was described by him as his "last will and testament," and by which he appointed an "executor," in no place in the instrument in question may any such words as "will," "testament," or "executor" be found. As to declarations of the author concerning the nature of the instrument here propounded as a will, we find that he was absolutely silent; whereas, in a similar connection with reference to the other instrument, the evidence shows that on several occasions preceding its attempted execution he expressed his ideas very clearly and definitely. The purport of the instrument in question is that Heuler and his intended wife, having theretofore agreed upon certain matters ("effected on Monday"), they will be married on the day following, "after this mutual and legally witnessed agreement" has been properly executed. He then attempted to reduce to writing that which theretofore had been agreed upon by him and the woman whom he expected to marry. In substance, he first said that it was agreed that, if he "departs from this life first," his intended wife should be entitled to a life estate in one-third of his estate, with the remainder to certain of his children, and that as to two-thirds of his estate it "shall be divided equally" among his three children. Then follows that part in which it was agreed that, if "Christina Wagner departs from this life before George T. Heuler, so shall George T. Heuler, her husband, inherit all movable property which she owns," etc. So far as may be readily seen, other than the word "inherit," used once only, together with the words "departs from this life," the instrument is devoid of any language which would indicate testamentary intent either on the part of its author or on the part of Christina Wagner. Assuming (even as against the evidence) that that part of the instrument in which the word "inherit" appears was the voluntary act and deed of Christina Wagner, at most it was but declaratory as to her intention with reference to the final disposition of her separate property. But it will be noted that even such language purports to deal with the property of Christina Wagner only. Manifestly, it would not be competent by his will for George T. Heuler to direct the disposition of the property of Christina Wagner after her death; and there is no evidence that Christina Wagner ever considered the instrument in the light of a testamentary or other disposition of her property. It may be that by some other instrument the parties to the "marriage contract" contemplated a joint, positive direction for the disposition of the several properties of each of them after the death of either or both of them; but, in the language of some of the cases to which reference has been had, there is nothing in the very paper itself which clearly manifests such an intention. As indicated in Estate of Henning, 186 Cal. 307, 199 P. 39, to which attention has been directed, it is apparent that the parties were "contemplating matrimony," and that the "main question" in the mind of each of them, or at least in the mind of Heuler, was to reduce to writing that which theretofore orally "was effected on Monday" between them. With reference thereto, the statement made by the court in the somewhat similar case of Estate of Meade, 118 Cal. 428, 50 P. 541, 62 Am. St. Rep. 244, is that "such being the principal purpose of the writing, it should certainly be made plain by apt words" that incidentally he also intended the paper as his last will. Furthermore, as is also suggested in that case, it is "hardly conceivable" that a man of the apparent intelligence and education of Heuler, possessed of his evident familiarity with legal terminology ordinarily employed in the drafting of a will, would have so indistinctly and inappropriately expressed his wishes respecting the disposition of his property after his death. The language employed in the "marriage contract" is more or less appropriate to an antenuptial agreement. It is lacking in the legal requirement that, in order to constitute a will, primarily it must be clearly and unmistakably evincive of a present desire there expressed to direct the final disposition of his estate after the death of its author. It should therefore be denied probate as a last will and testament.

The order is reversed.

In the Matter of the Estate of George T. HEULER, Deceased. ★

George E. HEULER, Petitioner and Respondent, v. Christina HEULER and Jay D. Rinehart, Administrator of the Estate of George T. Heuler, Deceased, Appellants.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 17, 1929.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter J. Desmond, Judge.

Merriam, Rinehart & Merriam, of Pasadena, for appellants.

Horace S. Wilson and Constan Jensen, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. The facts herein are that after the death of George T. Heuler, on petition to the probate court by the widow of the deceased, and by her nomination, one Jay D. Rinehart was duly appointed administrator of the estate, and letters of administration were accordingly issued to him. Later, an instrument denominated a "marriage contract" was propounded as the last will and testament of the deceased, and, after a hearing thereon, said instrument was admitted to probate. Thereafter, on the stated grounds that George T. Heuler did not die intestate, and that his widow had "failed and refused" to present his will for probate, a surviving son of the deceased petitioned the probate court for an order of revocation of the letters of administration and of the said appointment of Jay D. Rinehart as the administrator of said estate. The petition was granted and an order made in accordance with the prayer thereof. It is from said last-mentioned order that this appeal is taken.

At about the same time that the appeal herein was taken, an appeal was also taken from the order admitting to probate as the last will and testament of the deceased the so-called "marriage contract" to which reference has been had. As to the last-mentioned appeal, by an opinion and judgment this day filed therein (272 P. 301), this court has determined that the "marriage contract" was lacking in essential legal requirements to constitute it a valid will; that the order admitting such instrument to probate as the last will and testament of the deceased was erroneous; and that such order should be reversed.

In view of the fact that the order from which the appeal herein was taken necessarily depended upon the legal sufficiency of the "marriage contract" as a will, and as this court has concluded that such instrument failed to comply with the legal requirements of a valid will, it follows that the foundation for the order of which complaint is here made was insufficient, and consequently that such order should be, and it is, reversed.

2. Arson 🔑37(3) — That accused lived with wife, who owned and managed property burned, held not to support finding that he knew it was insured.

That one charged with burning insured property was living with his wife, who owned and attended to all matters relating to property, held insufficient to support finding that he knew it was insured, as against direct evidence to contrary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

Peter S. Peloian was convicted of burning insured property, and he appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

N. Lindsay South, of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Waldemar Augustine, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. The defendant was tried upon an information in two counts, the first charging arson and the second charging "burning insured property." The jury returned a verdict of guilty on both counts, but the trial court granted defendant's motion for a new trial on count 1. From the order denying his motion for a new trial on count 2, and from the judgment of conviction, the defendant has appealed on a typewritten record.

On the night of January 31, 1928, a house situated in the city of Fresno was partially damaged by fire. The property was jointly owned by defendant's wife, in her separate right, and by her two minor children by a former marriage. For some time prior to the fire it had been managed solely by the wife of defendant, who had covered it with two policies of fire insurance in the sum of $2,000 each. The property was unoccupied at the time of the fire, but when the firemen arrived at the scene they discovered that coal oil had been sprinkled upon the walls and floors of the house and that candles had been placed in various rooms, all of which tended to convince them that the fire was of incendiary origin. Upon investigation a five-gallon can containing some coal oil was found. This can bore a yellow label, partially torn, the remaining portions of which were found inside the rear door of defendant's store. It was also shown that defendant carried coal oil for sale at his store and that he had a Ford truck for delivery purposes which had four new Fisk tires corresponding to fresh automobile tracks found in the alley behind the burned property. The state also showed that certain paper wrappers found at the fire had been delivered to the defendant's store on January 19 preceding the fire.

This is all the evidence upon which the state relies as connecting defendant with the commission of the crime. It is the contention of appellant on this appeal that it is insufficient to support the verdict, that it merely creates a suspicion that the appellant, or one of his clerks, could have, or might have, committed the crime, and that this suspicion rests entirely upon the fact that they had access to the coal oil and cartons in the store and to the key to a Ford automobile which could have made the tracks observed near the burned building. But we should add, not for the purpose of showing a conflict in the testimony, but merely to give the entire story, that the uncontradicted testimony showed that the appellant was home ill all during the night of the fire, and that on the morning of the day preceding the fire, which was a Sunday, the appellant's store was found open and that a number of customers called for service, but could find no one in attendance. We would have to strain the rule covering the weight to be given circumstantial evidence if we were to hold that the facts and circumstances in this case were "such as to exclude any other reasonable theory than that of the guilt of the accused." People v. Nagy, 199 Cal. 235, 236, 248 P. 906, 907. But, assuming for the purposes of the case that they are sufficient to show appellant's participation in the burning, we are confronted with the asserted failure of the state to prove the essential element of appellant's knowledge that the building was insured.

[1] The appellant contends that the only competent evidence in the record shows that appellant had no knowledge that the property was insured, and that the judgment must therefore be reversed. The state of the evidence is conceded by respondent, but the respondent argues that the jury could disregard all this positive evidence and draw the inference that appellant had such knowledge from the facts that the property was in truth insured, that appellant's wife owned the property, and that he was living with his wife. That a fact is true does not alone support an inference that a party has knowledge of that fact. If we might infer from the fact that a man lives with his wife he must know all the details of her private business affairs, then the jury might have drawn that inference and might have set it up against the positive testimony to the contrary. But an inference is a deduction to be drawn from the facts proved and not a conclusion based upon suspicion alone.

[2] It is conceded that knowledge of the insurance was an essential element of the crime charged in the second count, and one which the state was required to prove. The only evidence on the subject is the direct and positive testimony that appellant did not have such knowledge. To reach the verdict it was necessary for the jury to disregard this direct evidence and conclude that appellant had the knowledge from the fact that he lived with his wife, who alone attended to all the matters relating to her own property. Manifestly this is nothing more than a suspicion that appellant might have had knowledge of this essential fact. If mere suspicion were sufficient to support a finding of an essential element of a crime, then the statutory presumption of innocence of crime would become a declaration without a consequence.

The judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PENDELL v. THOMAS. (Civ. 5299.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 19, 1928.

1. Trover and conversion ⚷16—Legal title is not necessary to recover for conversion of personal property.

To enable one to recover for the conversion of personal property, it is not necessary to have legal title.

2. Trover and conversion ⚷16—Owner rightfully in exclusive possession of truck could maintain action in conversion, though transfer was not in compliance with law requiring registration (Motor Vehicle Act, § 45).

Owner of truck rightfully in exclusive possession thereof had sufficient title to maintain action in conversion, though there was a failure on transfer to him to comply with Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 525), § 45, relative to registration on sale of automobile.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by H. G. Pendell against Charles R. Thomas. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry O. Wackerbarth, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIL, Justice pro tem. This is an action in conversion for the value of a Ford truck. The plaintiff alleged that he was the owner and entitled to the possession of the truck, and it developed at the trial that the plaintiff had fully paid for it and had it rightfully in his exclusive possession at the time it was taken on attachment by the defendant. The plaintiff had received a bill of sale for the property and had also received the legal owner's certificate from the former owner, duly indorsed. Everything was done in order to transfer the title which should have been done, except a compliance with section 45 of the "California Vehicle Act" of 1923, and subdivision (e) thereof provides that:

> "Until said division shall have issued said new certificate of registration and certificate of ownership as hereinbefore in subdivision (d) provided, delivery of such vehicle shall be deemed not to have been made and title thereto shall be deemed not to have passed and said intended transfer shall be deemed to be incomplete and not to be valid or effective for any purpose." St. 1923, p. 525.

It is the contention of appellant that plaintiff's title was not such as would enable him to bring an action in conversion.

[1, 2] It will be observed that the plaintiff not only had possession of the property, but that he had a right to its possession; also that he was the equitable owner of it. To enable one to recover for the conversion of personal property it is not necessary to have legal title. A person in the actual and rightful possession is entitled to maintain such an action, even though upon a transfer to him there was a failure to comply with section 45 of the Motor Vehicle Act. Moody v. Goodwin, 53 Cal. App. 693, 200 P. 733.

By way of analogy, we refer to the following cases: Goodman v. Anglo-California Trust Co., 62 Cal. App. 702, 217 P. 1078; Davis v. Cline, 184 Cal. 548, 195 P. 42; Sidney v. Wilson, 67 Cal. App. 282, 227 P. 672; Boles v. Stiles, 188 Cal. 304, 204 P. 848—all of which had to do with the failure to have the automobile registered upon a sale in accordance with said act. The fact that the plaintiff was the equitable owner of the car, coupled with his physical possession thereof at the time it was taken from his custody by defendant, is a sufficient compliance with the rule requiring not merely possession, but a right to possession, in order to maintain the action. Sidney v. Wilson, 67 Cal. App. 282, 227 P. 672.

ECONOMY HOME BUILDERS, Inc., v. BERRY et ux. (Civ. 3631.)

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 17, 1929.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1071(5)—Inconsistency between court's finding and appellee's statement need not be considered, where other findings justified by evidence are sufficient to support judgment.

Court's finding attacked as inconsistent with statement of appellee need not be considered, where other findings fully justified by evidence are sufficient to support judgment.

2. Mortgages 🔑280(5)—Agreement to assume and pay mortgage is not inconsistent with deed of property subject to mortgage, and hence may be shown by parol evidence.

An agreement to assume and pay a mortgage is not inconsistent with a deed reciting that the property is granted subject to a mortgage, and hence may be shown by parol evidence.

3. Appeal and error 🔑882(17)—Plaintiff alleging that it assumed and agreed to pay unpaid balance of principal under trust deed could not complain on appeal that court's finding to such effect was contrary to evidence.

Where complaint in action for breach of contract to sell land alleged that plaintiff agreed to take land subject to unpaid balance under trust deed, which was then incumbrance on land which plaintiff assumed and agreed to pay to such extent, and answer alleged that plaintiff agreed to pay such balance, plaintiff could not complain that finding that he agreed to pay trust deed was not supported by evidence.

4. Trial 🔑396(1)—Finding contrary to fact alleged by both parties would be of no effect.

Mere finding contrary to a fact alleged by both parties would be of no effect.

5. Vendor and purchaser 🔑185—Purchaser having failed to pay, reimburse vendors, or deposit in escrow amount of installments due under trust deed assumed, vendors were not required to proceed further.

Where purchasers not only failed to pay installments due under trust deed assumed as required to protect vendors' title, but failed to reimburse latter for payment made by them or deposit amount in escrow, vendors were not required to proceed further.

6. Escrows 🔑9—Evidence held to warrant finding that escrow holder was unable to comply with terms of escrow because of purchaser's default.

Vendors' testimony that purchaser's agent said he could not give trust deed with clear title and believed he would have to let thing go, together with evidence of purchaser's repeated failures to comply with terms of contract, held to warrant finding that escrow holder was unable to comply with terms of escrow because of purchaser's default.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Judgment for vendors in purchaser's action for breach of contract will not be reversed on ground that vendor prevented purchaser from carrying out sales campaign by disparaging its good faith and financial standing in conversations with purchasers of lots, where court found against contention on conflicting evidence and complaint presented no such issue.

Judgment for defendants, in action for breach of contract to sell land, will not be reversed on ground that defendant prevented purchaser from carrying out sales campaign by disparaging its good faith and financial standing in conversations with purchasers of lots, where court found against such contention on conflicting evidence and complaint presented no such issue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. C. Doran, Judge.

Action by the Economy Home Builders, Inc., against Thomas Berry and wife, who filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Leo D. Daze and I. Henry Harris, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank R. Carrell and Dana R. Weller, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for alleged breach of contract to sell it 10 acres of land, which, together with two adjoining tracts, it planned to subdivide and sell as city residence lots. In addition to answering the allegations of the complaint, the defendants filed a cross-complaint to quiet their title to the land. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, quieting their title and denying any relief to the plaintiff. The plaintiff has appealed. The appellant did not file a reply to the respondents' brief or appear at the time fixed for oral argument, and the appeal was ordered submitted on the plaintiff's opening brief and the respondents' reply thereto.

December 19, 1923, L. M. Moore, acting for and on behalf of the plaintiff, entered into an agreement with the defendants, evidenced by contemporaneous escrow instructions, by the terms of which the defendants agreed to sell and convey to the plaintiff, within 30 days from the date thereof, the land in question for $33,750, of which $5,000 was to be deposited in escrow, together with plaintiff's two promissory notes, one for $14,375 payable in 90 days, and the other for $8,375 payable in 180 days. The property was to be taken subject to a trust deed given to secure a note in favor of Carrie A. Culler, on which there was an unpaid balance of $6,000 which the plaintiff agreed to pay. Time was expressly made of the essence of the contract. The plaintiff deposited in escrow, in lieu of a cash deposit, a check for $5,000, drawn by M. McManus on a bank in Maine. The escrow holder forwarded the check for collection, and it was returned marked, "No account." The plaintiff was given immediate possession of the land, and it proceeded to subdivide it, in connection with said two adjoining tracts, and to make improvements thereon. The trial court found:

> "That plaintiff, or the said L. M. Moore, neglected and failed to pay the said sum of $5,000, * * * and on or about January 29th, 1924, * * * the said agreement to purchase was amended and modified in these respects only: The time limit for performance of the terms of said agreement was extended from January 19th, 1924, to February 19th, 1924, and the said promissory notes and trust deed securing the same were dated January 19th, 1924, instead of December 19th, 1924.
> "That plaintiff, or the said L. M. Moore, failed and neglected to pay the sum of $5,000 upon the purchase price of said real property * * * on or before February 19th, 1924, and on said last-mentioned date the said agreement of purchase was again modified as follows: Defendants agreed to accept, and plaintiff agreed to pay as a down payment for said real property, the sum of $2,000 and the further sum of $500 on or before May 19th, 1924, and the balance by executing to defendants two promissory notes for $12,625 each, one payable on July 3rd, 1924, and the other payable on August 20th, 1924, with interest at 7 per cent per annum quarterly, from February 19th, 1924, and secured by second trust deed upon said premises, subject only to a prior trust deed in favor of Carrie A. Culler, having an unpaid balance of $6,000, which plaintiff agreed to assume and pay in accordance with its terms, with interest from February 19th, 1924, * * * and on said February 19th, 1924, escrow was made at the Title Insurance & Trust Company, Los Angeles, California, in accordance therewith; and defendants executed a good and sufficient grant deed conveying the title to said real property to plaintiff, and deposited the same in said escrow for delivery to the plaintiff upon the performance by plaintiff of the terms of the aforesaid agreement to purchase, and of the terms of said escrow.
> "That plaintiff, or the said L. M. Moore, failed and neglected to pay the said sum of $500 * * * on or before May 19th, 1924, * * * and on or about June 9th, 1924, defendants again consented and agreed to an extension of the time limit for performance of the terms of said contract and of said escrow from May 19th, 1924, to July 3rd, 1924, upon the payment to them by the plaintiff of the said sum of $500 upon said purchase price, and interest thereon to May 19th, 1924; to which plaintiff consented and agreed, and the escrow instructions were modified accordingly.
> "That on or about the 11th day of June, 1924, a payment upon said trust deed in favor of Carrie A. Culler in the sum of $2,500 became due and payable, and defendants notified plaintiff thereof; that the plaintiff, or the said L. M. Moore, failed and neglected to make said payment on said trust deed, * * * and defendants were obliged and compelled to make, and did make, said payment in order to protect their interest in said property, and to avoid foreclosure proceedings thereon.
> "That plaintiff, or the Title Insurance & Trust Company, for plaintiff, did not deliver or offer to deliver to defendants the promissory notes for $12,625 each, as aforesaid, secured by trust deed, together with certificate of title in accordance with said agreement, and the same were never delivered or tendered to defendants, or either of them, and the said Title Insurance & Trust Company, escrowee, as aforesaid, was unable to comply with, and did not comply with the terms of said escrow on or before July 3rd, 1924, by reason of plaintiff's said default; and in addition thereto, plaintiff allowed and suffered several mechanics' liens, attachments and other instruments affecting the title to said real property to be filed and recorded. That on July 5th, 1924, * * * defendants declared the said agreement to purchase terminated and at an end, and in accordance with the terms of their said escrow instructions, as approved by plaintiff, demanded in writing of the Title Insurance & Trust Company, the return to them of the deed theretofore executed and delivered into said escrow, and on said date the said deed was returned and delivered to defendants.
> "That at all times during the life of said agreement * * * defendants were ready, able and willing to perform, and did perform, all the terms, conditions and requirements of said agreement for sale by them to be performed, and performed and complied with all the terms and requirements of the said escrow, * * * and acted in good faith throughout the entire transaction."

[1] The court further found that—

> "Plaintiff entered into contracts with prospective purchasers for the sale of lots in said tract, and for the erection of houses and furnishing the same, and collected large sums of money from such purchasers, a portion of which sums so collected was used in the construction of houses and other improvements upon the property of these defendants; that no money of the plaintiff was used either in paying the purchase price of the property to the defendants or in placing the improvements upon said property, except such as was collected from the purchasers of lots in the proposed tract, with the exception of the sum of $1,500. * * * That the officers and promoters of the plaintiff corporation also withdrew from the moneys received by plaintiff from purchasers of lots sums aggregating in excess of $7,000, and used the same for their own purposes."

Appellant attacks this last finding on the ground that it is "directly opposed to the statement of the defendant Berry" to the effect that he had received certain moneys from the plaintiff. There appears to be no inconsistency between the statement and the finding, because the moneys paid to Berry may have been received by plaintiff from the sale of lots, but the finding need not be further considered, as the other findings, which are fully justified by the evidence, are sufficient to support the judgment.

[2-4] It is contended that the finding that the "plaintiff agreed to pay the Culler trust deed is contrary to the evidence, in that it appears from the escrow agreement * * * that the plaintiff herein was to take the land subject thereto." The defendant Thomas Berry testified that the plaintiff promised to make the payment promptly which was to become due June 11, and there is no contention that plaintiff paid the same at any time or tendered the defendants the amount they were compelled to pay on account of the plaintiff's failure in this respect.

> "It is well settled by the authorities that an agreement to assume and pay a mortgage is not inconsistent with a deed reciting that the property is granted subject to a mortgage. Consequently such an agreement may be shown by parol evidence." White v. Schader, 185 Cal. 606, 607, 198 P. 19 (21 A. L. R. 499).

The plaintiff is in no position to complain that the finding in question is not supported by the evidence, because the complaint alleges that it agreed to take the land subject "to the unpaid balance of $6,000 principal of a trust deed for $8.500 * * * which was then an incumbrance on said land which plaintiff assumed and agreed to pay to the extent of the unpaid balance of $6,000." The answer of the defendants also alleges that the plaintiff agreed to pay this unpaid balance. Any finding contrary to a fact alleged by both parties would be of no effect. Welch v. Alcott, 185 Cal. 731, 754, 198 P. 626; Coulter Dry Goods Co. v. Wentworth, 171 Cal. 500, 507, 153 P. 939; Robison v. Mitchel, 159 Cal. 581, 591, 114 P. 984; De Leonis v. Walsh, 140 Cal. 175, 182, 73 P. 813; Gamache v. South School District, 133 Cal. 145, 147, 65 P. 301.

[5] Prompt payment of the installments as they fell due under the Culler trust deed was necessary for the protection of the defendants' title. Plaintiff not only failed to make payment thereof but failed to reimburse defendants for the payment made by them or to deposit the amount thereof in escrow. Under such circumstances, the defendants were not required to proceed further.

[6] The defendant Thomas Berry testified that on July 3d Moore said "he couldn't give the trust deed with a clear title on account of the liens and attachments," and that, later in the day, "he said he believed he would have to let the thing go." The foregoing evidence, read in the light of the plaintiff's repeated failures to comply with the terms of the contract, as they were modified from time to time, fully warrants the finding that the Title Insurance & Trust Company was unable to comply with the terms of the escrow by reason of the plaintiff's default.

[7] Appellant contends that Mr. Berry prevented it from successfully carrying out its sales campaign by disparaging its good faith and financial standing in his conversations with purchasers of lots; "that he then and there intended to prevent the plaintiff realizing on its option contracts, and made every possible effort to frustrate its sales campaign." Plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show the truth of this charge, but the defendant Berry contradicted such evidence in so far as it tended to prove him in fault, and the court found against the contention. It may be said further that the complaint presents no such issue.

Other points made by the appellant are not deemed of sufficient merit to require discussion. It clearly appears from the evidence that the plaintiff had embarked upon an undertaking which it was financially unable to carry out, and, by reason of its failure to comply with the terms of the contract between the parties, the defendants rightfully refused further extensions of time.

The judgment is affirmed.

NITTLER et al. v. CONTINENTAL CASUALTY CO. et al. (Civ. 6375.)

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 24, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1170(3)—Error in rulings on pleadings must have resulted in miscarriage of justice to warrant reversal (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

To secure reversal on appeal for error of court in rulings in pleadings, party must, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, show that error resulted in miscarriage of justice.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1170(3)—Appellate court may rest its decision on findings, where defects in complaint have been cured and defendant proceeded to trial after overruling of demurrer (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Where defendant, after overruling of demurrer to complaint, proceeded to trial, and findings disclose that alleged infirmities of complaint have been cured, appellate court may, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, rest its decision on the findings.

3. Appeal and error 🔑835(2)—Claim that recovery on real estate broker's bond should be limited to amount received for leasehold interest could not be considered on rehearing, where point previously presented was that there was no sale of real estate.

Claim that recovery on real estate broker's bond should be limited to amount received for exchanged leasehold interest, which was traded, together with gasoline station, could not be considered on rehearing, where there was no evidence of separate value of the lease, and the point raised on the original hearing on appeal was that the value of the leasehold interest was only nominal, so that there was not a sale of real estate.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

4. Appeal and error 🔑835(2)—Point first raised in petition for rehearing need not be considered.

District Court of Appeal is not required to consider a point raised for the first time in the petition for rehearing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

On petition for rehearing. Petition denied. For original opinion, see 271 P. 555.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Stanley Sterne, of Oakland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] In appellant's petition for a rehearing, and in the brief of amicus curiæ in support thereof, criticism is made of the opinion heretofore filed herein on the matter of the demurrer to the complaint. It is argued that the complaint was demurrable, because it failed to allege that the broker was acting for a compensation, or that the money was received as a result of a real estate transaction. We are inclined to the same view, and, if we had been sitting in the trial court, we would probably have sustained the demurrer and required an amendment of the complaint. But when the point is raised on appeal, after answer and trial, this court is in a different position from what the trial court was in at the time of the ruling on the demurrer. Here it is necessary for the appellant to show that "the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." Section 4½, art. 6, Constitution. And, before we can reverse a case because of such claimed error, we must be satisfied that it has resulted in a miscarriage of justice after we have examined the entire cause, including the evidence. When, therefore, the defendant has answered and gone to trial after his demurrer has been overruled, and the findings of fact disclose that the alleged infirmities of the complaint have been cured, we may rest our decision on the findings, particularly where, as here, the appellant has failed to show that the evidence was not received without objection.

[3, 4] It is also argued that, in any event, the recovery on the bond should be limited to the amount received for the exchange of the leasehold interest. But the appellant has not shown that the issue was raised in the trial court. It has been raised here for the first time in this petition for a rehearing. The point argued in the briefs was that the value of the leasehold interest was so small that the entire transaction should be deemed to have been a sale of the personalty, and not a real estate sale under the act. The respondent testified that he inventoried the personalty at $1,300. The total sale price was $1,700. We took the view, on the point raised, that the value of the lease was substantial, and brought the transaction under the act. But there was no evidence on the value of the lease because the matter was not put in issue. We are not required to consider a point raised for the first time in a petition for rehearing.

The petition is denied.

YOUNG v. LO PRESTI. (Civ. 3471.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 20, 1928.

1. Account stated 🔑19(3)—Evidence of former transaction between parties held sufficient to establish basis for new obligation represented by account stated.

In action on account stated, evidence of former transactions between parties held sufficient to establish basis for new obligation represented by account sued on.

2. Account stated 🔑19(3)—Transactions between parties, from which relation of debtor and creditor has arisen, and mutual assent that specific amount which debtor expressly or impliedly agrees to pay is due, is sufficient proof of account stated.

All that is required in proof of an account stated is that transactions have occurred between parties from which relation of debtor and creditor has arisen, and that they have assented that specific amount is due which debtor by express or implied promise agrees to pay.

3. Account stated 🔑8—Items of original accounts are not proper subject of inquiry in action on account stated.

Items of original accounts are not proper subject of inquiry in action on account stated.

4. Account stated 🔑5—Promise to pay on future contingency, coupled with acknowledgment of definite and subsisting indebtedness, is sufficient to establish account stated.

Promise to pay need not be absolute or unconditional to give rise to account stated; promise to pay on some future contingency being sufficient if coupled with acknowledgment of definite and subsisting indebtedness.

5. Account stated 🔑19(3)—Evidence of admission of specific sum due, failure to deny indebtedness therefor, and statement of desire to pay it though without money at time, held to establish account stated.

Evidence of defendant's admission that he owed specific sum sued for, his receipt of letter claiming such amount to be due from him, his failure to deny that he owed such sum in discussing account and letter with plaintiff's agent, and statement that he would like to pay it though he did not have money at that time, held sufficient to establish account stated on which right of action accrued when conditions extending time of payment failed through no fault of plaintiff.

6. Account stated 🔑5—Fruit grower's reference to possible credit of freight rebates which marketing corporation undertook to collect for him held not to affect latter's right to recover on account stated for moneys advanced.

Fruit grower's statement to marketing corporation's agent that he would like to have payment of his debt for advances go over to next season's business, and that any amount due from the railroad on claim for freight rebates would lessen amount owed, since marketing corporation was attempting to collect it for him, left no uncertainty as to amount due barring recovery on account stated; such claim being mere chose in action in which corporation was not concerned.

7. Account stated 🔑6(1)—Failure to deny amount claimed to be due within reasonable time may constitute "affirmance" of claim establishing account stated.

Failure to deny amount claimed to be due within reasonable time may constitute "affirmance" of claim and thereby become account stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second and Third Series, Affirmance.]

8. Account stated 🔑18(2)—Variance between allegation of complaint and evidence as to when account was stated held not fatal.

Variance between allegation of complaint that stated account occurred on or about November 19, and evidence that letter claiming amount was mailed December 9, and that amount was specifically acknowledged in following January, held not fatal, where there was no controversy over mere question as to date of agreement and no items of account were incurred after date alleged in complaint; mere date of agreed account being immaterial.

9. Appeal and error 🔑1039(13)—Variance between pleading and proof as to immaterial date of transaction is not prejudicial or reversible error.

When the mere date of a transaction is not material, variance in proof in that regard is neither prejudicial nor reversible error.

10. Account stated 🔑19(3)—Failure to show agreement on first of two dates found by court was immaterial, in action on account stated, where evidence supported finding as to later date.

Where court found that account was stated "on or about the 19th day of November, 1925, and in the month of January, 1926," and evidence showed that agreement occurred in early part of January, 1926, failure to show such agreement on November 19, 1925, was immaterial.

11. Appeal and error 🔑1039(13)—Cause will not be reversed for immaterial discrepancy between pleadings and findings as to mere date of transaction.

Cause will not be reversed for an immaterial discrepancy between pleadings and the findings as to the mere date of a transaction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by Alex J. Young, Jr., against G. Lo Presti. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Barcroft & Barcroft, of Madera, for appellant.

Heller, Ehrman, White & McAuliffe, of San Francisco, for respondent.

R. L. THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an action upon an account stated. The defendant appealed from a judgment of $660.67 in favor of the plaintiff.

Dennis, Kimball & Pope, Inc., of the state of New York, is a fruit-marketing corporation. In October, 1925, through its California agent, this corporation advanced $1,750 to the appellant to harvest and market his grape crop. Pursuant to agreement, six cars of grapes were shipped to this company on consignment, and sold in the New York market for the account of appellant. The complaint alleges that "on or about the 19th day of November, 1925, * * * an account was stated between Dennis, Kimball & Pope, Inc., and the defendant," in which statement it was agreed between the parties that a balance of $660.67 was due the corporation, no part of which had been paid. This account was assigned to the respondent. In proof of the stated account, Mr. Barr, the local agent of the marketing corporation, testified that on December 9, 1925, he wrote a letter to the appellant inclosing his account, together with bills of lading, which letter concluded with this language: "Also statement of your account showing a balance due us of $660.67. * * *" The witness said that in January, 1926, just after the first of the year, he visited the appellant, and he testified:

> "We discussed the deficiency that was owing to the company, * * * and he mentioned that he would like to pay although he did not have the money at that time, but he would like to carry it over until the following season, when he would make a contract with us to ship fruit to offset the balance. * * * He said that he would like to allow that to go over to next season's business, and if there was any amount of money due from the railroad on the claim, that that would also tend to lessen the amount that was owing us."

The court said:

> "Q. As I understand you, * * * Mr. Presti * * * asked that you allow the $660.67 to be carried over and applied on his account for the following year, and also the adjustment of the freight charges, and you agreed to that, did you? A. Yes sir."

No fruit was shipped from the appellant to the marketing corporation the following year. No freight rebates were ever paid on account of appellant's claim. There is no evidence that any such claims are due. From these facts the court found that "on or about the 19th day of November, 1925, and in the month of January, 1926, * * *" an account was stated between the parties, and an agreement reached that the sum of $660.67 was due from the appellant. Judgment was thereupon rendered for that sum.

The appellant contends that the findings and judgment are not supported by the evidence, for the reason that (1) there is no proof of prior indebtedness; that (2) there was no admission of indebtedness of a specific sum since certain rebates of freight charges were unsettled; and (3) there is a variance between the pleadings and the evidence respecting the date upon which the balance of account was alleged to have been admitted.

[1-4] The record contains evidence of former transactions between the parties sufficient to establish a basis for the new obligation represented by the account stated. Mr. Justice Shaw, in Bennett v. Potter, 180 Cal. 736, 183 P. 156, says that all that is required in proof of an account stated is "that transactions have occurred between the parties from which the relation of debtor and creditor has arisen," and that it is assented between the parties that a specific amount is due, which sum the debtor by either express or implied promise, agrees to pay. 1 C. J. 698, § 304; Auzerais v. Naglee, 74 Cal. 60, 15 P. 371. In the case of Partridge v. Butler, 113 Cal. 326, 45 P. 678, Mr. Justice Henshaw says:

> "In an action upon an account stated these averments" concerning the nature of the original contract "would have no proper place. An account stated is a mere acknowledgment of the amount of an existing liability between the parties. From it, the law implies a promise to pay the admitted amount. Thereby arises a new and independent cause of action so far that a recovery may be had without setting forth or proving the original contract or accounts, or the separate items of liability from which the balance results."

The items of the original accounts are not proper subject of inquiry upon an action for an account stated. 1 Cal. Jur. 203, § 58; 1 R. C. L. 219, § 19; Gardner v. Watson, 170 Cal. 570, 150 P. 994. "The promise to pay need not be absolute or unconditional; a promise to pay upon some future contingency is sufficient if coupled with an acknowledgment of a definite and subsisting indebtedness." 1 C. J. 698, § 302. In the present case the evidence of appellant's admission that he owed the specific sum of $660.67 is sufficiently definite. In December, 1925, he received a letter in which it was claimed that this amount was due from him. The following month the agent of the marketing corporation visited him, and, in discussing this account and the letter mentioning the specific balance, he did not deny that he owed the sum stated. Upon the contrary, he said: "He would like to pay (it) although he did not have the money at that time." This is a definite acknowledgment that he owed that specific sum, coupled with a request to extend the time for payment. The conditions extending the time of payment failed through no fault of respondent, and the right of action upon the account stated then accrued.

[5] The appellant, however, contends that there was no agreement to pay a specific sum, for the reason that there was a reservation on his part to the effect that he was to obtain credit for an unsettled claim for rebate of freight charges. But the marketing corporation did not owe this claim for rebate of freight charges. If any such valid claim existed, that was an obligation due the appellant from the railroad company, with which the respondent was not concerned, except that, after the balance of the indebtedness had been agreed upon between the parties, as a matter of accommodation, the agent suggested that this claim might be collected through their claim department. The collection of this claim in no way affected the amount which was due to respondent. It was a mere chose in action for the claim of appellant against the transportation company, in which the respondent was not concerned. There was not even a definite statement on the part of appellant that it was due. After tacitly agreeing to the amount which he admitted was due the respondent, and requesting a delay in the payment thereof, the appellant suggested that, if the marketing company succeeded in collecting anything on his claim for a rebate of freight charges, that sum might be credited on the amount which was due from him. Mr. Barr testified that the appellant said he would like to have the payment of his debt "go over to next season's business, and if there was any amount due from the railroad on the claim," that would tend to lessen the amount of money he owed, since respondent was attempting to collect it for him. So far as the evidence discloses, no such freight charges were ever allowed or paid up to the time of the trial of this cause in February, 1927. Mr. Barr had no knowledge of the validity of this claim, or of the prospect of collecting it. He was no longer employed with the marketing company. The freight claim had nothing to do with the account between appellant and respondent. In response to the statement that this claim was to be credited on the balance due from the appellant, Mr. Barr testified:

> "Q. What did you say in response to that, * * * A. I said we would receive all those papers and send them back east; that we had a claim department and would look after those things for him."

The only evidence with respect to the payment of the freight claim was the following testimony of the same witness:

"Q. Those freight charges are still pending undetermined, aren't they? A. I haven't heard from them regarding the claims. Q. So far as you know, they are still undetermined? A. Yes sir. * * * (but) I am no longer with Dennis, Kimball & Pope Company—in fact, I haven't been with them for over a year."

From the foregoing record it appears those freight claims were remote, uncertain, and in no way connected with the account which was due from appellant to respondent. Reference to this claim, and the effort to collect it through respondent's claim department, therefore, left no uncertainty regarding the amount which was due.

[6-8] Finally, the appellant contends there was a fatal variance between the allegations of the pleadings as to the exact date of the alleged stated account and the proof. The complaint did allege that the stated account occurred "on or about the 19th day of November, 1925." The letter containing the amount claimed by respondent to have been due was mailed to appellant December 9, 1925. Failure to deny the amount claimed to have been due, within a reasonable time, might constitute an affirmance of the claim and thereby become an account stated. 1 Cal. Jur. 195, § 54; 1 R. C. L. 213, § 12. The conference occurred between the parties in the early part of January, 1926, at which time the amount claimed by respondent was specifically acknowledged. At the trial there was no controversy over the mere question as to the date of the agreement. There were no items of the account incurred subsequent to the date of the stated account alleged in the complaint. Under the circumstances of this case, the mere date of the agreed account is not material. When the mere date of a transaction is not material, the variance in proof in that regard is neither prejudicial nor reversible error. Amador Gold Mine v. Amador Gold Mine, 114 Cal. 346, 46 P. 80; Bancroft Co. v. Haslett, 106 Cal. 151, 39 P. 602; Thomas v. Jameson, 77 Cal. 91, 19 P. 177; Biven v. Bostwick, 70 Cal. 639, 11 P. 790; Atwood v. So. Cal. Ice Co., 63 Cal. App. 343, 346, 218 P. 283.

[9-11] When the variance is not material, the trial court may direct findings in accordance with the proof as to the fact. Section 470, Code Civ. Proc. This the court did in the present case. The court found that, "on or about the 19th day of November, 1925, and in the month of January 1926," the account was stated between the parties. The evidence fails to show such an agreement on November 19, 1925, but this is immaterial, provided there was also another subsequent agreement as to the same amount due. The evidence does support the finding that this agreement occurred "in the early part of January, 1926." This is sufficiently accurate for the purposes of this cause, and supports the findings and judgment. A cause will not be reversed for an immaterial discrepancy between the pleadings and the findings as to the mere date of a transaction. Thomas v. Jameson, supra.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

TEATER v. JOHNSON et al. (Civ. 3632.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 26, 1928.

1. Taxation ⚿810(3)—Evidence held sufficient to support finding that no notice of tax sale was sent to owner of portion of land (Pol. Code, § 3897).

Evidence held sufficient to support finding that no notice of tax sale, which under Pol. Code, § 3897, was jurisdictional prerequisite to valid sale, was sent to owner of part of land sold.

2. Taxation ⚿341—Inclusion in assessment of two lots not belonging to owner of land assessed rendered entire assessment void.

Inclusion in tax assessment against owner of remainder of quarter section of two lots, containing 24.05 acres of land, not belonging to him, rendered entire assessment void.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by M. M. Teater against Hope Miller Johnson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Wilson & Snow, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant, Hope Miller Johnson, has appealed from the judgment herein, quieting plaintiff's title to the northwest quarter of section 15, township 5 south, range 4 west, San Bernardino base and meridian, excepting lots 37 and 38 in said quarter section, said lots containing 24.05 acres of land.

Appellant claims title under a tax deed executed pursuant to a sale of the land in the year 1919 for nonpayment of the second installment of taxes levied in 1912. In the year 1912 H. L. Carnahan was the owner of the land in controversy, but he was not the owner of lots 37 and 38. The land was last assessed next before the sale to William Collier. The court found:

"That for the year 1912, the whole of the said northwest quarter of section fifteen was assessed to the said H. L. Carnahan. That said assessment was for more land than was owned by the said H. L. Carnahan and placed upon him an additional burden of taxation and subsequently an additional burden of redemption as to the amount of land which he did not own, but with which he was assessed, viz. 24.05 acres. That no notice of the time and place of the said sale of July 26, 1919, was given to the said William Collier, the then assessed owner of said property and the person entitled to receive the same."

[1] The only conflict in the evidence bearing upon the facts so found relates to the finding that notice was not given to Collier. In that connection, the tax collector testified:

> "My name is C. R. Stibbens. I am the county tax collector of the county of Riverside. I was such county tax collector in the year 1912 as well as at all times subsequently thereto. I caused a copy of the published notice of sale for nonpayment of taxes for the year 1912 on the property involved in this action, postage thereon prepaid, and registered, to be mailed to Hook Bros. at Perris, California. I mailed only one notice with respect to this land. This was by registered mail and I demanded a return receipt therefor. (Whereupon witness produced from his files and records post office return receipt No. 120.) I identify the post office return receipt for the notice so mailed, No. 120, which is in my file pertaining to this sale."

Such return was introduced in evidence and marked Plaintiff's Exhibit B. It was signed "Hook Bros.," by "J. F. Hook." On cross-examination the witness testified:

> "I testified on direct examination that I mailed only one notice of sale and that was to Hook Bros. By referring to the public records in the county assessor's office of the county of Riverside I find that the northwest quarter of said section 15, the property sold, was last assessed next before said sale in the name of William Collier, and not to Hook Bros. I do not know why Plaintiff's Exhibit B is in my file pertaining to the sale of the northwest quarter of said section 15. I do not find the return registry receipt for the notice sent by registered mail to Mr. Collier, but I know the notice was sent by registered mail, postage prepaid, and it was sent to William Collier, Perris, California. * * * I must have done so in this case, * * * but do not know whether I received any return receipt or not. My custom has always been to file the return receipt with the file pertaining to the tax sale proceedings. * * * Either no such receipt came back from Mr. Collier or else it was placed in the wrong file."

On redirect examination the witness testified:

> "I have no positive recollection of mailing any notice to Mr. Collier and the only reason I testified that I must have done so is that I always mail these notices to the last assessed owner next before the sale. Any notice that I might have sent to Mr. Collier in connection with this property would be enclosed in the same kind of an envelope as the one in which the notice to Hook Bros. was enclosed and it would have the same printed directions, to-wit: 'Return in 5 days to C. R. Stibbens, Tax Collector.'"

It cannot be said as a matter of law that the foregoing evidence is insufficient to support the finding that no notice of sale was sent to Collier. Such notice was a jurisdictional prerequisite to a valid sale by the state. Pol. Code, § 3897; Healton v. Morrison, 162 Cal. 668, 670, 124 P. 240; Joslin v. Shaffer, 66 Cal. App. 69, 72, 225 P. 307.

[2] Since lots 37 and 38 were included in the assessment to Carnahan of the northwest quarter of section 15, the trial court was justified in drawing the inference that Carnahan's assessment was increased in amount by reason of the inclusion of the 24.05 acres of land which did not belong to him. The assessment of lots 37 and 38 was so blended with the assessment of the remainder of the quarter section as to render the entire assessment void. San Pedro, etc., R. Co. v. Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 18, 27, 179 P. 393.

The judgment is affirmed.

LINDSAY v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 26, 1928.

Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence on length of division line between lots in disputed boundary case was conclusive on appellate court.

Trial court's finding upon conflicting evidence regarding length of division line between lots, in action to establish boundaries, was conclusive on appellate court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action to establish boundaries of certain property and for damages for a trespass, by Robert J. Lindsay against the City of Los Angeles. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wilson & Snow, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jess E. Stephens, Herman Mohr, Wm. H. Neal, and Milton Bryan, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff, Robert J. Lindsay, brought this action against the city of Los Angeles, to establish the boundaries of certain property owned by him in the city of Los Angeles, and also for damages for an alleged trespass thereon.

The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, city of Los Angeles. From this judgment, the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The plaintiff and appellant is the owner of certain real property in the city of Los Angeles particularly described as lots 10 and 11 of "Fellowship Heights Tract No. 2," according to the official map of said tract, recorded in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county. On September 24, 1906, the city counsel of the city of Los Angeles accepted and approved a map of said "Fellowship Heights Tract No. 2," which showed thereon certain streets, including one known as "Fellowship Park Way." This street is 10 feet wide and was dedicated for public use according to said official map and accepted by the city of Los Angeles on or about September 25, 1906.

The controversy in this action is over the northerly boundary line of "Fellowship Park Way," which is also the southerly boundary, or property line, of appellant's property.

About 20 years after the city accepted the dedication of said "Fellowship Park Way," the engineers for the city of Los Angeles made a survey of said street preliminary to letting a contract for the improvement of the same, and discovered that appellant had constructed a stone wall extending into said street a distance of more than 2 feet from the northerly boundary thereof, and a fence extending in both directions from the southerly end of said stone wall in said street the full length of appellant's property.

The exact location of the boundary line between said street and said lots 10 and 11 is the precise question involved in this appeal; appellant contending that the fence which he constructed south of his property correctly marks said boundary line, while the city maintains, and the court found, that said fence is entirely within said street.

The appellant contends that the court erred in finding that the respondent's survey correctly established the northerly boundary of said street (Fellowship Park Way). This contention rests solely upon the accuracy of the indicated length of the division line between said lots 10 and 11, as appears on the recorded map of said "Fellowship Heights Tract No. 2," a copy of which map was received in evidence. The recorded map discloses that the division line between said lots 10 and 11 is marked thereon as "40.00," indicating that it is 40 feet in length. It appears that appellant relied upon the accuracy of said indicated length of said line, as measured from the northerly exterior boundary of said subdivision, and constructed his fence 40 feet southerly from said point in said northerly exterior boundary line; said fence extending in both directions therefrom.

There is abundant evidence in the record to support the court's findings that the indicated length of said division line between lots 10 and 11 is erroneous and that said division line is approximately 37 feet in length, and not 40 feet as indicated on the map.

The only evidence that appellant introduced in support of his contention that said division line between lots 10 and 11 is 40 feet in length was the figures "40.00" marked beside said line on said recorded map.

That this line is only approximately 37 feet in length seems to be almost conclusively established by other established bearings and distances constituting a complete survey of "Fellowship Heights Tract No. 2," of which appellant's property is a part, and also by the testimony of surveyors who actually made the survey of the street in dispute. We think therefore that the court was amply justified in finding that the division line between said lots 10 and 11 is approximately 37 feet, and that appellant's wall and fence are both within the street.

This case, in its last analysis, presents only a conflict in the evidence, and the findings of the trial court upon conflicting evidence are conclusive upon this court.

The judgment is affirmed.

LINNARD v. SONNENSCHEIN et al.★
(Civ. No. 6411.)

Rehearing Denied Dec. 10, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 7, 1929.

1. Appeal and error 🔑989—Trial court having found against defendants in action for unlawful detainer on certain issue, appellate court need only determine whether record contains substantial supporting evidence.

Where the trial court had found against defendants in action for unlawful detainer on issue of whether defendants had equitable lease, it is only necessary for appellate court to determine whether there is any substantial evidence in the record to support the finding.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑22(2)—It being understood that lease was to be reduced to writing and signed by parties, where such was never done, parties were not obligated.

Where it was understood between lessor and lessee that a lease was to be reduced to writing and signed by parties, and such was never done, held, that none of the parties were obligated thereunder.

A waiver will be presumed or implied contrary to the intention of the party, if, by his conduct, the opposing party has been misled to his prejudice into the honest belief that such waiver was intended.

10. Landlord and tenant 🔑291(13)—Evidence in unlawful detainer held to support finding that landlord did not intend waiver of notice to quit by accepting rent money.

In action by landlord for unlawful detainer of premises by tenant after having been given notice to surrender possession, where defendant was tenant at will, evidence held to support finding that the landlord did not intend a waiver of notice to quit by acceptance of rent from tenant, which was less than rent as demanded by landlord, where the rent accepted had no condition attached to it providing that it was full payment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by D. M. Linnard against S. Sonnenschein and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John Ralph Wilson, of San Francisco, and Huston, Huston & Huston, of Woodland, for appellants.

Sawyer & Cluff, of San Francisco, and William O'Brien, of Pasadena, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This appeal is from a judgment entered in favor of plaintiff and against defendants in an action in unlawful detainer.

On September 1, 1923, the plaintiff was in possession of the whole of the Whitcomb Hotel building in San Francisco under a lease for a term of years from the owner thereof. On that date the defendants entered into possession of one of the stores on the ground floor of such hotel building as subtenants of plaintiff, and continued in possession until ousted by the sheriff under judgment rendered in this proceeding in August, 1927. From the time of their entry as subtenants until May 1, 1926, the defendants paid to plaintiff as rent for the premises $100 a month and varying additional sums, being 5 per cent. of their reported sales. On March 29, 1926, the defendants were served with a notice changing the terms of the tenancy on and after May 1, 1926, and fixing the rent at $300 per month. On November 1, 1926, according to plaintiff's contention, the defendants were in default under this increased rent in the sum of $900 or thereabouts. The usual notice to quit and surrender the premises was served and ignored by defendants, who remained in possession of the premises.

The defendants admit the service of two notices, but set up as an affirmative defense that defendants entered into and remained in possession of the premises under a lease from plaintiff commencing on September 1, 1923, for five years and four months at a rental of $100 per month, plus 5 per cent. of the gross sales made by defendants from their store. The lease was pleaded in accordance with its legal effect, and it was not alleged whether it was oral or in writing. At the trial, however, it developed that the lease had never been reduced to writing, defendants contending that there had been an oral lease for five years, arranged for in conversation between plaintiff and the defendant Samuel Sonnenschein prior to the entry in 1923, and that the subsequent entry and possession of the defendants under this oral agreement was sufficient to bring the case under the rule announced in Schubert v. Lowe, 193 Cal. 291, 223 P. 550, and that the oral lease might be shown in defense of an action in unlawful detainer despite the statute of frauds. The answer alleges a number of covenants as part of the lease, including the right of plaintiff to examine defendants' books; covenants regulating assignment and underletting; entry by landlord, and that it was agreed that defendants should have the right to bid on any work in their line of business during the term of the lease that plaintiff might have in connection with the Fairmont and Whitcomb Hotels and that they should be awarded the work, if their bid was at the same price as that of any other bona fide bidder.

Two questions are involved: One, whether defendants were tenants at will, as found by the court; and, the other, did plaintiff by the acceptance of rent under the terms existing prior to the service of the notice changing the terms of the tenancy, and also after the notice to quit, waive his rights under the notices?

[1] The case of Schubert v. Lowe, supra, is authority for the position of appellants that an action of unlawful detainer partakes of an equitable suit for a forfeiture, and therefore it is proper to consider the occupation of the premises by a defendant under an oral agreement to lease as an equitable defense. The trial court, however, having found against defendants on this issue of the equitable lease, it is only necessary for us to determine whether there is any substantial evidence in the record to support the court's finding.

The testimony of Samuel Sonnenschein is that he called upon plaintiff in December, 1922, and asked for space in the Whitcomb Hotel, which was then being renovated, and offered as rent 5 per cent. of his gross sales. This offer was rejected by plaintiff as not sufficient. Sonnenschein then offered $100 per month and 5 per cent. of the sales, which was satisfactory to plaintiff, and it was agreed that the lease should run for five years. Plaintiff then referred Sonnenschein to Mr. Vail, his manager, to examine the stock and arrange details. There was also to be a glass partition between the store and the hotel lobby. There followed another conversation between Sonnenschein and plaintiff, wherein it was agreed that the proposed lease should be for five years from the time the store was ready for occupancy, and there was a discussion as to giving defendants an opportunity to figure on work in their line for the two hotels operated by plaintiff, namely, the Whitcomb and the Fairmont. In respect to the proposed lease itself, plaintiff refused to discuss the details, referring Sonnenschein to his manager, Mr. Vail; his attorney, Mr. O'Brien, and his superintendent, Mr. Mason.

Appellants rely on the case of Levin v. Saroff, 54 Cal. App. 289, 201 P. 961, wherein the elements of a valid lease are enumerated as: (1) A sufficient description of the premises; (2) a definite and agreed term; (3) an agreed rental; and (4) the time and manner of payment. It is urged that these elements were agreed upon in the conversations between Sonnenschein and plaintiff, and that no dispute arose as to the agreed terms until after the entry on September 1, 1923. True, the terms were discussed and the rent fixed at $100 per month and 5 per cent. of the gross receipts, but the time and manner of the payment of this 5 per cent. had not been discussed or considered at all—it was not decided whether it was to be paid monthly, annually, or otherwise. Furthermore, the evidence shows that the parties did not intend that their agreement should be confined to the bare essentials of a lease. The proposed agreement was to cover more than merely premises, terms, and rent. At these conversations the parties had discussed some of the essentials and details of the proposed lease, but the final details were to be worked out with plaintiff's subordinates, and when the details were finally agreed to, the agreement or lease was to be reduced to writing and signed by the parties. On the question of the lease being reduced to writing, Mr. Sonnenschein testified:

> "Q. You know you told me you were very anxious about five or six things, a number of clauses; you have set forth a number of clauses here (referring to the answer), and in the clauses you have set forth, I find there is a clause in reference—that you agreed not to assign the lease or let or underlet it. When was that agreed to? A. That was agreed—one second the time I had—
> "Q. When? A. —the conversation with him in the Fairmont, after December, 1923.
> "Q. After December, 1923? A. Yes.
> "Q. In other words, after you moved into the store? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. All right. Now, then, I find an agreement here to the effect that you would not use or keep on the premises any articles that the insurance companies might consider dangerous? A. Mr. O'Brien wrote that down.
> "Q. Then this was not agreed to when you moved in? A. It was a regular form of lease, to protect Mr. Linnard.
> "Q. Exactly—and you considered or contemplated at the time you made the agreement that you gentlemen would change—draw a full lease, containing the usual covenants and conditions, and have that lease signed; wasn't that a fact? A. No, I expected him to give me a fifty-fifty lease.
> "Q. You expected a lease, and you expected him to draw it? A. Yes."

Mr. O'Brien, attorney for Linnard, testified that he prepared a lease for Mr. Linnard in April, 1923, and that he presented it to Mr. Sonnenschein, but that it was never signed by either party; that he had several subsequent conversations with Mr. Sonnenschein with reference to the proposed lease. After Sonnenschein moved into the store he had conversations with Mr. Huston, the attorney representing Sonnenschein, negotiating with relation to the lease, which negotiations continued down to 1926, and that the lease was never executed.

[2] We find the situation presented then to be that the parties agreed in the main to the provisions of the lease, but not as to all of its details and conditions, which lease it was understood was to be reduced to writing and signed by the parties, and, never having been so reduced to writing and signed by the parties as contemplated, it never became a binding and subsisting obligation upon either. As was said in Spinney v. Downing, 108 Cal. 666, 41 P. 797:

> "It is a general rule to which this case presents no exception that, when it is a part of the understanding between the parties that the terms of their contract are to be reduced to writing and signed by the parties, the assent to its terms must be evidenced in the manner agreed upon, or it does not become a binding or completed contract. This is essentially true when, as here, the proposed contract contains reciprocal stipulations and covenants upon the part of each as a consideration for the acts of the other (Ambler v Whipple, 20 Wall. 546 [22 L. Ed. 403]; Fuller v. Reed, 38 Cal. 99; Morrill v. Tehama, etc., Co., 10 Nev. 125)."

Here we have the reciprocal agreement on the part of the tenant to award to the subtenants the work in their line, if their bid be the same as that of any other bona fide bidder.

Aside from the fact that the written lease was never executed, the evidence supports respondent's contention that the terms of the lease were not agreed upon prior to appellant's entry on September 1, 1923. The witness O'Brien, employed by respondent to draft the lease, testified that the lease form had been presented shortly after the conversation of April 27, 1923, and long before the entry. "Q. What was it; do you recall the subject of that discussion? A. Well, the principal subject of discussion was whether he (Sonnenschein) should pay $100.00 plus five per cent. of the sales of the Market Street store alone, which he claimed was his arrangement with Mr. Linnard, or whether he should pay five per cent. on the sales both in the Market Street store and in the factory"—showing that there was a dispute as to what gross sales of the 5 per cent. applied, which became apparent in April, 1923, and existed at the time of the entry.

After this conversation in April, O'Brien prepared and submitted a draft of the proposed lease. That he had acceded to Sonnenschein's request for a five year and four months term, but adhered to his proposition that the 5 per cent. should apply to both store and factory sales, is evident from the draft of the lease in evidence. When this draft of the lease was presented to Sonnenschein he said he would submit it to his attorney. In so far as the record shows, the entry was made without any further negotiations or conversations whatever.

[3, 4] When a tenant enters upon real property pending the completion of negotiations for a lease, he enters at his peril. True, the entry with the consent of the lessor creates the relation of landlord and tenant, but the tenancy is merely a tenancy at will. Thereafter, if the proposed lease is completed, the tenant holds under the lease, but if the lease is not accomplished, the holding is at will, which by the acceptance of rent may become a tenancy from month to month or from year to year. If the rent is paid monthly, the tenancy becomes one of month to month, or if it be agricultural land and the rent is paid annually, the tenancy is from year to year. Phelan v. Anderson, 118 Cal. 504, 50 P. 685; Carteri v. Roberts, 140 Cal. 164, 73 P. 818.

[5-8] The "waiver" defense urged is based upon the acceptance by plaintiff of various sums on account of the rent of the premises after the notice changing the terms of the tenancy and the notice to quit. Acceptance of rent after a notice changing a tenancy or after notice to quit does not necessarily operate to waive the notice. While the unconditional acceptance by a landlord of moneys as rent, which rent has accrued after the time the tenant should have surrendered possession, will constitute strong evidence of the landlord's waiver of the notice to quit, waiver always rests on intent, and is ever a question of fact. Alden v. Mayfield, 164 Cal. 6, 11, 127 P. 45. The rule as to the constituents of a valid waiver is quoted from Ruling Case Law (27 R. C. L. 908) in Craig v. White, 187 Cal. 489, 498, 202 P. 648, 652:

> "To constitute a waiver within the definitions given, it is essential that there be an existing right, benefit or advantage; a knowledge, actual or constructive, of its existence, and an intention to relinquish it. No man can be bound by a waiver of his rights, unless waiver is distinctly made, with full knowledge of the rights which he intends to waive; and the fact that he knows his rights, and intends to waive them."

So waiver cannot be predicated upon the fact of the acceptance of rent alone. The party relying on a waiver must plead and prove facts from which an actual intention to relinquish the right may be derived. This intention may be manifested by express agreement or by conduct. If conduct is relied upon, bona fide reliance upon such conduct must also appear.

On March 29, 1926, the notice changing the tenancy and increasing the rent was served. On May 21, 1926, defendants herein commenced an action in the superior court at San Francisco seeking the specific enforcement of the alleged oral lease contended for here and claiming damages. Subsequent to the filing of that suit appellants remitted checks and statements of sales in various amounts, purporting to cover rent for the months of June, July, August, and September, 1926. These checks were certified as they arrived by the Whitcomb Hotel auditor and were ultimately cashed. The notice to quit served on October 29, 1926, recited the notice changing the terms of the tenancy, gave credit for the various amounts received on account, and demanded payment of the balance due or the surrender of the premises.

[9, 10] It is true, as stated by appellants, that a waiver will be presumed or implied contrary to the intention of the party, if by his conduct the opposing party has been misled to his prejudice into the honest belief that such waiver was intended (Thompson v. Gorner, 4 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 609, 36 P. 434); but here, prior to the notice to quit, no condition was attached to the checks, the payments being made under appellants' claim of a verbal lease evidenced by their suit pending to enforce specific performance of such lease, which lease they were protecting from forfeiture by such payments, and such claim they had knowledge was disputed by respondent. On December 20, 1926, Sonnenschein Bros. wrote Linnard inclosing a check, stating that it was "in payment of rent for the month of December, 1926, under the original lease and agreement with you, and not under the terms or conditions stated in your letter of December 11th, 1926." The letter does not refer to the alleged waiver because of accepting prior checks, but states that the inclosed check was payment under the "original lease and agreement." Obviously, this referred to the claimed equitable lease then being asserted in the action for specific performance and which was being contested and disputed by Linnard. To this letter Linnard replied, stating that appellants were well aware that the terms and conditions under which they were in possession of the premises were then the subject of litigation. "You apparently admit that in any event you owe the amount for which your check was written, and I am quite willing to give you credit for that amount upon any sums which the court may find are due to me. If you are not contented that I shall accept the sum evidenced by this check without prejudice to the position previously taken by me in respect to your tenancy and the amount of rent due thereunder, kindly advise me." After having waited a week and receiving no reply, plaintiff cashed the check. On January 25, 1927, plaintiff received a check for $117, as rent for January, inclosed in a letter stating:

> "We do not wish to complicate this situation by any agreement that might be the subject of future controversy and for that reason we will continue to remit the rents as we have in the past in accordance with the terms of our lease and whether you accept them as such rests with you. We will not consent to any acceptance of these remittances upon any other terms."

The check inclosed in this letter, attaching a condition to its acceptance, was returned. Thereafter appellants deposited the monthly checks to Linnard's credit in the Humboldt Bank at San Francisco.

It is apparent that no waiver was intended by respondent, and it is equally apparent that appellants were not misled to their prejudice. Under the evidence the court manifestly could conclude that appellants were not misled, but that the payments were made to protect their rights under their asserted equitable lease. The finding, therefore, that respondent did not waive the notices, finds support in the evidence.

HIGGINSON v. HANDY. (Civ. 6557.) ★

Rehearing Denied Dec. 26, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 24, 1929.

Deeds ⚿208(1)—On question of delivery evidence held not to show that deed executed and recorded by grantor was purloined by grantee (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963).

Evidence held not to show that deed conveying realty to grantor's sister under his agreement to convey, and which deed was recorded by grantor, was not purloined by grantee, but was duly delivered, in view of presumption created by Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, that grantee's possession of deed was lawful.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by S. P. Higginson against Ada M. Handy. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant.

Myrick & Deering and Scott, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an action to quiet title. The plaintiff filed a complaint in the usual form, the defendant filed an answer denying the material allegations in the complaint and pleading certain affirmative matter, and a trial was had in the trial court before the court sitting without a jury. That court made findings in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The plaintiff claims that the findings are not sustained by the evidence, and in particular he objects to the finding "that plaintiff is not the owner of and seized in fee and entitled to the possession of those certain lots, * * *" in controversy; and he also makes the same contention regarding the finding "that defendant claims and has a right, title, and interest in and to said property. * * *" These contentions involve a consideration of the following facts:

The plaintiff and defendant are brother and sister. Their mother died intestate, leaving an estate including, among other things, two lots located in San Francisco. Her estate was not administered upon. On April 18, 1906, the plaintiff was residing in San Francisco, and the defendant was residing at Seattle. At the same time they had an aunt, Mrs. E. E. Curry, residing on her farm near Lodi. That farm included 400 acres planted to grapes and the farm was valued at $1,000 per acre. After the great fire in April, 1906, the plaintiff was desirous of putting up a building on one of the lots that belonged to the estate of his mother. He did not have the funds that would enable him to do the building, and he applied to the relief committee for assistance. That committee declined to advance the funds, excepting that the entire title stood in the plaintiff. The plaintiff had a deed prepared, sent it to his aunt, Mrs. Curry, and she applied to the defendant, asking the defendant to execute it. About the same time the plaintiff wrote a letter to defendant, explaining the transaction. The letter is quite long, but it contains clear statements to the effect that the plaintiff was desirous of obtaining the deed from his sister to enable him to build on one of the lots a place in which he could live, and that he intended to hold the title in trust for his sister, and thereafter convey to her on demand, at which time her interest would be reconveyed upon the payment by her of taxes and assessments. That letter was dated January 4. 1907.

The defendant's deed to her brother was dated January 14, 1907. On September 11, 1908, the plaintiff made an indorsement on the deed just referred to, by the terms of which he conveyed both lots to the defendant. That deed was acknowledged and was delivered to Mrs. E. E. Curry under an agreement by the terms of which the document was to be turned over to the defendant when Mrs. Curry should have conveyed a part of her lands to the plaintiff. Mrs. Curry made such a conveyance. The exact date is not stated in the record. However, it does appear that Mrs. Curry made her deed before the defendant executed the deed dated January 14, 1907. In this connection, however, the record is clear that Mrs. Curry, after having made her deed, did not deliver it to the plaintiff. There is some evidence to the effect that there was an outstanding judgment against the plaintiff, and Mrs. Curry was desirous of protecting the plaintiff from any execution based on such judgment. There is also evidence in the record that Mrs. Curry was farming the properties, and was not willing to do more than allow the plaintiff to have the net proceeds after the farming expenses had been deducted. There is no conflict in the evidence but what the plaintiff received such net proceeds.

We do not understand the plaintiff to contend that according to the arrangements made by the parties any question exists regarding the ultimate right of the defendant to receive from the plaintiff a fee-simple title to the lots. However, the plaintiff does contend that his deed to the defendant was never delivered, but that she purloined it. If the deed was not purloined, but was delivered, a contract, which all admit was made, was duly carried out, and no one may complain.

The question remains: Does the record show that the deed dated January 14, 1907, together with the indorsement of September 11, 1908, was purloined? It is clear that the defendant had possession of it and had it recorded April 17, 1915. The record is clear that delivery was due at that time. Mrs. Curry had made her deed as contemplated. True, she had not delivered; but she had delivered the fruits. Plaintiff was getting the net proceeds, and more, at that time. It is presumed that defendant's possession was lawful, and that she owned it. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963. The defendant was called as a witness by the plaintiff, but was not asked any questions regarding her possession. The deposition of Mrs. Curry was taken April 3, 1920. At that time she was over 90 years of age, of poor hearing, of poor eyesight, unable to walk and unable to go upstairs or downstairs. She stated that at one time she showed the deed to the defendant, and that at a later date, when she looked for the deed, she could not find it. She did not say the defendant took the document forcibly or by stealth. It might be inferred the defendant did one or the other. On that subject the evidence showed a conflict, and we may not say that the findings as made are not sustained by the evidence, nor may we say there has been a miscarriage of justice.

The plaintiff complains because he has not been repaid his expenditures under the trust agreement. The complaint is not well founded. The agreement of January 14, 1907, was superseded by the agreement of September 1, 1908. By the latter agreement no duty rested on the defendant to repay such amounts. Moreover, in his entire case the plaintiff did not introduce proof of the items, if any, expended by him, nor ask a finding thereon.

The judgment is affirmed.

95 Cal. App. 42

In re ALBORI (two cases). (Cr. 1732, 1746.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1026—Right of appeal from conviction is one secured by constitutional guaranty.

The right of appeal from a judgment of conviction is the offspring of constitutional guaranty.

2. Constitutional law 🔑56—Power of courts to issue writs necessary to complete exercise of appellate jurisdiction cannot be impaired by Legislature (Const. art. 6, § 4).

The power of appellate courts declared by Const. art. 6, § 4 to issue all writs necessary or proper to the complete exercise of their appellate jurisdiction cannot be impaired by the Legislature.

3. Criminal law 🔑1068½—Right to appeal from conviction includes right to have from appellate courts writs necessary or proper to complete exercise of its jurisdiction.

The right of appeal from judgment of conviction guaranteed by the Constitution, or resting, in part, in the inherent power of the appellate courts as tribunals of appeal, is not merely the right to take appeal, but also the right to have from the appellate tribunal all writs which are necessary or proper to the complete exercise of the jurisdiction set in motion by the perfecting of appeal.

4. Criminal law 🔑1073—"Writ of probable cause" is one that appellate court in criminal case can issue as necessary or appropriate to complete exercise of appellate jurisdiction (Const. art. 6, § 4).

A "writ of probable cause," in effect an order to stay execution, is one of the writs, issuable under an appropriate state of facts, which is necessary or appropriate to the complete exercise of appellate jurisdiction in a criminal case, and so is issuable by the appellate court, under Const. art. 6, § 4; the mere rendering of its judgment, without proper protection of appellant pending appeal, not being the complete exercise of appellate jurisdiction contemplated by the Constitution.

5. Criminal law 🔑1001—In proper case, appellant's right to confinement in jail, rather than in penitentiary, will be protected by stay of execution.

Right of one, pending appeal from a conviction, to be confined in the county jail, rather than in the penitentiary, to which he has been sentenced, is one that appellate court in a proper case should protect by stay of execution.

6. Criminal law 🔑1073—Power of appellate court in criminal case to issue writs of probable cause, not being dependent on statute, was not taken away thereby (Pen. Code, § 1243, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1062).

Power and duty, in proper case, of appellate court in criminal cases to issue writs of probable cause, not being dependent on statute, Pen. Code, § 1243, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1062, did not deprive them thereof.

7. Criminal law 🔑1073—Application to appellate court for writ of probable cause, rather than for mandate to trial court, held proper.

Application to appellate court for writ of probable cause and stay of execution pending appeal from conviction, rather than for writ of mandate to compel issuance of writ of probable cause by the trial court, is proper remedy; appellate court being asked to exercise a jurisdiction reposed in it by the Constitution, or inherently existing in it, and not being asked to pass on or to review the action of the trial court.

8. Criminal law 🔑1084—Appeals held to present debatable case, so that execution should be stayed pending determination of appeals.

Appeals of petitioner from judgments of conviction held to present a debatable case, one on which there may be an honest difference of opinion, and not to be frivolous, so that execution should be stayed pending determination of appeals.

9. Bail 🔑44—Mere showing of ill health held not of such a circumstance intervening since conviction as to authorize admission to bail by appellate court.

Mere showing of ill health, without a showing of imminence of dangerous results to life or health, is not the showing of intervention of a circumstance of extraordinary character since conviction, necessary to authorize the appellate court to admit to bail pending appeal.

Two applications by Marco Albori, one for a certificate of probable cause and for a stay of execution of judgment of conviction pending appeal therefrom, the other for admission to bail pending decision on the petition for certificate of probable cause and pending determination of the appeal. Stay of execution granted; admission to bail denied.

Thos. P. White and Vincent C. Hickson, both of Los Angeles (A. P. G. Steffes, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., and Tracy Chatfield Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

In Cr. 1746:

Thos. P. White, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, P. J. Petitioner is a defendant in two actions, which, until recently, have been pending in the superior court of Los Angeles county. In each action he was found guilty of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon, and under each verdict he was sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for the term prescribed by law. From the judgments against him, and from orders denying his motions for new trials, petitioner has perfected his appeals to this court. In due time he moved the superior court for a certificate of probable cause for his appeals, and the motion was denied. Petitioner next, and in due time, moved the superior court for an order staying, pending his appeals, the execution of the judgments pronounced against him. This motion also was denied. Petitioner then instituted in this court the proceeding which is above designated by the number Cr. 1732, a proceeding for a stay of execution pending appeal, although differently entitled.

For many years prior to the session of the Legislature held in 1927—indeed, ever since 1874—the language of section 1243 of the Penal Code stood as follows:

> "An appeal to the Supreme Court from a judgment of conviction stays the execution of the judgment in all capital cases, and in all other cases, upon filing with the clerk of the court in which the conviction was had, a certificate of the judge of such court, or of a justice of the Supreme Court, that, in his opinion, there is probable cause for the appeal, but not otherwise."

The section had been held (In re Mayen, 49 Cal. App. 531, 193 P. 813; In re Murphy, 185 Cal. 298, 197 P. 59) to apply to appeals to the District Courts of Appeal as well as to appeals to the Supreme Court, and it had been determined in many cases (see In re Adams, 81 Cal. 163, 22 P 547; People v. Gallanar, 144 Cal. 656, 79 P 378) that an appealing defendant in a criminal case was entitled to the certificate mentioned in the section as a matter of right if his appeal were not clearly frivolous. It was said in one of these cases that the phrase "probable cause for the appeal," as employed in the section, "means only that there is presented a case that is debatable; a case that is not clearly and palpably frivolous and vexatious; a case upon which there may be an honest difference of opinion." In re Adams, supra. The law was also well settled, under the language of section 1243, as it stood before 1927, that:

> "A certificate of probable cause, in all its effects, is, substantially, the equivalent of an order staying execution pending an appeal from a judgment of conviction—nothing more and nothing less. Its filing with the clerk, by whomsoever it may have been granted, operates as a supersedeas." In re Mayen, supra.

The orders of the superior court, denying petitioner's application for a certificate of probable cause and his application for a stay of execution, were made under the provisions of section 1243 as recast by the Legislature in 1927. As enacted at that time the section reads:

> "An appeal to the Supreme Court or to a District Court of Appeal from a judgment of conviction stays the execution of the judgment in all cases where sentence of death has been imposed, but does not stay the execution of the judgment in any other case unless the trial court shall so order. The granting or refusal of such order shall rest in the sole discretion of the trial court. If such order is made, the clerk of the court shall issue a certificate stating that such order has been made. In cases where the defendant has been sentenced to death or life imprisonment he shall be confined in a state prison pending the decision upon his appeal." St. 1927, p. 1062.

Under the old section, as we have already pointed out, the court could not have refused a certificate of probable cause under a proper showing. Under the new section, however, pursuant to the exclusive discretion attempted to be lodged in the court, the certificate was refused and a stay of execution was denied as well.

It is contended by respondent that this court, because of the present language of section 1243, cannot issue to petitioner a certificate of probable cause for the appeals he has perfected, or a stay of execution of the judgments pronounced against him. It is said that petitioner's present fate is settled by the orders of the superior court, and that this court is without power to prevent his incarceration in the penitentiary pending a determination of the appeals which he has taken. Petitioner insists, however, that the new section 1243, in its language attempting to confer upon the superior court the "sole discretion" contemplated by its terms, is unconstitutional, and that our power to issue certificates of probable cause, or to grant stays of execution, in criminal cases, exists in its pristine vigor.

This assertion that the section violates the Constitution is based upon two grounds. It is contended, first, that the enactment is obnoxious to the organic law for the reason that it attempts to confer upon a single individual an unbridled discretion, unregulated by rules for the manner of its exercise and uncontrolled by any limitations whatever. To this proposition Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 6 S. Ct. 1064, 30 L. Ed. 220, and other cases are cited. The second ground taken is that the section is unconstitutional because it impinges upon the provision of section 4 of article 6 of the state Constitution to the effect that the District Courts of Appeal shall have power to issue all writs "necessary or proper to the complete exercise of their appellate jurisdiction." In determining the fate of the new section 1243 we shall give no attention to the first of these grounds, but shall limit our discussion to the merits of the second.

[1, 2] The right of petitioner to appeal from the judgments pronounced against him is secured to him by the Constitution of the state. Ex parte Hoge, 48 Cal. 3; In re Adams, supra. Indeed, the right of appeal is so clearly the offspring of constitutional guaranty that the Legislature is without power to provide for appeals beyond the scope of the language of the organic law. People v. McKamy, 168 Cal. 531, 143 P. 752. Also, it is well worth while to observe that the power granted by the Constitution to the courts of review of the state, that is, the power to issue writs in aid of the exercise of their appellate jurisdiction, is not a grant of original jurisdiction, but confers a part of the appellate jurisdiction itself. This is evident from the language of the grant, for the courts are to issue writs necessary or proper to the complete exercise of their appellate jurisdiction. These terms import, of course, that the exercise of such jurisdiction is not complete without the issuance of appropriate writs whenever they are necessary or proper. This view finds ample support in the decided cases. The Supreme Court said in an early case arising under the Constitution of 1849 (italics ours):

> "The appellate power of the Supreme Court is given by the fourth section of the sixth article of the Constitution, which expressly empowers this court to issue all writs and process necessary to the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction. The Legislature, therefore, can pass no act impairing the exercise of this appellate power." Haight v. Gay, 8 Cal. 297, 68 Am. Dec. 323.

The Constitution of 1849 provided that the Supreme Court should have power to issue writs of habeas corpus and "all other writs and process necessary to the exercise of their appellate jurisdiction." Article 6, § 4. In construing this provision the court said:

> "It is clear that under the old Constitution this court had no original jurisdiction except in cases of habeas corpus." Tyler v. Houghton, 25 Cal. 26.

This view was in effect carried into another opinion of the court rendered a little later, but at the same term. The reference, in the quotation last made above, to the "old Constitution," was employed to distinguish the provision of the original Constitution of 1849 from an amendment which had recently been adopted. In passing upon this amendment the court said in the later case:

> "The Constitution as amended provides that the Supreme Court shall 'have power to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, prohibition and habeas corpus, and also all writs necessary or proper to the complete exercise of its appellate jurisdiction.' Article 6, § 4. This section of the Constitution as it stood before it was amended, after enumerating the appellate powers of the Supreme Court, provided that it should have power to issue all writs and process necessary to the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction. The change effected by the amendment seems to have been designed to enlarge the powers of the court by conferring upon it original jurisdiction in the particulars specified in the fourth section of the sixth article. The language of this section is too clear and explicit to leave it open to any other construction, however much the court might be disposed to decline this new jurisdiction, in view of the inconveniences and embarrassments that may attend its exercise." Miller v. Board of Supervisors, 25 Cal. 93.

The same view is reflected in People v. Loucks, 28 Cal. 68, and it was carried forward in Hyatt v. Allen, 54 Cal. 353, the first case in which the question was discussed after the Constitution of 1879 was adopted. In the opinion in the case last cited occurs a particular expression which shows graphically that the power to issue writs necessary or proper to the complete exercise of appellate jurisdiction is a part of that jurisdiction itself:

> "In the absence * * * of any specific prohibition in the Constitution, the court would undoubtedly have the power to issue all writs necessary to the complete exercise of its appellate jurisdiction."

The same idea was expressed in an opinion rendered a few years later:

> "The Constitution provides: 'The court shall also have power to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, and habeas corpus, and all other writs necessary or proper to the complete exercise of its appellate jurisdiction.' The power to issue the writs specified, or any other writ, in a case where it may be necessary or proper to resort to it to secure the complete exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of the court, would exist had the Constitution been silent on the subject." People v. Jordan, 65 Cal. 644, 4 P. 683.

[3, 4] It therefore appears that the right of appeal which is guaranteed to petitioner by the Constitution, or which rests, in part, in the inherent power of the courts as tribunals of appeal, is not merely the right to take appeals, but, as well, the right to have from the appellate tribunal all writs which are necessary or proper to the complete exercise of the jurisdiction set in motion by the perfecting of the appeals. It becomes material next, then, to determine whether the writ now demanded by petitioner—a writ of probable cause, which in effect is nothing more nor less than an order to stay execution—is one of the writs, issuable under an appropriate state of facts, which is necessary or proper to the complete exercise of appellate jurisdiction in a criminal case. So far as the mere rendition of judgment is concerned—the determination whether an affirmance or a reversal shall result—it may be said in a sense that an appellate tribunal has exercised its jurisdiction when its judgment has been pronounced and has become final; but that cannot be the complete exercise of jurisdiction which is contemplated by the Constitution. The right of appeal, in all the fullness with which we have seen that it is characterized, is guaranteed by the Constitution to the appellant. It is he who is to be protected by the appellate tribunal. It surely cannot be said that the constitutional guaranty is safeguarded if the court contents itself with a mere decision of the appeal, leaving the victorious party in the court below, in either a civil or a criminal case, to execute, in whole or in part and during the pendency of the appeal, the judgment which is assailed by it. The right of appeal would be but an empty thing, if the appellate court could not, and if in proper cases it did not, afford to the appellant a means whereby the fruits of victory were fully preserved to him in the event of a reversal of the judgment against him. This doctrine has been continually applied in civil cases. In a recent decision, to which only we need refer, it was said, after the citation of earlier cases:

> "The law appears to be well settled that if, after an appeal, the court below seeks to enforce the judgment from which the appeal is taken, the appellate court, in its discretion, may grant a special order restraining the action of such lower court in that regard." Scott v. Larson, 82 Cal. App. 46, 255 P. 248.

One instance of resort to the writ of supersedeas for the purpose of staying the execution of judgment in criminal cases as pointed out in People v. Ross, 135 Cal. 59, 67 P. 13, and in a dissenting opinion in In re Watts, 197 Cal. 611, 241 P. 886, at page 621 of the report (241 P. 887), was in the case of People v. Durant, 119 Cal. 54, 50 P. 1070. In the dissenting opinion mentioned it was said concerning People v. Durant:

> "It was in fact an application to the court for a supersedeas in aid of its appellate jurisdiction, and was dealt with as such."

In one of the cases just cited it was said in the majority opinion, to which the dissent referred to above was filed:

> "Our conclusion is that upon an appeal from a judgment imposing the death penalty a certificate of probable cause may be issued by the judge of the trial court or a justice of this court, the effect of which is to stay the execution of so much of the judgment as requires the imprisonment of the defendant in a state prison pending the hearing and determination of his appeal." In re Watts, supra.

It is true that this conclusion of the court was reached in view of the provisions of section 1243 of the Penal Code—the decision was rendered before 1927—but it shows the justice of the idea that in proper cases a judgment of conviction in a criminal case should be stayed pending appeal. It should be remarked in passing that it was not necessary for the court to base its determination upon section 1243. A writ of supersedeas could have been issued, or an order staying execution of the judgment could have been made, pursuant to the language of the Constitution, for such a writ and such an order amount to the same thing, as we have already seen, as a writ of probable cause. Indeed, under the rule stated in Hyatt v. Allen, supra, and in People v. Jordan, supra, either a supersedeas or a stay of execution could have been issued by the court irrespective of the provision in the Constitution. In addition to the expressions in these two cases it has been said in a much later opinion that "the power to issue the writ of supersedeas is inherent in an appellate court." In re Graves, 62 Cal. App. 168, 216 P. 386.

[5] It is insisted by respondent that it can make no difference to petitioner whether he be confined in the county jail or in the penitentiary pending the hearing of his appeals, especially as, if he be sent to the latter institution, he will, during the consideration of his appeals, be amassing credits against the debit of his conviction in case of an affirmance of the judgments. The rights of an appellant under such circumstances, however, are predicated on the possibility of a reversal of the judgment which has been pronounced against him. But we forbear further to answer the contention of respondent. It is effectually met by a decision of the Supreme Court, in the following quotation from an opinion rendered by the Chief Justice, acting alone, in In re Hoge, 48 Cal. 6:

> "The right to appeal to the Supreme Court is guaranteed by the Constitution to the prisoner, and is as sacred as the right of trial by jury. It is one of the means the law has provided to determine the question of his guilt or innocence. Upon such an appeal, the ultimate question is nearly always as to the validity of the judgment under which the prisoner is to suffer; and it is certainly not consonant to our ideas of justice, if it can be prevented by legal means, that even while the question of guilt or innocence is yet being agitated in the form of an appeal, the prisoner should be undergoing the very punishment and suffering the very infamy which it was the lawful purpose of the appeal to avert. It would be somewhat akin to a practice of punishing the accused for his alleged offense while the jury was yet deliberating upon the verdict." In re Adams, supra.

It is true that In re Hoge had to do with an application for admission to bail, which, of course, contemplated the enlargement of the petitioner from all imprisonment. In Re Adams, however, the court was concerned with an application for a writ of probable cause, and the quotation from the earlier case was introduced by the statement:

> "The case of Ex parte Hoge * * * was an application for admission to bail pending appeal —the giving of bail being, as the law then stood, the only mode of staying execution except in capital cases, and all that was said by Chief Justice Wallace in deciding that case is, in the changed condition of the law, fully applicable here."

The court ordered the issuance of a writ of probable cause.

[6] We cannot avoid the conclusion that, strictly speaking, section 1243 of the Penal Code, as it stood from 1874 to 1927, did not confer jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court or upon the District Courts of Appeal to issue writs of probable cause, or at least to issue its equivalents, and that the section, as amended in the latter year, cannot operate to deprive those courts of their ancient jurisdiction, or discharge them from their duty to petitioners, in proper cases, to issue writs of supersedeas or to make orders staying executions. It is only by the exercise of such a jurisdiction that the courts can properly safeguard the right of appeal guaranteed by the Constitution.

> "The Legislature * * * can pass no act impairing the exercise of this appellate jurisdiction." Haight v. Gray, supra.
> "Quo warranto was a case at law; it afforded the legal remedy for the usurption [sic] of an office; and we think this court retains jurisdiction of the case, notwithstanding the Legislature may have changed the procedure, enlarged the remedy, and given it a new name. To hold otherwise would be to admit a power in the Legislature to abridge our jurisdiction, and take from parties the right of appeal, by the easy device of a change of procedure, in many cases, where the right and jurisdiction are unquestioned." People v. Perry, 79 Cal. 105, 21 P. 423.
> "Jurisdiction * * * having been conferred on the superior court by the Constitution, such jurisdiction could not be taken away or abridged by the Legislature, and a statute existing at the time the Constitution was adopted conferring jurisdiction on some other tribunal was superseded by such constitutional provision, so far, at least, as it could be held to have conferred exclusive jurisdiction upon such tribunal." People v. Bingham, 82 Cal. 238, 22 P. 1029.
> "The courts of this state derive their powers and jurisdiction from the Constitution of the state. The constitutional jurisdiction can neither be restricted nor enlarged by legislative act. An attempt to take away from the courts judicial power conferred upon them by the Constitution, or to impose upon them judicial powers not granted or authorized to be granted by the Constitution is void." Pacific Telephone Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 137 P. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822, in a concurring opinion at page 690 (137 P. 1138).

> "Concededly the right of appeal from the judgment of an inferior to a higher court must be found either in the state's Constitution or statutes, and it is the settled rule of law that if the right of appeal is constitutionally granted in any given case such right cannot be destroyed nor delimited by legislative enactment." In re Sutter-Butte By-Pass Assessment, 190 Cal. 532, 213 P. 974.

[7] Respondent contends that petitioner's remedy is by application for a writ of mandate to compel the issuance of a writ of probable cause by the superior court. We think not. Petitioner asks this court to exercise a jurisdiction reposed in it by the Constitution, or inherently existing in it, and we think such an application proper. We are not asked to pass upon or to review the action of the superior court.

[8] Our next labor is to inquire whether petitioner shows a proper case for the issuance of the writ or order for which he asks. To apply the test prescribed in In re Adams, supra, do petitioner's appeals present a case that is debatable, a case upon which there may be an honest difference of opinion or are they clearly and palpably frivolous and vexatious? Whatever may be our conclusion upon the actual merits of the appeals, when finally we come to a disposition of them, these are the questions to be answered now.

Petitioner's application shows that, while he was convicted of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon in two cases, apparently tried together, the charge against him in each was the crime of assault with intent to murder. It also appears that the convictions resulted upon a second trial of petitioner, the jury apparently having disagreed upon the first. With this preliminary statement we set forth in full certain allegations of the petition:

> "That the questions raised on the aforesaid appeal of this petitioner present to the District Court of Appeal a case that is debatable. That said appeal is not frivolous or vexatious. That said appeal presents questions upon which there may be an honest difference of opinion.
> "Your petitioner respectfully represents that by reason of the nature of the evidence presented at the trial of the above mentioned criminal case, wherein it was shown that defendant did not precipitate or start the altercation which resulted in the shooting; that this petitioner was not the aggressor but was set upon and badly beaten by from three to five people; that this petitioner during all of said altercation up to the time when the shots were fired continually retreated, and by reason of other facts and circumstances brought out in evidence in this case, there is room for an honest difference of opinion as to whether the evidence presented is sufficient to justify or support the verdict of guilty.
> "This petitioner further respectfully represents that the failure of the court to give certain instructions and particularly to instruct the jury as to their right to find the defendant guilty of simple assault, an offense necessarily included in the offense of assault with intent to murder, with which the defendant was charged, presents a debatable question of law upon which there may and can be an honest difference of opinion.
> "That the filing of affidavits on the motion for a new trial, alleging that the trial judge was told during the progress of the trial by the bailiff in charge of the jury that while said jury was being housed under court order in a hotel, during the progress of the trial, and before the cause was submitted to said jury, that one of said jurors was telling other jurors that a witness for the defense who testified at the first trial of the above mentioned cause received $5,000 for his testimony; and the refusal and neglect of the trial judge upon receiving such information to call same to the attention of counsel, to investigate the same, and if proven to declare a mistrial; in the face of the failure of the trial judge to deny by affidavit or otherwise the truth of the charge contained in the affidavit filed in support of defendant's motion for a new trial, constitute such misconduct on the part of the trial judge as to readily permit of an honest difference of opinion and debate as to whether or not such conduct on the part of the trial judge was prejudicial to the defendant's rights.

"Your petitioner further respectfully represents that the court instructed the jury as follows: 'The court instructs the jury that a person, on whom another is making a mere assault with the fists, not with intent to kill or to do great bodily harm, and who is not deceived as to the character of such assault, is not justified in taking life or using a deadly weapon in self-defense.' Your petitioner respectfully represents that the correctness of such instruction is debatable and that the giving of such instruction readily permits of an honest difference of opinion as to whether the lack of intent to kill or the lack to do great bodily harm, existing in the mind of one making an assault with the fists upon a defendant, is any criterion whatever of the right to engage in self-defense or whether the test is, what would a reasonable man situated as the defendant was situated and seeing what he saw, and knowing what he knew, have done under like circumstances. Your petitioner further represents to the court that the failure of the trial court to instruct the jury, as requested by the defendant, that filing of an indictment raises no presumption or contendment [sic] against the defendant and is no evidence against him, raises a debatable question and permits of an honest difference of opinion as to whether such refusal was prejudicial to the defendant in the light of all the other instructions given. Your petitioner respectfully represents that the failure on the part of the trial judge to instruct the jury, as requested by the defendant, in the instant case, that even though an assault is made upon the defendant only with the fists, still that the defendant could resort to necessary self-defense if an ordinarily prudent and reasonable man situated as the defendant was, knowing what the defendant knew, and seeing what the defendant saw, would have believed that he was in imminent danger of great bodily injury from such an assault with the fists; raises a debatable question and permits of an honest difference of opinion as to whether or not in view of the facts and circumstances in evidence in the case, such instruction should not have been given.

"Your petitioner further respectfully represents that the cross-examination of the witness Kynett testified for the defendant and the remarks of the court at the conclusion of the examination of Police Captain Steckel, who testified in rebuttal for the people, raises a debatable question and permits of an honest difference of opinion as to whether or not such conduct on the part of the court was not prejudicial to the rights of the defendant and in violation of the provisions of section 19, article 6, of the Constitution of the state of California, which prohibits judges from charging juries with respect to matters of fact.

"Your petitioner further represents that there are other and sundry debatable questions raised and issues which permit of an honest difference of opinion are also raised on the appeal taken by this petitioner in the above-mentioned case. That by reason of all of the aforementioned grounds constituting said appeal, as well as divers and other grounds more fully appearing from the files and records in said appeal, it is apparent that said appeal is taken in good faith, presents debatable questions and permits of honest difference of opinion as to whether, during the trial of said cause, the rights of this defendant were prejudiced. That said appeal is not frivolous or vexatious, but on the contrary is brought in good faith and presents debatable questions to the District Court of Appeal."

These allegations as to what matters are presented by the appeals of petitioner are not controverted by respondent. The merits of petitioner's application were orally argued by a deputy district attorney and they were also debated in a brief filed by the attorney general and the district attorney. In both oral argument and brief these officers have contented themselves with a presentation only of the questions arising upon the face of the petition, which we have considered above. It is material also to observe that the deputy district attorney who participated in the oral argument said in the course of his remarks:

> "We are not contending—and the Attorney General joins with me—but what there is under the law existing here some appearances which would seem to be within the rule laid down by Chief Justice Beatty [In re Adams, supra], to which I have referred that the trial court could have, exercising reasonable judgment, come to the conclusion that a certificate [of probable cause] ought to be granted."

The transcript of the testimony and proceedings during the trial of petitioner are before us as a part of the record upon this application, as is also the transcript of the argument made on his motion for a new trial. In determining whether petitioner's appeals are frivolous we have not found it necessary to examine the transcript of the proceedings during the trial. Petitioner's opening brief in support of his appeals has not yet been filed and we have therefore been denied light from that source. We have, however, read carefully the transcript of the argument on motion for a new trial and it is that reading which has made it unnecessary for us to consider the transcript of the testimony. The allegations of the petition, designed to show that the appeals are not frivolous, are some of them not as full and satisfactory as could be desired, but they are amplified and enforced by the points presented and the argument made in support of the motion. Taking petition and argument together, we are fully apprised of the points to be made upon the appeal. We have no hesitation in declaring that the appeal is not frivolous. Several of the questions which we must finally decide are to our minds plainly arguable—debatable, to employ the language of In re Adams, supra—they are points concerning which an honest difference of opinion may be indulged. To this independent conclusion of our own is to be added the voluntary concession of the Attorney General and the district attorney that the superior court might properly have issued a certificate of probable cause. We have no hesitation in concluding that we should make an order staying the execution of the judgments against petitioner pending a determination of his appeals.

[9] Some days after petitioner presented the application of which we have just made disposition, he instituted the proceeding which at the head of this opinion is numbered Cr. 1746. This second proceeding is in the nature of an application for admission to bail pending a determination of petitioner's appeals. It was commenced by a petition general and formal in its terms accompanied by various affidavits tendered in its support. None of these affidavits is controverted. Points and authorities were submitted in support of the petition, but no brief has been filed in opposition to it. The district attorney, who was present at the chamber hearing upon the application, stated that he had no authorities to present and that he had no objection to the making of an order admitting petitioner to bail.

Affidavits of seven of the members of the jury which convicted petitioner are presented with the petition. One of these jurors states that her intention was to find petitioner guilty under but one of the charges against him, that the sentence imposed upon petitioner was too severe, that if she had known the sentence was to be so severe, she would not have voted petitioner guilty, and that some of the witnesses against petitioner were intoxicated at the time of the occurrences to which they testified. Another juror avers that the testimony against petitioner was conflicting and weak, that one of the other jurors told him that petitioner had paid a certain witness the sum of $5,000 to testify in his behalf, and that this statement served to strengthen the weak evidence against petitioner and influenced the affiant juror to agree to a verdict of guilt. Yet another juror says that the fact that brought him mostly to the conclusion of petitioner's guilt was not the evidence as presented in court, that there was conversation in the jury room to the effect that petitioner had paid some of his witnesses to testify in his behalf, and that this conversation was partly the cause of the agreement of the jury to the compromised verdict of guilt. The affidavits of the other four jurors show similar matters.

An affidavit of petitioner and affidavits of several physicians contain statements concerning the effect likely to be wrought upon petitioner's health by his imprisonment. The affidavits of the physicians show the result of various examinations to which they have subjected petitioner, some of these having occurred before and some after his imprisonment began. There is a showing of various symptoms of petitioner and of certain complaints made by him as to his condition of body. The only resultant statements in the various affidavits are that since his incarceration his health has been seriously and dangerously impaired, that it is believed that his present condition and the injury to his health is such that it will be permanently and dangerously affected by further imprisonment, that petitioner's condition is detrimental and subject to serious consequences if not under proper surroundings and care and that he ought not to be subjected to unnecessary worry and hardships, that petitioner will suffer in his general health if compelled to close confinement, and that strain, either mental or physical, will be detrimental to petitioner's health.

The showing made by all these affidavits is utterly insufficient to support the petition for admission to bail. Such an application, made after appeal, should be allowed "only in cases where circumstances of an extraordinary character have intervened." Ex parte Marks, 49 Cal. 680. "What is meant by 'circumstances of an extraordinary character' occurring after conviction was inquired by counsel at the argument. Obviously this question cannot be fully or satisfactorily answered by mere anticipation of possibilities. It might be that, after conviction of a felonious homicide, the supposed deceased was produced and seen to be alive: or it might be discovered that property, the subject of a supposed larceny, had all the time been in the possession of its owner, and overlooked by his mistake. A variety of illustrations might be suggested of circumstances distinguishing a particular case from the general mass of other criminal cases, and appealing more or less strongly to the discretion of the court to admit the prisoner to bail, even after conviction. It is not pretended that any circumstances of an extraordinary character affecting the condition of the petitioners here have occurred since their conviction. None are asserted in the petition for the writ, nor were any such proven at the hearing. The circumstance suggested at bar, that some of the jurors had, since the trial, stated that they had become satisfied that they committed a mistake in rendering their verdict against the accused, is, of course, not entitled to the slightest attention." Ex parte Smallman, 54 Cal. 35. The Supreme Court "ought not to admit to bail after a verdict of guilty, unless when circumstances of extraordinary character had intervened since the conviction." Ex parte Brown, 68 Cal. 176, 8 P. 829. As covering practically the same ground, see Ex parte Smith, 89 Cal. 79, 26 P. 638; Ex parte Turner, 112 Cal. 627, 45 P. 571; Ex parte Hatch, 15 Cal. App. 186, 114 P. 410; In re Wilkins, 66 Cal. App. 754, 226 P. 964; People v. Eiseman, 69 Cal. App. 143, 230 P. 669; People v. Ephraim, 72 Cal. App. 479, 237 P. 801; In re Ephraim, 73 Cal. App. 104, 237 P. 801.

There is nothing in the affidavits of the seven jurors which shows the intervention of any "circumstance" whatever since petitioner's conviction, except the mere making of the affidavits themselves, and that "circumstance" is palpably insufficient to meet the requirement prescribed in the cited cases, granting that these affidavits can be considered at all. The only "circumstance" intervening since conviction, taking the entire case made by petitioner, is disclosed by some of the statements contained in the affidavits concerning the state of his health, but that showing is insufficient. "There is nothing in the case showing the intervention of any such extraordinary circumstance as would justify holding that the application was improperly denied by the judge of the trial court. The evidence does not show that there is such imminence of dangerous results to the life or health of the defendant as to obviously require his removal from the county jail at this time. Should more serious consequences of his confinement hereafter manifest themselves, and such as to render it proper that bail should be allowed, there is nothing to preclude another application for the purpose." Ex parte Turner, supra.

For a review of the authorities upon the question of the effect of confinement upon health as requiring an admission to bail pending appeal, see People v. Cornell, 28 Cal. App. 654, 153 P. 726. "Where the reasonable inference from the showing made is that there is only a fear that further confinement of the prisoner pending appeal will endanger his health or life, and not that there is imminent danger from further confinement, bail should be denied." People v. Eiseman, supra. We have not made an exhaustive presentation of the authorities on this question for the reason that the counsel for petitioner, at the time of the hearing on the petition, conceded that the showing as to to petitioner's state of health was not alone sufficient to entitle him to admission to bail.

Petitioner is granted a stay of execution of the judgments against him pending a determination of his appeals. He is denied admission to bail.

PEOPLE v. BIESCAR. (Cr. 1735.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 20, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑1084—Execution will be stayed, the appeal presenting a debatable case.

Appeal from judgment of conviction presenting a case that is debatable, on which there may be an honest difference of opinion, and not being frivolous, stay of execution should be granted.

2. Criminal law 🔑1073—Trial court is under duty to grant certificate of probable cause for stay of execution pending appeal (Pen. Code, § 1243, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1062).

Trial courts are as much bound, since the 1927 amendment of Pen. Code, § 1243 (St. 1927, p. 1062), as they were before, by the rules previously laid down as to their duty to grant certificate of probable cause for purpose of stay of execution pending appeal from conviction.

Louis Biescar, being convicted of a criminal offense, petitions for stay of execution pending appeal. Stay granted.

Nathan O. Freedman, William J. Leete, and Virgil G. Lewis, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

WORKS, P. J. Petitioner has appealed to this court from a judgment of conviction rendered against him in a criminal case. Before the appeal was perfected, he asked the trial court for a certificate of probable cause for his appeal; but the court, assuming to exercise the "sole discretion" attempted to be conferred upon it by section 1243 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1062), refused to issue the certificate. Petitioner, upon due notice to the district attorney, asks this court to issue such a certificate, which is, in effect, an order staying execution.

[1] The grounds for petitioner's appeal are set forth in general terms in his petition. Since the petition was filed, the merits of the appeal have been argued before us. From the petition and from the argument we are satisfied, applying the test prescribed in In re Adams, 81 Cal. 163, 22 P. 547, that the appeal presents a case that is debatable, a case upon which there may be an honest difference of opinion, and that the appeal is not frivolous. Under the reasoning of our opinion in In re Albori (Crim. No. 1732) 272 P. 321, decided November 19, 1928, we determine that the petition for a stay of execution should be granted.

[2] In view of the decision in In re Albori, supra, we take this opportunity of calling the attention of trial judges in criminal cases to the fact that they are as much bound by the rules laid down in In re Adams, supra, as they were before the amendment of 1927 to section 1243 of the Penal Code.

Petitioner is granted a stay of execution pending his appeal.

Unsuccessful party to replevin suit may exercise option to restore property to legal owner or return it and pay reasonable value thereof.

5. Replevin ⚷93—In replevin action, court's finding that defendants were illegally withholding possession of automobile held proper, though actual possession was in sheriff under writ.

In replevin action, court's finding that automobile was illegally withheld by defendants held proper, even though automobile was in actual possession of sheriff under writ of replevin.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

Action to replevin an automobile by Fred H. Lundblade against A. L. Pierce and another. From the judgment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Henry L. Ford, of Eureka, for appellants.

W. Ernest Dickson, of Eureka, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to replevin an automobile. While the car was in the possession of Edward Lovell, the registered owner thereof, under an executory contract of purchase from the respondent, the machine was left at the garage of Clarence Norton in Eureka for repairs. While the machine was in this garage for repairs, the respondent commenced an action against Norton for a debt of $121 alleged to have been due upon an entirely different transaction and attempted to attach Norton's claim against Lovell for the repairs upon the automobile involved in this action. October 1, 1925, the officer visited the garage and apparently attempted to attach and take possession of the Lovell car. The repairs upon the car were not completed, and the machine could not be removed, for it could not be operated on its own power. The officer therefore left the garage, and, returning the following morning, found that Norton had sold the car to the appellant Pierce under section 3052 of the Civil Code to satisfy his mechanic's lien for $98 for services performed. The respondent paid this amount to the sheriff and proceeded to attach it in his action against Norton. Pierce resold the Lovell car to the appellant Peterson. Lovell was in default of payments on his contract to purchase the car. November 10, 1925, this action in replevin was commenced, and the sheriff thereupon took and still holds possession of the car pursuant to the writ of replevin issued therein.

The trial court found that the respondent was the owner and entitled to the possession of the car; that it was illegally withheld from respondent's possession to his damage in the sum of $100; that the market value of the machine at the time of the illegal taking thereof was the sum of $432.50. Judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of respondent for the recovery of the possession of the machine and $100 damages, and for the further sum of $432.50 in the event of failure to recover possession of the car.

The appellants contend that they held legal title to the machine by virtue of the sale thereof by Norton to satisfy his mechanic's lien for services performed in repairing the machine, that the record is devoid of evidence of the market value of the machine, and of the amount of damages sustained by respondent on account of the alleged withholding of possession thereof, and that the sheriff's possession of the machine under the writ of replevin was tantamount to respondent's possession, and appellants were therefore not illegally withholding it.

[1] Norton lost his lien upon the automobile when he purported to sell and transfer it to Pierce to satisfy his claim for services performed. Under section 3051 of the Civil Code a lien upon personal property for services performed is valid only while the property is lawfully retained in the possession of the workman who renders the services. In the present case, the automobile having been sold before the repairs were completed, the claim was not due, and the purported sale to satisfy the mechanic's lien was therefore premature and void. Section 3052, Civ. Code; Peerless Insurance & Brokerage Co. v. Dwyer Equipment Co., 78 Cal. App. 141, 248 P. 303. Since Norton waived his lien by parting with his possession of the car, the question as to whether he had been paid for his services becomes immaterial in this action.

[2-5] There is no merit in appellants' contention that the record fails to show the market value of the machine, or the damages sustained by the respondent. He testified respecting its value at the time appellants took possession of the car, that "Its reasonable market value was $400," and that "Cars of that character, at the date it was taken by the defendants were bringing in the market $400 to $450." This is sufficient to support the court's finding that it was then worth $432.50. The record also discloses evidence of the decrease in the value of the machine at the time of the trial. In this regard the respondent testified, "It is not (now) worth over $100." This is ample evidence upon which to sustain the court's finding that the respondent sustained damages in the sum of $100. Nor can it be said that the appellants were not illegally withholding possession of the car because it was actually in the custody of the sheriff, held by virtue of the writ of replevin. Under such circumstances it was merely held by the officer in custodia legis. The unsuccessful party to the replevin suit may still exercise an option to restore it to the legal owner, or retain it and pay the respondent the reasonable value thereof. 5 Cal. Jur. 178, § 15. In spite of the fact that the car was in the actual possession of the sheriff under the writ of replevin, the court's finding that it was illegally withheld was nevertheless proper.

CINCOTTA v. CATANIA. (Civ. 6112.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 21, 1928.

1. Contracts ⚷252—It is unnecessary to prove parties used words, "We do mutually rescind contract," but rescission may be proved otherwise.

To prove rescission of contract, it is unnecessary to show that parties met and used words, "We do mutually rescind contract heretofore entered into by us," since rescission may be proved by other words and acts.

2. Sales ⚷391(5)—Seller having rescinded when he refused to perform, thereafter buyer, who made payment, could rescind and sue for moneys had and received.

Seller rescinded when he refused to perform contract, and thereafter buyer, who made payment, was entitled also to rescind and maintain an action as for moneys had and received.

Action for money had and received by Santoro Cincotta against Santo Catania. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George G. Graham, of Fresno, for appellant.

M. F. McCormick and L. N. Barber, both of Fresno, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is the second appeal in this controversy. Cincotta v. Catania, 61 Cal. App. 38, 214 P. 451. The plaintiff inserted in his complaint two causes of action: (1) A common count for money had and received; and (2) a common count for money paid. The defendant appeared and answered. He denied the material allegations set forth in plaintiff's complaint, and then he set forth an oral contract made on the 18th day of October, 1920. The provisions of that contract were that the plaintiff agreed to buy and the defendant agreed to sell and deliver to the plaintiff, f. o. b. cars, 10 tons of black and green cured olives at 12 cents per pound, packed in 30-gallon barrels, and to be delivered during the month of December, 1920. The defendant further alleged that at the time the contract was made the plaintiff paid $1,000, and that thereafter, on the 23d day of December, the defendant tendered the merchandise, but the plaintiff refused to accept it. The defendant further alleged that he had fully performed the contract and that during the month of December, 1920, he was ready and willing to deliver the merchandise as agreed in the contract. Thereupon the defendant further alleges that by reason of the plaintiff's refusal to accept the merchandise he has been damaged in the sum of $1,400. A trial was had before the trial court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff on both counts contained in the complaint. As to the allegations contained in the defendant's cross-complaint the trial court found that the special contract was made as alleged, but that said contract was rescinded and terminated on November 1, 1920, by the mutual oral agreement of the parties. From a judgment entered on the findings the defendant has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1, 2] The defendant presents one point, and that is that the evidence does not sustain the finding that there was a mutual rescission of the contract. In presenting that point it is the contention of the defendant that the evidence does not show that at any time the parties met and used the identical words, "We do mutually rescind the contract heretofore entered into by us on the 18th day of October, 1920." Of course, it was not necessary that they should do so in order to rescind the contract. As rescission could be proved by other words and acts. Looking into the record, it will be found that there is evidence to the effect that on the 18th day of October, 1920, the parties entered into a contract whereby the plaintiff agreed to buy and the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff, f. o. b. cars, 10 tons of black and green cured olives. At a later date, the above contract not having been performed, the parties agreed that the defendant should sell to the plaintiff, instead of olives, a quantity of dried grapes. Later, that contract having been filled, the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff a quantity of salt and empty barrels as the subject-matter of the same sale. At a still later date the defendant refused to perform that contract and the plaintiff elected to commence this action. In taking the course that he took the defendant rescinded when he refused to perform. Thereafter the plaintiff was entitled also to rescind and maintain an action as for moneys had and received. Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 P. 280, 18 Am. St. Rep. 187. True it is that there was conflicting evidence; nevertheless it may not be said that the evidence was insufficient. An examination of the record discloses that there was an abundance of evidence which, if the court believed it, would justify the finding complained of.

SAN FRANCISCO BANK v. NATIONAL RADIO CO. et al. (Civ. No. 6594.) ★

Rehearing Denied Dec. 20, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑705—$2,000 attorney fees expended under mortgage authorizing expenditure of sums deemed necessary could not be held excessive on appeal without evidence of value of services.

Where mortgage provided that mortgagee could expend such sums as it might deem necessary in action, which would constitute charge against mortgaged premises, and mortgagee in action affecting mortgaged premises expended $2,000 in defense of action as counsel fees, and there was no evidence concerning value of services rendered except undenied allegations of complaint, it could not be said on appeal that sum of $2,000 paid by mortgagee was in excess of value of services rendered.

2. Mortgages 🔑581(1)—That mortgagee's expenditure in defending mortgaged premises was insured held no defense to mortgagor's liability therefor under mortgage, where insurer was not party to action nor mortgage.

In action on note and to foreclose mortgage authorizing mortgagee to expend sums deemed necessary in action involving mortgaged premises, claim that expenditure of $2,000 for attorneys' fees was covered by title insurance held no defense to mortgagor's liability for expenditure expressly agreed to be repaid in mortgage, where insurance company was not party to action nor to mortgage.

3. Mortgages 🔑578, 581(5)—Allowance of attorney's fees within limits of mortgage held within trial court's discretion, not to be disturbed unless abused.

In action to foreclose mortgage involving mortgagor's liability for attorney's fees expended by mortgagee under mortgage providing for attorney's fees of $100 and 5 per cent. of amount found due, allowance of attorney's fees within limits fixed by mortgage was within discretion of trial court, and will not be disturbed on appeal except for abuse of discretion.

4. Costs 🔑260(4)—Appeal from foreclosure involving only issue of attorney's fees held not to require penalty for frivolous appeal.

In action on note and mortgage, appeal involving only issue as to reasonableness of allowance to mortgagee for attorney's fees held not to authorize imposition of penalty for frivolous appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action by the San Francisco Bank, formerly the San Francisco Savings & Loan Society, a corporation, against the National Radio Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Jessie S. Gregory appeals. Affirmed.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem. This is an action upon a promissory note and to foreclose a real estate mortgage given to secure the payment of said note. Plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant Jessie S. Gregory appeals therefrom.

The note and mortgage in suit were executed September 22, 1922, by the defendant National Radio Company, a corporation, in the principal sum of $30,000.

Immediately after the execution thereof, the said National Radio Company executed a deed of trust of the property described in said mortgage, in favor of the defendant Jessie S. Gregory, to secure a loan in the sum of $17,500. Thereafter said property was sold by virtue of the terms of said deed of trust, and title passed to said Jessie S. Gregory, subject to the prior lien of plaintiff's mortgage.

In appellant's opening brief appears the following statement:

> "The only question presented by this appeal relates to the reasonableness of the allowance of $3600.00 as and for attorney's fees allowed to plaintiff in connection with the enforcement of plaintiff's rights under the mortgage."

Amplifying the foregoing statement by the record in this case, it appears that the trial court allowed to the plaintiff an attorney fee of $2,000 in litigation effecting the title to the mortgaged premises, and the further sum of $1,600 as and for the services of plaintiff's attorney in this foreclosure suit.

The mortgage contains a provision that if during the existence of the mortgage there be commenced or pending any suit or action affecting the premises described therein, or if any adverse claim for or against the premises, or any part thereof, be made or asserted, the mortgagee might appear in said suit or action and retain counsel therein and defend the same or take such other action as it might be advised, and for said purposes might pay and expend such sums of money as it might deem necessary, and all sums of money expended should bear interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month and should be secured by the mortgage and be a lien upon the mortgaged property and deducted from the proceeds of any sale thereof.

In accordance with the foregoing provision of said mortgage, the commencement of an action affecting the mortgaged premises and the title thereto, in which action this plaintiff was made a party defendant, and the necessity for the plaintiff to retain counsel and appear therein, is alleged in the complaint. There is then set forth in appropriate language allegations of services rendered in said action covering a period of several months and including proceedings and hearings in the superior court, the District Court of Appeal, and the Supreme Court of the state of California. It is further alleged that plaintiff expended in the defense of said action the sum of $2,000 as counsel fees, and that no part thereof nor the interest thereon has been repaid to plaintiff.

The answer herein does not deny the rendition of the services in said action, but does deny that the charges therefor are proper or a lien upon the premises set forth in the mortgage, and further alleges that any sum for said services in excess of the sum of $500 would be excessive.

[1] No authorities are cited in support of appellant's position. The evidence shows that plaintiff did pay its attorneys for services in said action the sum of $2,000, and, under the express terms of the mortgage any sum so paid and which this plaintiff "might deem necessary" was a proper charge against the mortgaged premises. Such a condition in a mortgage is analogous to provisions for the payment of taxes, insurance, and other charges. So far as the value of the services rendered in said action is concerned, there is no evidence in the record except the undenied allegations of the complaint, and from a review thereof we cannot say the sum of $2,000 paid by the plaintiff was in excess of the value of the services rendered.

[2] Appellant also argues that said expenditure was covered by title insurance, but this claim is answered by the fact that the insurance company is not a party to this action, nor a party to the mortgage contract by which the mortgagor expressly agreed to repay the mortgagee any sum of money so expended.

[3] It is also claimed by appellant that the allowance of $1,600 to plaintiff as an attorney fee for services rendered in this action is excessive and that said services were not worth more than the sum of $500. The provisions of the mortgage bearing upon this subject are that the court may allow as counsel fees the sum of $100 and also a sum equal to 5 per cent. upon the amount found due. By the decree in this case the court found the amount to be due plaintiff was the sum of $38,774, making the amount allowed as an attorney fee less than that provided for by the terms of the mortgage itself. However, it is well settled that such allowance within the limits fixed by the mortgage itself is peculiarly a matter resting in the discretion of the trial court, and will not be disturbed upon appeal except for an abuse of that discretion. Huber v. Shedoudy, 180 Cal. 311, 181 P. 63; Damon v. Quinn, 143 Cal. 75, 76 P. 818. There being no abuse of the discretion of the court shown, the point is without merit.

[4] Counsel for respondent insists that this appeal is frivolous and the court should impose a fine upon appellant, but we are of the opinion that the case is not one in which the court should impose a penalty.

RAMSDELL v. KREHMKE. (Civ. 3472.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 27, 1928.

1. Brokers 🔑84(1)—Where sale is not consummated, broker, to recover commissions, must show signing of enforceable contract to purchase or that parties were brought together.

Where sale is not consummated, broker, in order to recover commission, must show actual signing of an enforceable contract to purchase property on part of customer, or that parties have been brought together to enable owner to consummate sale.

2. Brokers 🔑54—Customer's "ability to purchase," which broker must prove to recover commission, means he must have property, credit, or ability to provide for consideration.

Customer's "ability to purchase," which broker must prove in order to recover commission, does not necessarily mean that he must have actual cash on hand with which to consummate transaction, but it means that he must have property, credit, or ability to provide for necessary consideration on terms and within time required.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Ability.]

3. Brokers 🔑86(5)—In action for broker's commission, evidence supported finding customer was ready, willing, and able to purchase.

In action to recover broker's commission, evidence held sufficient to support finding that customer was ready, willing, and able to purchase property on terms prescribed.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑76—Reasonable construction of contract provision for down payment was that purchaser should proffer cash upon tender of evidence of merchantable title.

Reasonable construction of provision of land contract for payment of $6,000 down was that such cash was to be proffered by purchaser on tendering of evidence of merchantable title.

5. Brokers 🔑86(4)—In broker's action, evidence showed vendor and prospective purchaser were brought together by broker to afford vendor opportunity to consummate sale.

In action to recover broker's commission where sale was not consummated, evidence held sufficient to show that vendor and prospective purchaser were brought together by broker so as to afford vendor an opportunity to consummate sale.

6. Brokers 🔑84(1), 86(1)—Broker suing for commissions has burden of proving case, but no higher degree of evidence is required of him than in other cases.

Broker suing for commissions has burden of proving his case, but in assuming this burden no higher degree of evidence is required of him than in any other case, and same principles apply to weight and character of evidence.

7. Brokers 🔑86(1)—Where sale is not consummated, broker suing for commission must prove, by satisfactory evidence written agreement was signed by customer or that parties were brought together by broker.

While, in absence of actual consummation of sale, it is necessary to prove that either written agreement to purchase has been signed by customer or that parties have been brought together by broker so as to enable owner to close sale, all that is required is such satisfactory evidence of these acts as would suffice to prove any other material fact.

8. Brokers 🔑86(3)—Postscript, signed by customer, to broker's letter to owner, held sufficient written agreement of purchase to entitle broker to commission.

Postscript, signed by prospective purchaser, to broker's letter to owner, stating that purchaser agreed to purchase property on terms contained in written authorization to broker, held to constitute sufficient written agreement of purchaser to be signed by customer to entitle broker to commissions, where sale was not consummated.

9. Appeal and error 🔑1048(6)—In broker's action for commission, excluding cross-question to prospective purchaser whether she saw owner and offered to buy held harmless error.

In broker's action for commission, where sale was not consummated, sustaining objection to cross-examination of prospective purchaser as to whether she ever saw owner and offered to buy property on basis of authorization to broker held harmless error, hence it was not necessary that prospective purchaser should have personally interviewed owner and offered to buy property.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1050(1)—Excluding question whether broker suing for commission brought purchaser to owner's place to consummate deal held harmless.

In action for broker's commission where sale was not consummated, sustaining objection to question purported to defendant, as to whether broker ever brought prospective purchaser to owner's place for purpose of consummating any deal to buy that place, held harmless, since it was not necessary for broker to consummate deal at owner's premises.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action to recover real estate broker's commissions by H. R. Ramsdell against C. F. Krehmke. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, for appellant.

A. H. Hewitt and Lloyd E. Hewitt, both of Yuba City, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment for $700 broker's commissions for procuring a customer, ready, willing, and able to purchase real property situated in Butte county, upon the terms specified. April 5, 1926, the appellant signed an exclusive 10-day contract to pay respondent 5 per cent. commissions for the sale of lots 18 and 19 of Gridley tract No. 5, situated in Butte county, Cal., for the sum of $14,000, upon the following terms:

> "$6,000.00 down, and the balance secured by mortgage and contract for five years to pay $1,600.00 a year, with interest at 6 per cent per annum until paid. * * * Evidence of title to be in the form of certificate of title issued by a responsible Title Company to be furnished and paid for by the seller."

The following day the respondent took Mrs. Ollie Osborne, a prospective purchaser who resided at Live Oak, to inspect the property, where she met the appellant on his ranch near Gridley. She was entirely satisfied with the property and agreed to purchase it upon the terms specified, paying the respondent $500 to bind the bargain. April 13, 1926, the respondent, who also lived in Live Oak, within a few miles of Gridley, wrote the appellant at Gridley informing him that he had procured a customer in the person of Mrs. Ollie Osborne, who was ready, willing, and able to purchase the property upon the exact terms specified in their listing contract of April 5, and enumerated these terms in the letter, requesting the appellant to at once procure his certificate of title so as to enable them to close the sale within the time mentioned. At the bottom of this letter the proposed purchaser signed the following postscript:

> "I have agreed with Mr. H. R. Ramsdell to purchase the property above mentioned for the sum of $14,000.00, upon the terms contained in the written authorization dated April 5, 1926, and given to said H. R. Ramsdell by C. F. Krehmke, and I have funds on hand to make the initial payment of $6,000.00, and I have deposited with said H. R. Ramsdell the sum of $500.00 to be applied on the purchase price of said property, and as evidence of good faith on my part. Dated, April 13, 1926. (Signed) Ollie Osborne."

The owner, however, evidently sought to avoid the contract, and the sale was not consummated.

Upon the assumption that the evidence supported the findings that the respondent had procured a customer within the allotted time who was ready, willing, and able to purchase the property upon the terms specified, the court rendered judgment in his favor for the sum of $700. The appellant contends that the findings and judgment are not supported by the evidence, for the reason that: (1) The proof fails to show that the customer was able to purchase the property upon the terms specified; (2) a written contract of purchase was neither procured from the customer, nor were the parties brought together so as to enable the owner to consummate the sale; and (3) the contract for broker's commissions was procured by fraud.

[1] The well-established rule requiring the payment of broker's commissions is not disputed, to the effect that a broker is deemed to be the procuring cause of sale so as to entitle him to his commissions, when he has secured a customer, ready, willing, and able to purchase the property upon the terms prescribed in the contract of employment, and has either obtained from the customer an enforceable written contract to buy the property on the terms designated, or, in lieu thereof, has succeeded in bringing the parties together so as to enable the owner to consummate the sale. 4 Cal. Jur. 582, § 25. Where the sale is not consummated, proof is required showing the actual signing of an enforceable contract to purchase the property on the part of the customer, or that the parties have been brought together to enable the owner to consummate the sale. Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514, 39 P. 200, 45 Am. St. Rep. 87; Gunn v. Bank of California, 99 Cal. 349, 353, 33 P. 1105; Deovletian v. Whitney, 55 Cal. App. 76, 202 P. 905; Douglas v. Spangenberg, 23 Cal. App. 294, 137 P. 1103; Cone v. Keil, 18 Cal. App. 675, 124 P. 548.

[2-5] The customer's ability to purchase does not necessarily mean that he must have the actual cash on hand with which to consummate the transaction. It merely means that he must have the property, credit, or ability to provide for the necessary consideration upon the terms, and within the time required. Pellaton v. Brunski, 69 Cal. App. 301, 231 P. 583; Russell v. Ramm, 200 Cal. 348, 254 P. 532. The evidence in the present case sufficiently supports the finding that the customer was ready, willing, and able to purchase the property upon the terms prescribed. The contract called for "$6,000.00 down, and the balance to be secured by mortgage" on the premises. Mrs. Osborne testified as follows:

> "Q. Did you have any funds to meet the payments specified in the contract? A. I did. * * * I deposited them in the (Lodi National) Bank on the 7th of April, 1926.
> "Q. How much did you deposit? A. Five thousand dollars. * * * It was my own money; I had sold property and obtained it. * * * I also had money in account with the Bank of Italy, * * * enough to make up the $6,000, lacking $500. * * * The Bank of Italy said they would let me have it (the $500) so I had the $6,000. * * * I could put my hand on it any time I wanted it."

Corroborating this evidence, Mr. Cobeen, the manager of the Bank of Italy at Live Oak, testified:

> "Q. Do you know Mrs. Ollie Osborne? A. I do.
> "Q. In April, 1926, did she make arrangements with your bank to obtain funds for the purchase of land, the Krehmke place? A. She did. * * * She asked for approximately $500, and we told her that we would loan her (that amount) on an open note."

The contract provided that the vendor would furnish a certificate of title at his own expense. A reasonable construction of this provision for the payment of "$6,000 down" is that this cash was to be proffered upon the tendering of evidence of a merchantable title. The certificate of title was never procured or tendered by the appellant. The record also adequately shows that the vendor and prospective purchaser were brought together by the respondent so as to afford the appellant an opportunity to consummate the sale, and that a sufficient written contract of purchase was signed by the customer. The appellant knew the identity of respondent's customer before the contract of employment of the broker was signed. The appellant testified:

> "Q. He (respondent) had notified you he had a purchaser * * * before you met on that date; that he had a purchaser in the person of Mrs. Osborne, didn't he? A. Yes, sir."

Mrs. Osborne was actually introduced to the appellant as a prospective purchaser the day following the execution of the broker's contract. She testified:

> "Q. Have you met the defendant, Mr. Krehmke? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. Where did you meet him? A. At his place at home.
> "Q. At his ranch near Gridley? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. When did you see him first? A. It was the 6th of April * * *
> "Q. What was the occasion of your calling at that place? A. I came to look at the place.
> "Q. Had you been apprised of the price? A. Yes, I knew the price."

April 13th respondent wrote a letter to the appellant notifying him that he had procured a purchaser in the person of Mrs. Osborne, who was able and willing to buy the property on the exact terms of the contract, enumerating these terms specifically. As a postscript to this letter, Mrs. Osborne signed a written acceptance, in which she agreed to purchase the property "upon the terms contained in the written authorization dated April 5th, 1926." This communication, referring to and construed with the original contract of April 5, 1926, constituted a sufficient written agreement on the part of the customer to bind the appellant to pay the agreed broker's commissions.

[6-8] It is not the purpose of the law to adhere to a rule of evidence in proof of the ability and readiness of a customer to purchase the property so stringent as to encourage an owner to breach his contract without just cause. In the case of Pellaton v. Brunski, 69 Cal. App. 306, 231 P. 585, it is said:

> "The burden * * * is upon the broker to prove his case, but in assuming this burden no higher degree of evidence is required of him than in any other case, and the same principles apply to the weight and character of the evidence."

While, in the absence of an actual consummation of sale, it is necessary to prove that either a written agreement to purchase has been signed by the customer, or that the parties have been brought together by the broker so as to enable the owner to close the sale, all that is required is such satisfactory evidence of these acts as would suffice to prove any other material fact. The statement made by Mrs. Osborne that, "I have agreed * * * to purchase the property * * *," considered in view of the written contract, communications and circumstances involved in this transaction, should be construed to mean, "I do agree * * * to purchase the property * * * upon the terms contained in the written authorization dated April 5th, 1926." There is no uncertainty of this language employed. It is apparent that Mrs. Osborne intended to thereby notify the appellant she was consenting to buy the property upon the terms mentioned in respondent's contract for broker's commissions, and that she had the means with which to do so, and had deposited the sum of $500 with the broker to bind the bargain. We are of the opinion that this communication is a sufficient compliance with the rule requiring a written agreement of purchase to be signed by the customer.

[9, 10] The appellant complains of the rulings of the court sustaining objections to his cross-examination or Mrs. Osborne, most important among which was the following question:

> "Did you ever see Mr. Krehmke and offer to buy his property on the basis of the authorization?"

This was a proper question tending to indicate a presence or absence of willingness on her part to purchase the property. It cannot be said to be prejudicial error, however, for the reason that it was not necessary that she should have personally interviewed the appellant and offered to buy the property. She could have just as conclusively bound herself to purchase the property dealing only with appellant's agent, the broker. If the purpose of this question was to refute the evidence that she had been taken into the presence of the appellant, the question was misleading because it included the unnecessary element to the effect that she had then offered to buy the property. The requirement of the law is that the parties shall have been brought together, only so that the owner may have the opportunity of closing the bargain. Other questions along this line were complex and misleading, and while answers to them might well have been permitted, we are of the opinion that reversible error was not committed in sustaining objections to these questions. Likewise, an objection was sustained to a question propounded to the appellant, as follows:

"Did Mr. Ramsdell ever bring Mrs. Osborne to your place after April 5th, 1926, for the purpose of consummating any deal to buy that place?"

It is apparent that it was not necessary for the broker to consummate the deal at the appellant's premises. His purpose in taking the customer to view the premises might properly be to merely interest her in the purchase of the property with a view to consummating the sale elsewhere and later. The answer to this question might properly have been permitted. The sustaining of this objection, however, was not prejudicial. The record discloses no error upon which to base a charge that the contract was procured by fraud. The appellant makes no serious effort to indicate that he relies upon this charge.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry A. Hollzer, Judge.

Action by C. L. Powell against the City of Los Angeles to recover interest on bonds and money withheld. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Emmet H. Wilson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Cecil A. Borden, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This action was commenced by plaintiff to recover from defendant interest on money unlawfully withheld from plaintiff by the city council of defendant. Defendant interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was sustained by the court, without leave to amend, and judgment was thereupon entered in favor of defendant. From this judgment, plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

Plaintiff, by appropriate allegations in his complaint, alleges the following facts:

In October, 1917, pursuant to the provisions of the Street Improvement Act of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 954), the city council of the city of Los Angeles passed an ordinance declaring its intention to order the construction of a tunnel in a portion of Second street in the city of Los Angeles, together with other improvements particularly described in said ordinance. Thereafter, pursuant to said Improvement Act the ordinance ordering the work was adopted. In these proceedings the city council declared that serial bonds should be issued to represent assessments of $25, or more, for the cost and expenses of said work or improvements; the said bonds to bear interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. Thereafter notices inviting proposals or bids for the doing of the work were published and posted, and at the time appointed therein bids were received for the work, among the same being a proposal from one John Hayes. In March, 1918, the contract for the performance of the work was awarded to the said John Hayes, and subsequently a contract was entered into between the defendant, city of Los Angeles, and the said John Hayes, whereby the latter agreed to perform the work for $995,773.21, which contract was accompanied by good and sufficient bonds in the amount required by law. Thereafter an assessment was levied upon the property in the assessment district, pursuant to which certain assessments were paid in cash, and by reason of the failure to pay certain other assessments in excess of $25, bonds were issued against the property upon which the assessments had been levied; the total amount of the bonds being $542,656.17. In March, 1921, pursuant to the provisions of said Improvement Act, the bonds were duly and regularly advertised for sale, and upon the date specified for the sale thereof bonds in the total sum of $8,497.07 were sold, leaving bonds unsold in the amount of $534,159.10. The bonds unsold, together with the cash received at the said sale, were placed in the "Second Street Tunnel Improvement Fund," and, pursuant to the terms of said statute, at all times thereafter were deemed and treated as "so much money in said fund."

Immediately after the sale of said bonds, the said John Hayes was notified by the city that there was sufficient money and bonds in the special fund, devoted to said improvement to pay the price agreed by said contract to be paid, and within 20 days after receipt of said notice the said John Hayes commenced work on said improvement, and thereafter the said work was completed and the same was accepted as completed by the city council of said defendant on August 28, 1924. On January 9, 1922, by an assignment in writing, the said John Hayes assigned and transferred to the plaintiff herein all moneys and bonds then due, or that should thereafter become due, under the provisions of said contract, and authorized payment and delivery to plaintiff of all moneys and bonds then due, or that should thereafter become due, pursuant to said contract. On the same date the assignment was delivered to and filed with the board of public works, which board then had custody of the contract and also had charge and control of the improvements. The assignment was thereupon accepted and filed by the board of public works and attached to the contract.

During the progress of the work, portions thereof were from time to time accepted in the manner provided by law. Prior to the date of the assignment partial payments were made to Hayes, and subsequent to the date of the assignment partial payments were made to plaintiff, by warrants drawn on said improvement fund. On April 28, 1924, bonds had been paid by property owners in the total sum of $72,518.11, and between April 28, 1924, and August 28, 1924, other bonds were paid in the sum of $3,578.57, making a total of $76,096.68 in bonds which were paid in full prior to the acceptance of the work. On April 28, 1924, the city council adopted a resolution directing that all bonds then remaining in the said improvement fund, at their par value, should be issued and delivered to defendant, city of Los Angeles, by the treasurer of said city, and that the par value of said bonds in money should be transferred from the general fund of the city of Los Angeles to the special fund for the said improvements. Prior to April 28, 1924, the date of the adoption of said resolution, interest in the sum of $101,825.12 had been paid on account of the bonds in said fund, and between the said last-mentioned date and August 28, 1924, the date of the completion and acceptance of the work, additional interest had been paid in the sum of $14,874.88, making a total of $116,700 interest in the fund at the time of the completion and acceptance of the work. On August 28, 1924, the date of the acceptance of the work, the plaintiff as assignee of the contractor, was entitled to receive from the defendant, the said interest amounting to $116,700; also the said sum of $76,096.68, which had been paid by the property owners in full payment of bonds upon their respective properties; also the sum of $1,957.05, which was the remaining portion of the cash originally paid into the fund, making a total of $194,753.73, which the plaintiff should have received from the defendant on August 28, 1924.

The defendant refused to pay any portion of said sum to plaintiff until April 25, 1925. and then paid the said sum to plaintiff solely by reason of a writ of mandate issued out of the District Court of Appeal in and for the Second Appellate District. Powell v. Allan, 70 Cal. App. 663, 234 P. 339. Under this mandate of the court, all the bonds and money above referred to, together with all accrued interest thereon, were delivered and paid over to plaintiff by defendant.

Plaintiff brought this action for the purpose of recovering interest from defendant, city of Los Angeles, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, on the total amount withheld by it, from August 28, 1924, the date of the completion and acceptance of the work, to April 25, 1925, the date that actual payment was made to plaintiff.

In the opinion in Powell v. Allan, supra, rendered on January 21, 1925, this court held that the city council of the city of Los Angeles was without right or power to adopt the resolution of April 28, 1924, purporting to transfer the bonds to the city of Los Angeles, and to transfer an amount in money equal to the face value of the bonds from the general fund of the city into the said special improvement fund, and ordered a peremptory writ of mandate to issue, requiring the officials of the city of Los Angeles to deliver the bonds to the plaintiff in payment pro tanto of the balance of the contract price for the work done. This mandate of the court, however, as above stated, was not complied with until April 25, 1925.

Plaintiff contends that he is entitled to interest from the city of Los Angeles on the amount so withheld, from the time it became due and payable until the time the same was actually paid. We think that the law of this state prohibits plaintiff's recovery.

The case of Engebretson v. City of San Diego, 185 Cal. 475, 197 P. 651, was an action to recover the balance of the contract price for certain street improvements, together with interest thereon, from the time the obligation accrued, and the court said:

"In order to recover interest against a municipality there must be some statutory provi> sion authorizing it. The rule is thus stated in Ruling Case Law (15 R. C. L. § 14, p. 17): 'It is well settled, both on principle and authority, that a state cannot be held to the payment of interest on its debts unless bound by an act of the legislature or by a lawful contract of its executive officers made within the scope of their duly constituted authority. This principle applies to bonds, claims, judgments and warrants. The theory upon which the rule is based is that whenever interest is allowed either by statute or by common law, except in cases where there has been a contract to pay interest, it is allowed for delay or default of the debtor. But delay or default cannot be attributed to the government. It is presumed to be always ready to pay what it owes. The apparently favored position of the government in this respect has been declared to be demanded by public policy.' * * * The same reasons apply with equal force to a municipal corporation, although the authorities are not uniform on this subject. 15 R. C. L. § 15, p. 18. Appellant relies upon sections 1915 and 1917 of the Civil Code to establish his right to recover interest, but in Savings, etc., Society v. San Francisco, 131 Cal. 356, 363, 63 P. 665, it was held that these sections do not apply to the state or any of its subdivisions. The court there stated: 'The code sections cited relate to interest as compensation or damage between parties to an action, and the language of the statute is general and does not include the state or any of its political subdivisions. The state is not bound by general words of a statute which would operate to establish a right of action against it. Mayrhofer v. Board of Education, 89 Cal. 110, 26 P. 646, 23 Am. St. Rep. 451; Whittaker v. County of Tuolumne, 96 Cal. 100, 30 P. 1016. The action here is brought under a new section of the Political Code—3819—in which no provision is made for the payment of interest. Stats. 1895, p. 335.' This case was followed in Columbia Sav. Bank v. Los Angeles, 137 Cal. 467, 471, 70 P. 308, in Miller v. Kern Co., 150 Cal. 797, 90 P. 119, and in Spencer v. Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 103, 115, 179 P. 163. * * * We conclude, therefore, that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover interest and that his remedy to avoid delay was by mandamus to compel the auditor to issue the warrants and thus secure payment."

The case of Savings & Loan Society v. City and County of San Francisco, 131 Cal. 356, 63 P. 665, was an action to recover certain taxes paid under protest, together with interest thereon from the date of the payment of the taxes, and in denying plaintiff's right to interest the court said:

> "It is claimed that the court erred in not allowing interest from date of payment of the tax under protest [citing Civ. Code, §§ 1915, 1917; Perley on the Law of Interest, § 135]. The Code sections cited relate to interest as compensation or damage between parties to an action, and the language of the statute is general and does not include the state or any of its political subdivisions. * * * "

The case of McNutt v. City of Los Angeles, 187 Cal. 259, 201 P. 592, was an action brought to recover judgment against the city of Los Angeles for damages resulting in changing the grade of streets bordering on plaintiff's lot, together with interest thereon from the date that such damage accrued. Judgment was given to plaintiff for the principal sum but interest denied him, and he appealed on the ground that the court erred in not including interest in the amount of the judgment, and the court, among other things, said:

> "As against the state or a municipality thereof interest cannot be recovered except under special statutory authorization," citing Engebretson v. City of San Diego, supra; Savings & Loan Society v. San Francisco, supra.

The case of Reclamation District v. Reclamation Board, 197 Cal. 502, 241 P. 560, was a proceeding in mandamus to compel the reclamation board in the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district to allow and provide for the payment of certain sums alleged to be due, together with interest thereon, arising out of the construction of certain levees, and in denying the right of plaintiff to recover interest the Supreme Court said:

> "* * * the petitioner insists upon the application of the rule laid down in section 1915 et seq. of the Civil Code, relating to the payment of interest for the detention or forbearance in the payment of liquidated sums of money. This rule, while doubtless applicable to ordinary debtors, has no application to state agencies or political subdivisions, the liabilities of which are entirely regulated by the statutes providing for their creation and the limitations of their powers. This question is practically set at rest by the decision of this court in the case of Engebretson v. City of San Diego, 185 Cal. 475, 197 P. 651, wherein the doctrine as laid down in Ruling Case Law (15 R. C. L. § 14, p. 17) * * * was approved. * * *"

Appellant contends that in the instant case the city was not liable at any stage of the proceedings for any portion of the contract price of the work, and for that reason the rule established by the foregoing authorities has no application.

[1] It is true that the contract between the city of Los Angeles and John Hayes provided:

> "That in no case, except where otherwise provided in the Improvement Act, or in the contract itself, will the city of Los Angeles, or any officer thereof, be liable for any portion of the expense of the work aforesaid, or of any delinquency of persons or property assessed."

The city was acting merely as a trustee in collecting and disbursing the funds, but the exacting of interest from the city for withholding the funds would be the imposition of a penalty for which, under the above authorities, the city of Los Angeles would not be liable.

[2, 3] Appellant loses sight of the fact that the city of Los Angeles does not now hold in its possession any bonds, money or interest that belongs to plaintiff under the contract. Appellant is seeking to recover damages in the form of interest from the city of Los Angeles, and from no one else, on money and bonds for the period the same were withheld from him. This he cannot do in the absence of a special agreement or statute authorizing the collection of interest on the money and bonds so withheld. Appellant's only remedy against a municipality in such a case is by mandamus proceedings. Engebretson v. San Diego, supra. Appellant, however, does not claim any agreement by which the city was to pay the interest demanded, nor does he claim there is any special statutory authorization for the collection of interest.

[4] The city council of Los Angeles had no authority to retain the bonds and the money in its possession during the time complained of and its act in so doing was without authority, wrongful and unlawful. The retention of said money by the city council, without lawful authority, was ultra vires and therefore void, for which the municipal corporation of the city of Los Angeles cannot be held liable. Healdsburg Electric Light & Power Co. v. City of Healdsburg, 5 Cal. App. 558, 90 P. 955; Foxen v. City of Santa Barbara, 166 Cal. 77, 134 P. 1142. In the latter case the Supreme Court said:

> "It is undoubtedly the rule that a municipal corporation is not liable for the deeds or omissions of its servants done ultra vires. And this is true whether they acted with or without the express command of the municipality."

We are of the opinion that appellant is not entitled to recover interest from the city of Los Angeles on the money and bonds so withheld from him.

The judgment is affirmed.

BAILEY v. JAMES. (Civ. 5384.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 17, 1928.

1. Brokers 🔑55(2)—Abandonment of agreement for exchange of properties, and subsequent consummation of deal directly with third party after refusing to deal with broker, did not defeat broker's right to commission.

Defendant who entered into agreement with third party for purchase of property, as result of efforts of real estate agent, held liable for commissions, though original exchange agreement was abandoned by mutual consent, where defendant, after refusing to complete exchange through instrumentality of broker, closed transaction directly with third party.

2. Evidence 🔑314(1)—Court did not err in striking defendant's hearsay testimony.

Trial court did not commit error in striking out testimony given by defendant which was merely hearsay.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Action by Robert T. Bailey against David J. James. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Horace E. Vedder, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Vincent Hannon and T. G. Dalton, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. The salient facts affecting this appeal were that defendant, who was the owner of certain real property, employed plaintiff and his assignor as agents to negotiate an exchange thereof. Thereafter, through the efforts of plaintiff and his assignor, and in pursuance of such employment, an agreement was entered into between defendant and a Mrs. Robertson by which defendant agreed to exchange his real property for certain real properties or interests therein of which Mrs. Robertson was the owner, and she agreed to exchange her several properties for that owned by the defendant. In the same agreement defendant agreed to pay to plaintiff and his assignor the sum of $1,000 as a commission for effecting such exchange. Following the usual custom in such matters, the respective parties then placed the matter in escrow with a title company, with appropriate instructions with reference thereto. Four or five days thereafter, on account of some misunderstanding on her part with reference to the assignability of a lease which existed on the property belonging to defendant, Mrs. Robertson announced to plaintiff and defendant that she "could not go through with the deal"; to which remark defendant responded that he "didn't care very much for the deal, and it is all right." At the same time he orally agreed that he would "release her (Mrs. Robertson's) lots," the interest in which theretofore had been assigned to him, but which he thereafter failed to do. Within a period of three or four days following the above-mentioned circumstance, defendant made the statement to plaintiff:

> "Mr. Bailey (plaintiff), I want that deal; I believe it is a good deal; I believe Mrs. Robertson might go ahead with it."

Thereupon plaintiff again approached Mrs. Robertson with reference to the proposed exchange, and obtained her consent "to go ahead with the deal." By this time, however, several weeks had elapsed since the original agreement to exchange the respective properties of the interested parties was effected. After many excuses and evasions on the part of defendant, he finally refused to complete the transaction. However, the original escrow was never canceled, nor did defendant ever "release," or reassign, to Mrs. Robertson the interests in the several properties which she had transferred to him when the escrow was initiated. Approximately three weeks after defendant's refusal to complete the exchange, he personally reopened negotiations with Mrs. Robertson respecting an exchange of their respective properties, with the result that the transaction was finally completed. With reference thereto, Mrs. Robertson testified that, at the time the exchange was actually made, in substance the terms of the first agreement were practically identical with those of the second. She further testified that, as a matter of fact, in the course of adjusting details concerning payments on properties covered by trust deeds, etc., "Mr. James did get two or three hundred dollars the best of me; but I was alone and excited and didn't notice that." It further appears from the evidence that the second agreement to exchange the properties was the culmination of the avowed plan on the part of defendant to avoid the payment of any commission to plaintiff and his assignor. After the completion of the transaction, defendant refused to pay any commission to plaintiff and his assignor. An action instituted by plaintiff resulted in a judgment in his favor, from which defendant appeals.

[1] On the ground that the evidence was insufficient, appellant specifies error as to each of several findings of fact made by the trial court. Although no special argument has been presented by appellant with reference thereto, after an examination of the record herein, it satisfactorily appears that the evidence is ample to support each of the findings of fact to which attention has been directed. However, the main point made by appellant is that (as claimed by him) it appeared that the original exchange agreement was abandoned and that therefore no liability was incurred by defendant in his subsequent act which resulted in the exchange being thereafter consummated. Although some general authorities are cited in support of the principle for which appellant contends, this court is of the opinion that in circumstances such as are here presented, in conformity with the rule as announced in the analogous case of Dunne v. Colomb, 192 Cal. 742, 747, 221 P. 912, the liability of defendant is absolute.

[2] Appellant complains that the trial court erred in striking out certain testimony given by defendant on the trial of the action. As it clearly appears that the evidence to which appellant refers was hearsay, no error was committed by the trial court in that regard.

The judgment is affirmed.

95 Cal. App. 85

GLADIUM CO., Inc., v. THATCHER.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 20, 1928.

1. Evidence ⟹417(16)—In action for price of steel, refusal to permit defendant to show that omitted name of shipper in shipping receipt covering steel was that of defendant corporation held error.

In action for purchase price of steel sold and delivered, in which defendant offered shipping receipt covering steel in which name of shipper was omitted, refusal to permit defendant to show that omitted name of shipper was that of defendant corporation held prejudicial error, since this was material evidence to establish delivery.

2. Evidence ⟹408(1)—Receipts for money or goods may be explained by parol evidence.

It is invariable rule that mere receipts for money or goods, as well as bills of lading, are subject to explanation by parol evidence.

3. Sales ⟹178(4)—One taking delivery of personal property, paying transportation charges, and using it or conveying it to another for consideration, cannot deny acceptance.

One who takes delivery of personal property, pays freight charges for transportation, and either uses it for his own benefit or conveys it to another for consideration, is estopped from denying acceptance of property.

4. Sales 🔑178(3)—Consignee is deemed to have accepted goods not promptly rejected.

It is duty of consignee to promptly reject goods which are shipped to him, or he will be deemed to have accepted them.

5. Sales 🔑200(3)—Where buyer reserves right of inspection, title does not pass till after reasonable opportunity to inspect goods, but right of inspection must be promptly exercised.

Where goods are not shipped f. o. b., and right of inspection is reserved, title does not pass till buyer has had reasonable opportunity to inspect goods, but, in absence of agreement, right of inspection must be promptly exercised.

6. Sales 🔑177—Consignee of goods, which are defective or shipped without sale agreement, holds property for owner, but must exercise reasonable care to preserve from loss or damage.

Where goods are shipped without agreement to purchase, or are materially defective, they need not be accepted, and consignee becomes bailee, holding property for owner's benefit, and, while he need not necessarily return property, he must exercise reasonable care to preserve against loss or damage.

7. Sales 🔑168½(9)—Buyer must exercise reasonable care to preserve goods for seller's benefit, notwithstanding attempted rejection by letter after goods were shipped.

Buyer's letter, written to seller after goods were shipped, in which attempt was made to reject goods, did not relieve buyer from exercising reasonable care to preserve property for benefit of seller, on delivery to him.

8. Principal and agent 🔑137(1)—Person appropriating property, or accepting benefits of transaction, with knowledge of circumstances, cannot deny authority of agent through whom it was consummated (Civ. Code, § 2310).

Where, with full knowledge of circumstances, one appropriates property or accepts benefits of transaction, he will be estopped from denying authority of agent through whom it was consummated, under Civ. Code, § 2310.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by the Gladium Company, Inc., against F. M. Thatcher. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 267 P. 1118.

J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, for appellant.

Guy R. Kennedy, of San Francisco, and George F. Jones, of Oroville, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action for the purchase price of 4,501 pounds of steel, alleged to have been sold and delivered.

[1] The appellant is a corporation of the state of New York. Through its agent, an order for the purchase of steel bars for foundry use was obtained from an employee of the respondent August 1, 1922. This order was written upon a form furnished by the respondent in the following language:

> "Office of F. M. Thatcher. Order No. 8180. Sterling City, Cal., Aug. 1, 1922; To Gladium Company. Please forward supplies listed below, to Sterling City, Calif.; Invoice to Sterling City. Ship by S. P. Co., 4 bars 1"x10" soft steel bumpers for car bunks; 4 bars ½"x10" for plates; 2 bars 2½"x10" round for hooks. Price 20¢ per pound. Approved, C. A. Williams, Manager."

On August 16, 1922, this order was shipped from New York by way of the Panama Canal. The evidence satisfactorily shows that this steel was delivered to respondent's mills, in Sterling City, December 29, 1922. On January 1, 1923, for a consideration, respondent's mills, together with all equipment and supplies were transferred to the Diamond Match Company. This shipment of steel was never returned to the appellant, nor was it accounted for by the respondent. The evidence tends to prove that it was in fact conveyed to the Diamond Match Company upon the sale of respondent's mills. On September 22, 1922, after the steel had been shipped from New York, but before its arrival at Sterling City, the respondent wrote the appellant, charging it with having procured the order for steel by means of misrepresentations, refusing to accept the shipment, and declaring that upon its arrival the steel would be immediately returned.

The respondent contends that his agent, Williams, had no authority to order the steel, and that he had no knowledge of its actual delivery, and did not know what had become of it. For years, however, Williams had acted as respondent's bookkeeper and manager. A serious doubt is raised by the record as to whether an ostensible agency may not have existed, which would have authorized the purchase of steel by Williams. He admitted that he signed the order for the steel, but asserted that he was persuaded to do so through the misrepresentations employed by the appellant's agent. Upon delivery of the goods, Williams also paid the Southern Pacific Company's freight bill for transportation. Regarding his knowlege of the delivery and disposition of the steel, the respondent himself testified:

> "Q. I want to find out what became of the steel [which was] delivered? A. I can tell you; the Diamond Match Company got it—no doubt they got that steel.
> "The Court (interrupting): Q. Do you know whether it did or not? A. I don't know; to tell the truth, I don't know.'
> "Mr. Goldstein (interrogating the witness for appellant): Q. When you quit business on the 1st day of January, 1923, did you turn over all the property you had to the Diamond Match Company for a consideration? A. Yes sir.

"Q. And that included all the steel you had on hand, and all the merchandise? A. Everything used in the operations."

In further proof of the delivery of the steel in question, Mr. J. B. Barnes, the local agent of the Southern Pacific Company at Sterling City testified that ten bars of steel corresponding to the description of the goods in the written order and weighing 4,501 pounds, was delivered at respondent's mills December 29, 1922. A receipt for the identical number of bars and the exact weight of the steel ordered was signed by respondent's agent Williams on that date, and was offered in evidence. Concerning appellant's offer of this shipping receipt, the following proceedings occurred in the examination of the agent Barnes:

"Q. I show you a paper and ask you if that is the original receipt for the steel at Sterling City? A. Yes, sir. * * *"

Thereupon it was offered in evidence. The respondent objected to the offer on the ground that the receipt failed to identify the specific bars of steel in question, and because it did not contain the name of the shipper. Appellant's attorney then offered to prove by this witness that the omitted name of the shipper was that of the appellant corporation, but was denied this privilege. Upon this subject the following colloquy occurred. The court asked the witness Barnes:

"Q. Did you testify that this was a shipment of the Gladium Company? A. I can explain this to you. No; I didn't testify that it was delivered by the Gladium Company—the freight bill doesn't show that.

"The Court: That is all.

"Mr. Goldstein: Have him explain [that]; he can explain about that receipt.

"The Court: That must stand on its face. * * * He cannot explain it. The motion is overruled."

Mr. Goldstein then suggested that he could definitely prove that the steel bars described in the shipping receipt were the identical bars shipped from the Gladium Company to the respondent, and that the inventory of the stock transferred from the respondent to the Diamond Match Company would show that it received this steel. He said:

"Now, if your honor please, in view of your last question, I desire to state that I can definitely establish (the fact that) this steel was turned over to the Diamond Match Company, and, also, that it is the identical steel delivered by the Gladium Company, and I would like the court to give me a chance to do that. * * *"

To this request the court replied: "The motion is overruled."

From a fair reading of the record, there appears to be no reasonable doubt that the identical steel was in fact delivered to the respondent the day before his mill, equipment, and materials were conveyed to the Diamond Match Company for a consideration. Evidently the respondent himself believed this to be true. It was prejudicial error to deny the appellant the privilege of supplying the name of the shipper which was omitted from the receipt, for this was material evidence to establish the delivery of the steel. Both the questions regarding the delivery to, and the disposition of the property by, the respondent were material in determining whether there was a legal acceptance of the property. The court found that the steel in question was neither sold nor delivered to the respondent.

[2-7] It is an invariable rule that mere receipts for money or goods, as well as bills of lading, are subject to explanation by parol evidence. 4 Jones, Comm. on Evidence, p. 2985, § 1630; Id., p. 3030, § 1652; Comptoir D'Escompte de Paris v. Dresbach, 78 Cal. 15, 20 P. 28; San Pedro Lumber Co. v. Schroeter, 156 Cal. 158, 103 P. 888; Winans v. Hassey, 48 Cal. 634; Hawley & Co. v. Bader & Co., 15 Cal. 44.

Had the appellant been permitted to establish, not only the delivery of the steel to the respondent, but also his disposition of it, this evidence would furnish persuasive proof of acceptance. One who takes the delivery of personal property, pays the freight charges for its transportation, and either uses it for his own benefit or conveys it to another for a consideration, will be estopped from denying acceptance of the property. It is the duty of a consignee to promptly reject goods which are shipped to him, or he will be deemed to have accepted them. It is true that when goods are not shipped f. o. b., and the right of inspection is reserved by the buyer, the title does not pass until he has had a reasonable opportunity to inspect the goods. In 23 Ruling Case Law, 1433, § 256, it is said:

"Where goods are shipped by car or vessel, it seems to be generally recognized that the buyer is not required to make his inspection before removal of the goods from the car or vessel, but may remove them to a warehouse for such purpose, and such removal for the purpose of inspection alone does not constitute an acceptance."

But, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, this right of inspection must be promptly exercised. Jackson v. Porter Land & Water Co., 151 Cal. 32, 39, 90 P. 122; Imperial Gas Engine Co. v. Auteri, 40 Cal. App. 419, 424, 180 P. 946; 52 A. L. R. 608, note. When goods are shipped without an agreement to purchase, or when they are materially defective in quality or quantity, as contrasted with the terms of the contract, they need not be accepted, and under such circumstances, the seller becomes a mere volunteer with respect to the shipment, while the consignee then becomes a bailee holding the property for the benefit of the owner, and while he need not necessarily return the property to the shipper, he must exercise reasonable care to preserve the property against loss or damage. 2 Williston on Sales (2d Ed.) 1295, § 497.

In the present case, an attempt was made on the part of the respondent to reject the goods, as his letter of September 22, 1922, indicates. But that letter was written after the goods were shipped from New York, and while they were in transit. This would not relieve the respondent from exercising reasonable care to preserve the property for the benefit of the appellant upon its delivery to him. Retaining the property or conveying it for a consideration are acts indicating that he treated the property as his own, and would amount to an acceptance which would make the respondent liable for their value. Jones v. Werthan Bag Co. (Mo.) 254 S. W. 4; Reading Steel Casting Co. v. U. S., 268 U. S. 186, 45 S. Ct. 469, 69 L. Ed. 907. In 23 Ruling Case Law, 1434, § 257, it is said:

> "Without doubt the buyer's retention of the goods beyond a reasonable time for examination and communication with the seller, standing alone, will be regarded as warranting the conclusion that he has accepted the goods and thus become liable, especially if the delay has worked prejudice to the seller. * * * Receipt (of the goods) will become acceptance if the right of rejection is not exercised within a reasonable time, or if anything has been done by the buyer which he would have no right to do unless he were the owner of the goods." 23 R. C. L. 1436, § 259.

[8] The respondent contends that his manager, Williams, had no authority to purchase the steel in question. The record raises a serious doubt as to whether an ostensible agency for that purpose may not have existed. But, regardless of whether an ostensible agency existed, when, with full knowledge of the circumstances, one appropriates the property, or accepts the benefits of a transaction, he will be estopped from denying the authority of his agent through whom it was consummated. Section 2310, Civ. Code; Gardner v. City of Glendale, 45 Cal. App. 641, 188 P. 307; Tomasini v. Smith, 26 Cal. App. 227, 146 P. 691. The record in the present case does not affirmatively show that the respondent had personal knowledge of the entire transaction, and the last-mentioned principal is merely announced for guidance of the court upon a new trial. In Gribble v. Columbus Brewing Co., 100 Cal. 67, 34 P. 527, it is said:

> "That which a principal may authorize an agent to perform he may ratify when performed by the latter without authority. And where, with full knowledge of all the facts involved, a principal reaps the fruits of the unauthorized contract of his agent, and for some time yields acquiescence to its provisions, he will be deemed to have ratified it, and will be estopped, as against one who has fully performed the contract on his part, from repudiating it to the injury of the latter."

And in Lawrence v. Johnson, 131 Cal. 175, 63 P. 176, it was likewise held, where an officer had no power to assign certain pledges as security for a debt, that the principal could not retain the money received on the transfer of the pledges, and at the same time repudiate the transaction. In the present case, the respondent could not retain the proceeds of a sale of the steel bars in question, and at the same time deny the purchase thereof.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment should be reversed; and it is so ordered.

COOVER et ux. v. COX et al. (Civ. 5281.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 16, 1928.

1. Principal and agent ⚷146(2)—Person, to excuse himself from responsibility on contract on ground of agency, must disclose principal, unless already known.

If person would excuse himself from responsibility on ground of agency, he must disclose his principal at time of making contract, unless already known, so as to enable party with whom he deals to have recourse to principal, in case agent had authority to bind him.

2. Principal and agent ⚷146(1)—Agent, failing to disclose principal, becomes personally liable when principal is not known, or agent exceeds his powers.

Agent, failing to disclose his principal at time of making contract, becomes personally liable when principal is not known, or when agent exceeds his powers.

3. Brokers ⚷96—Broker required by receipt to retain deposit on purchase price until some termination of deal held agent of purchaser in retaining deposit.

Where by terms of receipt given by real estate broker on deposit on purchase price by purchaser, broker was to retain deposit until some termination of deal, rather than to immediately deliver deposit to owner, held, that broker was agent of purchaser in retaining deposit.

4. Brokers ⚷96—Broker holds money paid to him by purchaser as agent of purchaser, and misappropriation thereof is loss of purchaser, and not seller.

A real estate broker has no authority to accept money offered by purchaser to conclude sale, and, when purchaser pays money into hands of broker, latter holds such money as agent of purchaser, and not of seller, and any misappropriation thereof is loss of former, and not latter.

5. Brokers 🔑4—On broker's failure to return deposit made in 1923 on demand therefor in 1924, defalcation is presumed to have occurred in 1924, and covered by 1924 bond (Gen. Laws, Act 112, § 9a).

Where, under provisions of deposit receipt given by broker for deposit on purchase price made by purchaser in 1923, broker was not required to return deposit until demand was made, and such demand was made in 1924, for which year broker was obliged to get a new license, held, that failure of broker to return deposit was covered by bond required by Gen. Laws, Act 112, § 9a, which was effective for year 1924, since, in absence of evidence as to when defalcation occurred, it will be presumed that it occurred in 1924.

6. Appeal and error 🔑926(5)—Trial court is presumed, in absence of contrary showing, to have admitted in evidence receipt, exclusion of which would have been error.

Actions of trial court being presumed to be regular, appellate court will presume, in absence of showing to contrary, that trial court admitted in evidence receipt, exclusion of which would have been error, though there is no formal order in record admitting such receipt in evidence.

7. Brokers 🔑4—Deposit receipt, given on deposit on purchase price, held properly admitted in evidence as obligation of broker.

Deposit receipt, given in return for deposit on purchase price, was properly received in evidence as obligation of broker, where broker testified that check representing deposit was delivered to him by salesman, that he cashed check, received copy of receipt, and that its conditions were those under which he accepted check.

8. Frauds, statute of 🔑71—Sales deposit receipt held not an "agreement for sale of real estate," invalid unless authority of agent is in writing, subscribed by party to be charged (Civ. Code, § 1624).

Sales deposit receipt, constituting contract between purchaser making deposit and real estate broker as agent of purchaser, for deposit of funds to be used as therein designated, otherwise to be returned to plaintiffs, held not an "agreement for sale of real estate," within Civ. Code, § 1624, so as to render it invalid, unless authority of agent is in writing, subscribed by party to be charged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Action by C. S. Coover and his wife against Vincent J. Cox and the American Surety Company of New York. Judgment for plaintiffs, and the Surety Company appeals. Affirmed.

John M. Hall, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. O. Leake, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIL, Justice pro tem. On December 6, 1923, the plaintiffs delivered to a real estate salesman, named Washire, in the office of defendant Cox, a check for $1,000 as a deposit upon the purchase price of certain real estate, and received from Washire a "sales deposit receipt" signed "Vincent J. Cox, Agent, by Vincent J. Cox Pr H W." The check was cashed by defendant Cox. The sales deposit receipt provided for the payment of the balance of the purchase price in cash through escrow upon delivery of a deed and a guaranty of title showing title to be in the vendor "free and clear also unrestricted."

On December 31, 1923, the broker's license of defendant Cox expired and in connection with his license for 1924 he and the appellant surety company, as surety, executed to the people of the state a real estate broker's bond, as required by section 9a, General Laws, Act 112. The condition of the bond was that the defendant Cox would comply with said law and would faithfully perform every undertaking entered into by him as a licensed real estate broker. It also authorized the plaintiffs to commence and maintain an action against appellant for the recovery of any damages sustained by the failure of the broker to perform his duties or any of them.

On January 5, 1924, plaintiffs received a letter from the title company, stating that the property was subject to certain building restrictions, and it is conceded that these restrictions were contrary to the terms of sale. A day or two later the plaintiffs made oral demand on Cox for the return of the $1,000, and on February 4, 1924, plaintiffs made a written demand, but the deposit was never returned. Thereafter this action was commenced against the defendants, and judgment obtained. It is from this judgment the appeal is taken.

[1, 2] It is the contention of the appellant that there has been no breach of the bond executed by the surety company, because the breach of duty, if any, was the breach of the owner of the property, and not of the defendant Cox. An examination of the sales deposit receipt shows that it does not state the name of the owner of the property therein described, nor in any way disclose the principal, if any, for whom defendant Cox might be acting, and there is substantial evidence that plaintiffs did not know the name of the alleged owner until two days after making the deposit. It is well settled that, if a person would excuse himself from responsibility on the ground of agency, he must disclose his principal at the time of making the contract, unless already known, so as to enable the party with whom he deals to have recourse to the principal in case the agent had authority to bind him. On the other hand, an agent becomes personally liable when the principal is not known, or when the agent exceeds his powers. Murphy v. Helmrich, 66 Cal. 69, 4 P. 958; Tafft v. Presidio, etc., R. R.

[3, 4] Among other things, the receipt provided that the sale of the property, upon the terms therein set forth, should be agreed to and accepted by the owner within five days from date, or the deposit refunded upon demand, and that if, during the course of the search of the title of the property, any defect should be discovered whereby the property could not be conveyed as agreed, then the amount therein receipted for should be returned to the purchaser upon demand, but if the purchaser did not complete the purchase as therein provided for, the said deposit should thereupon be paid, less the commission of the agents, to the owner. It thus appears by the very terms of the deposit receipt itself that defendant Cox was to retain the deposit until some termination of the deal, rather than to immediately deliver the deposit to the owner of the property. In this respect defendant Cox was the agent of the purchaser.

Even in the absence of the above provisions, defendant Cox would have been the agent of the purchaser under a new line of decisions. "It is of course elementary that the authority of a real estate broker is only to produce a purchaser who is willing to contract with the seller upon the terms prescribed, and that such a broker has no authority to accept money offered by the purchaser to conclude the sale; and when the purchaser pays money into the hands of the broker in such a case the broker holds it as the agent of the purchaser and not of the seller, and any misappropriation thereof is the loss of the former and not the latter." Hicks v. Wilson, 197 Cal. 269, 240 P. 289; Gold v. Phelan, 58 Cal. App. 471, 208 P. 1001.

[5] Appellant next contends that the undertaking, if any, on the part of Cox, with respect to the return of the deposit, was entered into on December 6, 1923, and therefore not covered by the bond, which was effective for the year 1924. As already stated, the bond in question also authorized the plaintiffs to commence and maintain an action against appellant for the recovery of any damage sustained by the failure of the broker to perform his duties or any of them. By reason of the provisions of the "sales deposit receipt," there was no duty on the part of defendant Cox to return the deposit until demand was made upon him for it, and this demand was made during the year 1924. Again, Cox's authority as a broker ceased on December 31, 1923. Under the law he was obliged to get a new license to act as such for the year 1924. Upon the acceptance of his bond he was given in effect a new term of office; also in effect he renewed or re-entered into all of his unfinished and unexecuted undertakings. As his own successor he then assumed and took over all his unfinished business of the year 1923, including his undertaking with regard to the deposit. In the absence of all evidence as to when the defalcation occurred, it will be presumed that it occurred in the year 1924. The situation is analogous to that of a public official, who is required to give bond for the faithful performance of his duties. It is settled law that, where such an official has been in office for more than one term and has different bondsmen for the different terms, the bondsmen for the term during which a defalcation occurs are liable, regardless of when the money was first received by the official, or when the undertaking was first entered into, and, in the absence of all evidence as to when the defalcation occurred, it will be presumed that it occurred during his last term. Brandt on Suretyship and Guaranty (3d Ed.) vol. 2, §§ 650, 652, 653; Governor v. Robbins, 7 Ala. 79; Kelly v. State, 25 Ohio St. 567; Independent School Dist., etc., v. McDonald, 39 Iowa, 564.

[6] Appellant's next contention is that the sales deposit receipt was not received in evidence by the court, and therefore should not have been considered by the court. The receipt was offered in evidence under circumstances which entitled it to be received. When objections to its admission were made, the court said, "Mark it for identification, and I will consider the matter as to whether it will be allowed in or not." It would have been error on the part of the trial court to have excluded it; and while there seems to be no formal order in the record admitting the receipt in evidence, yet the findings expressly set out that the deposit was "to be held, used and disposed of in accordance with a certain agreement and receipt," etc., describing said sales deposit receipt. The actions of the trial court are presumed to be regular, and this court will presume that the trial court so acted in the instant case, in the absence of a showing to the contrary.

[7, 8] It is the final contention of appellant that the receipt could not have been properly received in evidence because it was not shown to have been the obligation of defendant Cox. Defendant Cox testified that his salesman, Washire, delivered the $1,000 check to him, that he cashed the check, that he also received a copy of the receipt at the time he received the check, and that the conditions of the receipt were the conditions under which he accepted the check.

Appellant contends that the deposit receipt is an agreement for the sale of real estate, and that under section 1624 of the Civil Code such a contract is invalid, unless the authority of the agent is in writing subscribed by the party to be charged, and that in this case there was no such writing. We have already found that the sales deposit receipt was a contract between the plaintiffs, on the one hand, and the defendant Cox, a real estate broker, as agent of plaintiffs, on the other, for the deposit of certain funds to be used as therein designated; otherwise, to be returned to the plaintiffs. An authorization to receipt for money and to agree to return the money on certain conditions is not within the provisions of section 1624 of the Civil Code.

LEWIS v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. et al. (Civ. 3640.)★

Rehearing Denied Dec. 14, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 10, 1929.

1. Carriers 🔑320(10)—Interurban electric railroad's negligence in operating car which struck prospective passenger held, under evidence, jury question.

In action for injury to prospective passenger struck by interurban electric car while crossing tracks at station, whether defendant was negligent in operation of the car held, under the evidence, a question of fact for determination of jury.

2. Carriers 🔑327—Prospective passenger was negligent, as matter of law, in stepping directly in front of approaching interurban car without looking, if "railroad station rule" was not involved.

Prospective passenger who stepped directly in front of one interurban electric car, and was injured while crossing tracks to board another car, was contributorily negligent as matter of law, if "railroad station rule" be left out of consideration, where, though he had seen car approaching, he did not look again, but continued crossing tracks looking continuously at car he desired to board, and headlight and lights within car which struck him were lit so that car could have been seen if he had looked.

3. Street railroads 🔑74—Ordinance held to limit speed of cars only when running on streets, not on private right of way.

City ordinance limiting speed of street cars and interurban cars to 20 miles an hour "along or across any street or portion of any street * * * provided, however, that provisions of this section shall not apply to the crossing of any street by any such car when the same is running upon a private right of way," if gate or flagman is regularly maintained thereat, held intended to limit speed of cars only when running on surface of streets, and is not applicable to cars running on private right of way.

4. Trial 🔑260(8)—Refusal of plaintiff's requested instruction as to interurban railroad's duty to avoid injuring him held not prejudicial, in view of full instructions thereon.

In action for injury to prospective passenger struck by interurban electric car while crossing tracks at station, refusal to instruct that defendant owed duty to plaintiff to use great care to avoid injuring him, and defining such case, held not prejudicial to plaintiff, where court fully instructed on such issues.

5. Trial 🔑296(4, 5)—Instruction, though stating too strongly prospective passenger's duty to have seen approaching interurban car, held not misleading, in view of other instructions.

Instruction that it was prospective passenger's duty to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, and to have seen the interurban car and heed its approach as an ordinarily prudent person would have done under the same circumstances, and that he could not recover for injury if his negligence in that respect contributed to accident, though stating too strongly plaintiff's duty to look and listen for approaching car, held not misleading, in view of other correct instructions.

6. Trial 🔑295(6)—Instructions that it was interurban railroad's duty to exercise great care in operating cars to avoid injuring prospective passenger held, when taken as a whole sufficiently favorable to passenger.

Instructions, which as a whole stated that it was interurban electric railroad company's duty to exercise great care in operation of its cars to avoid injury to prospective passengers at station, and that, in determining whether such a passenger exercised ordinary care for his safety, consideration must be given to his right to assume that defendant would so operate its car on tracks which passenger was required to cross as not to place him in peril, held as favorable statement of the law as injured passenger was entitled to.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Action by Parker M. Lewis against Pacific Electric Railway Company and another. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court: CURTIS, PRESTON, and LANGDON, JJ., voting for a transfer.

Munson T. Case and Tanner, Odell & Taft, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank Karr, E. E. Morris, and C. W. Cornell, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action against the defendants to recover damages for injuries sustained by him when struck by an electric car operated by the defendant corporation, which will be referred to herein as the defendant. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed from the judgment entered thereon.

The defendant operates a double-track electric railway between Los Angeles and Pasadena. For several hundred feet in both directions from the scene of the accident the tracks are upon the defendant's private right of way, which is about 34 feet in width, and lies immediately west of Pasadena avenue and in the city of Los Angeles. The distance between the tracks is 9 feet 10 inches, and the distance between the rails of each track is 5 feet 9 inches. The distance between the westerly curb of Pasadena avenue and the nearest rail is approximately 7 feet. Pasadena avenue is 59 feet in width. At the place of the accident the defendant maintains cement platforms about 53 feet in length, between the outer rails and the boundary lines of its right of way, with seats upon the westerly platform for the use of passengers. These platforms, referred to by the witness as the station, appear to be on a level with the tops of the rails, and the intervening space is filled with a mixture of cement and gravel to the same level. In going from Pasadena avenue to the westerly platform it is necessary, of course, to cross both tracks. Cars going in either direction stop on signal to receive and discharge passengers. About 186 feet in a southerly direction from the station the tracks curve to the right, skirting the foot of a hill. Between the tracks is a line of electric power poles. Commencing with the first pole south of and near the station and going in a southerly direction, the successive distances between the poles are, in round numbers, 49, 63, 49, 43, and 44 feet, These poles obstruct the view from the easterly platform to some extent, but the motorman in charge of the car which struck the plaintiff testified, that, "going north approaching that station I would say about 400 feet away you can see the station." The outbound cars from Los Angeles to Pasadena, use the easterly track and the inbound cars, the westerly one.

February 12, 1923, the plaintiff, who was then of the age of about 62 years and was a resident of Chicago, having been in Los Angeles for only 48 hours, took one of the defendant's outbound cars to the station mentioned and alighted on the easterly platform at 7:30 in the evening, thence going to the home of relatives in that vicinity. He returned to the station shortly before 10 o'clock the same evening for the purpose of boarding an inbound car. "It was dark and cloudy, and had been raining." In approaching the station, he walked in a southwesterly direction, diagonally across Pasadena avenue to the easterly platform, and stepped thence immediately in front of an outbound car, which struck him, causing the injuries of which he complains. The plaintiff testified:

> "There was an incoming car at that time on the track approaching that station and I noticed it. When I first noticed it, it was five or six hundred feet from the station. * * * I was intensely interested in getting the car that was coming from the north. I did glance down in a southerly direction and I did not at that time see any car coming from the southerly direction. * * * When I came to the platform I got upon it not far from the middle. * * * I was looking in the direction of * * * the car I wanted to take. At that time it was, say, a couple of hundred feet from me. * * * I immediately * * * proceeded to go across the tracks with the idea of getting to the other side of both tracks, so that I would be in a position to take the incoming car promptly when it arrived. * * * As soon as I had stepped over off the platform on to the track I saw this car coming from the south, or from Los Angeles, and before I could get across or get back it struck me. * * * It was 15 or 20 feet. * * * I did not hear the car coming from the south—did not hear any bell rung or any whistle. * * * My hearing then was good as it is now. * * * I had never been at this station before the time I got off at 7:30 that evening. At that time it was dark. At that time I paid no attention to the fact that there was a curve in the road just before reaching that station. I had not noticed such curve."

The plaintiff further testified that he "knew that cars operated back and forth" at that place; that when he looked to the left to see if an outbound car was approaching he was "not quite half way across Pasadena avenue"; and that thereafter until he stepped on the outbound track he was continuously "watching the incoming car." The headlight of the car which struck the plaintiff and the lights inside the car were on at the time of the accident. The atmospheric conditions were not such as to prevent the plaintiff from seeing such lights, because, according to his testimony, he saw the inbound car when it was 500 or 600 feet from the station. The evidence is conflicting as to whether the motorman sounded his gong as the car approached the station. It appears from the motorman's testimony that he gave no warning signal after rounding the curve, except at a time too late to avoid the accident. Estimates of the speed of the car range from 18 to 25 miles an hour.

[1, 2] Whether or not the defendant was negligent in the operation of the car was, under the evidence, clearly a question of fact for the determination of the jury. If the "railroad station rule" be left out of consideration, the plaintiff's own testimony shows, as a matter of law, that he was guilty of contributory negligence. Klusman v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 190 Cal. 441, 213 P. 38; Lord v. Stacy, 68 Cal. App. 517, 229 P. 874; Atkins v. Bouchet, 65 Cal. App. 94, 223 P. 87; Finkle v. Tait, 55 Cal. App. 425, 203 P. 1031; Ross v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 39 Cal. App. 658, 179 P. 538; Mayer v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 740, 173 P. 174. Appellant relies on Wilkinson v. United Railroads, 195 Cal. 185, 232 P. 131, as authority for his contention that the "railroad station rule" is applicable to the facts of this case. The court instructed the jury in accordance with such rule. Without expressing any opinion as to the merits of this contention, it will be assumed, for the purposes of this opinion, that such rule is so applicable, although in material respects the facts involved herein are unlike those of the Wilkinson Case.

[3] An ordinance of the city of Los Angeles limits the speed of street cars and interurban cars to 20 miles an hour "along or across any street or portion of any street in the city of Los Angeles; * * * provided, however, that the provisions of this section shall not apply to the crossing of any street by any such car when the same is running upon a private right of way if a gate is maintained at such crossing, or if a flagman is regularly stationed thereat, as a protection against accident." The court instructed the jury, in effect, that this ordinance has no application to the cars of the defendant while they are running on its private right of way. Appellant contends that the word "along" as used in the ordinance means "by the side of," or "in a line parallel with the length" of a street. If the ordinance were otherwise of doubtful meaning, the proviso therein makes it perfectly clear that it was the intention to limit the speed of cars only when they were running on the surface of streets.

[4] The court modified some of the instructions requested by the plaintiff, but the modification did not change the meaning thereof in any material respect. The court refused to instruct the jury that—

> At the time and place of the accident, "the defendant owed a duty to plaintiff to use great care to avoid injury to him; that is, such care as, under the situation and circumstances, a prudent and reasonable person, guided by such considerations as ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would use."

The court instructed the jury as follows:

> "The care that an ordinarily prudent person must use in the exercise of ordinary prudence in dealing with agencies that because of power or momentum or for any other reason are liable to do great injury is very much greater than under other circumstances. So an ordinarily prudent person may be called upon under some conditions to exercise great care."

At the request of the plaintiff the court instructed the jury that—

> Under the circumstances shown by the evidence, "the defendant was bound to exercise a higher degree of care in so operating its trains as not to endanger the safety of the plaintiff, than it would have been if plaintiff were crossing or about to cross its tracks at a crossing or other intermediate points, and failure so to do is negligence on the part of defendant."

In view of the foregoing instructions given by the court, it cannot be held that the plaintiff was prejudiced by the refusal to give the instruction requested by him.

[5, 6] In other instructions the court told the jury:

> That "the same duty was imposed on the plaintiff to prevent being injured as was imposed on the defendants to prevent injuring him, and if the plaintiff received his injuries directly and proximately through the mutual fault or negligence of himself and the motorman, then your verdict must be for the defendants"; that "a railroad track upon which cars are frequently run is of itself a warning * * * that it is unsafe to go upon the track without exercising reasonable diligence in order to be aware of the approach of cars"; that if "the plaintiff, by exercising his senses with ordinary care and prudence, before he was struck, could have ascertained the approach of said car which came in contact with him, and could have known of the danger, if any, to be reasonably apprehended, but that he failed to exercise such care at that time, and thereby directly or proximately contributed to the happening of the accident, there can be no recovery"; and that "it was the duty of the plaintiff to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, and if you believe that the plaintiff failed to look and that the car was visible and was approaching in dangerous proximity, then it was the duty of plaintiff to have seen said car and to heed its approach as an ordinarily prudent person would have done under the same circumstances, and if you find that the plaintiff was negligent in this respect and that such negligence contributed to the accident, then the plaintiff cannot recover."

Standing alone, the latter part of the foregoing instruction states too strongly the plaintiff's duty to look and listen for an approaching car, but it is highly improbable that the jury was misled thereby, because in a later instruction, dealing particularly with the duty of the plaintiff to exercise care at the station, the court, at plaintiff's request, instructed the jury that—

> Under the circumstances proved, "plaintiff, in the absence of knowledge on his part of the approach of any car on said intervening track in time to have avoided the collision therewith, had the right to assume that defendant would so operate its car on its intervening track aforesaid as not to place plaintiff in peril and plaintiff was not under the same obligation to look out for his own safety by looking and listening as would be incumbent in general upon a person approaching railroad tracks at a grade crossing with intent to cross said tracks, but it is for you to say, upon consideration of the whole evidence, whether the failure on plaintiff's part to effectively look and listen before he was struck by the defendant's car on the night in question, amounted to a want of ordinary care on his part."

Considering the instructions together as a whole, any intelligent juror would understand therefrom that it was the defendant's duty "to exercise great care" in the operation of its cars to avoid injury to the plaintiff at the station, and that in determining whether the plaintiff exercised ordinary care for his own safety, consideration must be given to his "right to assume that defendant would so operate its car on its intervening tracks * * * as not to place plaintiff in peril." The plaintiff was not entitled to a more favorable statement of the law applicable to the case. Other alleged errors are without merit, and need not be specifically discussed.

PEOPLE v. ALLEN et al. (Cr. 1059.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 19, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑369(2)—Evidence that defendant prior to robbery took gun from home of party robbed held not objectionable as showing a distinct offense.

Evidence in prosecution for robbery showing that defendant prior thereto had taken box from home of one of parties robbed to get gun and deprive owner of its use held admissible as showing a preparatory step and not objectionable as showing a distinct offense.

2. Criminal law 🔑511(1)—Testimony in robbery prosecution held sufficiently to corroborate accomplice and to support conviction (Pen. Code, § 1111).

Testimony in prosecution for robbery held sufficiently to corroborate that of accomplice under Pen. Code, § 1111, and hence sufficient to support conviction.

3. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Erroneous instruction directing jury's special attention to testimony of defendant held not to require reversal (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Error in instructing on weight to be given defendant's testimony in prosecution for robbery because singling out and directing jury's special attention to testimony of defendant held not prejudicial under Const. art. 6, § 4½, where instruction stated merely what competent jurors should know.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Leo Allen, whose true name is Leo Alemian, was convicted of robbery and he appeals. Affirmed.

H. W. Coale and Berry & Watson, all of Stockton, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The appellant and one Leonard Moore were indicted for the crime of robbery alleged to have been committed in the city of Stockton on or about the 26th day of July, 1928. Leonard Moore pleaded guilty and appeared as a witness against the appellant. The appellant's motion for a new trial being denied, an appeal therefrom and from the judgment of conviction was taken to this court.

Three reasons are assigned as causes for reversal. First: That the court erred in admitting testimony as to other offenses. Second: That the appellant was convicted on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. Third: That the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions requested by the defendant, and in giving other instructions alleged to be prejudicial to the rights of the defendant.

The record shows that prior to the year 1928 the appellant and Leonard Moore had been acquainted with each other for a period of between four and five years; that for some period of time they had been together at intervals in the town of Truckee, where Leonard Moore was employed; that some time early in the year 1928 the appellant left Truckee for the city of Fresno, and after remaining there a short period of time, came to Stockton, where he had resided for about two months preceding the date of the alleged robbery. At the city of Stockton the appellant resided with Alec T. Darak, an Armenian who was engaged in the business of making repairing, and renovating rugs; that while the appellant was residing with said Darak, a woman by the name of Mrs. Bertie Devereaux also resided at the same place. It further appears from the record that the appellant and Mrs. Devereaux were on very friendly terms for at least a few weeks preceding the 26th day of July, 1928; that during this friendly association some conversation was had relative to purchasing a roadhouse somewhere outside the limits of the city of Stockton; that Mrs. Devereaux stated that she had diamonds upon which she could raise approximately $1,500; the appellant stated he had no money but had a friend living in Truckee who possibly had some; accordingly, the appellant wrote a letter to Leonard Moore in the Armenian language, which was translated into English by Mr. Darak; in this letter the appellant stated that he had a business proposition or a proposition in which money could be made, and asked Leonard Moore to come to Stockton: this letter was written on or about the 20th day of July, 1928; at about this time it appears that while at the residence of Mr. Darak, the appellant and Mr. Darak were having some conversation about guns, jewelry, etc.; that Darak stated to the appellant that he had a gun; this gun was kept in a wooden box under a bed occupied by Darak; Darak got this wooden box from under the bed, unlocked it, and exhibited the gun to the appellant, also the watch and some articles of old jewelry; whether these articles of jewelry were of any value or not does not appear in the record. Following this incident the record shows that thereafter, and on or about the 23d day of July, 1928, Darak missed the revolver referred to; also, the old jewelry and the watch. There is some testimony in the record that the watch was missed at an earlier period, but this is doubtless an error in memory, which is shown by the fact that the witness Darak testified that the box containing the articles in question was taken some time previous to the 23d of July and missed by him on that date.

Responding to the letter written by the appellant, the defendant Leonard Moore arrived in Stockton on the afternoon of the 24th of July, and went to a rooming house recommended by the appellant, and there registered under an assumed name, and was assigned to room No. 11. The testimony of the rooming-house keeper shows that the appellant knew of the registration of Leonard Moore under an assumed name, and also the room to which he was assigned. It further appears from the record that Mr. Darak and Mrs. Devereaux left Stockton and went to Sacramento on the afternoon of July 24th to deliver rugs, and did not return to Stockton until shortly before midnight of July 25th. The testimony of the accomplice Moore is to the effect that the appellant arranged the details of the robbery as follows: That he would advise Moore of the return of Mrs. Devereaux and Mr. Darak; that he would get them both intoxicated, and then Moore could come to the Darak residence, which was known as 420 Channel street in the city of Stockton, and rob Mrs. Devereaux of the diamonds possessed by her. The testimony of Moore is to the effect that appellant gave him the gun and watch, also the jewelry heretofore referred to; that these articles were given to him on the afternoon of the 24th of July, during the absence of Darak and Mrs. Devereaux. The record further shows that Darak and Mrs. Devereaux returned to Stockton at about 11 p. m. on July 25th; that after the return of said parties from Sacramento they proceeded to prepare a dinner, which was eaten, and then some liquor was drunk by said parties from a flask furnished by the appellant. Just when and where this flask of intoxicating liquor was obtained by the appellant does not appear. It further appears that at some time after 11 o'clock on the night of July 25th, and after Mr. Darak and Mrs. Devereaux had been supplied with liquor by the appellant, the appellant went to the rooming house occupied by Mr. Moore and knocked at room No. 11. At just what hour this incident occurred can only be inferred from the chain of circumstances shown in the record. The keeper of the rooming house testified that he went to bed at 11 o'clock; that he had fallen asleep; just how long he slept he did not know, but that he was awakened by some one coming and knocking at room No. 11; that he arose, looked to see who it was and recognized the appellant; that shortly after the appellant had knocked at the door of room No. 11, and receiving no response, the defendant Moore came to the room, got his belongings, including a suitcase, left the rooming house, went down and got into an automobile. The defendant Moore testified that the appellant met him outside the rooming house; notified him in substance that conditions were as planned; that he got his belongings, including his suitcase, got into an automobile and drove to a point on Channel street opposite the Darak residence; that shortly after he arrived there the appellant came out and told Moore to come in and make the holdup. Following this the defendant Moore entered the room where the appellant, Darak and Mrs. Devereaux were, with a drawn revolver, and ordered all persons to throw up their hands, at which juncture the defendant Moore proceeded to take the diamond rings from the fingers of Mrs. Devereaux, using considerable force in so doing; that during the course of the robbery the defendant Moore put the gun referred to in his pocket, and at that time the appellant and Darak lowered their hands, Darak remarking to the defendant, in Armenian, that they might help Mrs. Devereaux, to which the appellant replied, in Armenian, that there was a man with a gun in the room that had been occupied by the appellant and that if they made a move they would be dead men, or words to that effect. After the robbery the defendant Moore went out of a side door of the Darak residence and started toward the waiting automobile, when he was intercepted by a watchman and arrested. The diamonds, watch, jewelry and gun being found in the possession of the defendant Moore, the defendant Moore told the whole story and pleaded guilty. There were other minor details bearing slightly upon the occurrences related, such as the appellant leaving the Darak residence on the night of the 26th of July and going out to make some small purchases, and also as to the various times the appellant and Moore were together while awaiting the return of Darak and Mrs. Devereaux from Sacramento.

[1] The appellant urges that the admission of the testimony in relation to the gun, jewelry and the watch constituted reversible error; that such testimony related to and showed a separate and distinct offense, and, therefore, under several authorities cited by appellant, was inadmissible. The authorities collected and cited by this court in the case of People v. Avila, 78 Cal. App. 415, 248 P. 693, show, as there said:

> "The universally recognized rule is that a defendant in a criminal cause can be tried for no other offense than that charged in the indictment or information. It is not competent for the prosecution to prove the commission of independent crimes by the defendant, the evidence of which has no tendency to prove some material fact in connection with the particular crime charged."

Again, in the case of People v. Coan, 259 P. 998, this court had occasion to examine the authorities having to do with the admission of evidence relating to other offenses than the one charged in the indictment or information. An examination of those cases will show that this court stressed the point that such testimony is inadmissible when it relates solely to independent and unrelated offenses, and that the rule does not exclude testimony relative to offenses connected with the main charge upon which a defendant is being tried. Thus, if the prior or other offense to which the testimony relates shows that it is connected with the offense set forth in the main charge, such as being preparatory to the commission of the major offense or a motive for its commission, or, to use the language most commonly employed, connected with the offense upon which the defendant is being tried, then and in that case such testimony is admissible. There is no question in our minds that depriving Darak of the means of defense, such as taking away his gun, was a step preparatory to the commission of the offense for which the defendant was placed on trial. It is true that the theft of the gun, in point of time, was prior to the actual holdup, but it was likewise subsequent in time to the letter written to Moore to come to Stockton and engage in the business enterprise or "money-making proposition," and is just one of the steps leading up to the robbery, as testified to by the accomplice. The accomplice testified that the appellant gave him the watch, the jewelry, and the gun. The testimony of Darak shows that the box in which the gun, the watch, and the jewelry were kept was shown by him to the appellant several days preceding the robbery, and that the box and its contents had been taken prior to the arrival of the accomplice from Truckee. While the testimony as to the watch and the jewelry, if not accompanied by testimony as to the taking of the gun, could not be considered as testimony showing preparation, but in view of the fact that the watch, the jewelry and the gun were kept, as testified to by Darak, all in one locked box, and, in taking the box, the taker necessarily took all its contents, we do not very well perceive how any testimony as to the watch or the jewelry could be considered as grounds for reversal, when the taker of the box, in order to take the gun, had either to break open the box or take the box with all of its contents. The taking of the box in order to get the gun and deprive Darak of its use, and making sure that there would be no dangerous opposition to the robbery, can only be considered under the circumstances as a preparatory step, and clearly admissible.

[2] Does the testimony in this case, as heretofore recited, sufficiently fill the requirements of section 1111 of the Penal Code, which specifies that a conviction cannot be had on the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense? The authorities are so numerous upon this question, and the rule so plain, that we do not need citation of many cases. One only will suffice. In People v. Flood, 41 Cal. App. 373, 182 P. 766, it is said that such testimony is sufficient if it tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, and that such testimony, standing alone, might be considered weak and wholly insufficient to justify conviction. Thus, it is not a question whether the corroborating testimony establishes the appellant's guilt in this case, or whether, if it stood alone, a judgment of conviction might be supported, but simply whether the corroborating testimony tends to connect the appellant with the commission of the crime charged. Does the corroborating testimony so tend? In the first place, the appellant and the accomplice had been acquainted for a number of years. There is no testimony showing that either one of them was possessed of sufficient funds to embark in any business enterprise. Both of them were working around restaurants and ranches as employees. The appellant, knowing of the possession of diamonds by Mrs. Devereaux, upon which she thought approximately $1,-500 might be raised, wrote to his acquaintance (not to say friend) in Truckee, stating that he had a money-making proposition, and asking his acquaintance Moore to come to Stockton. In answer to this letter Moore journeyed to Stockton, registering at a rooming house recommended by the appellant under the assumed name of "Hill." The appellant was aware of this registration. The testimony showed that he examined the register of the rooming house; that he visited Moore at room No. 11, to which Moore had been assigned; that on the night of the robbery, a few minutes before its occurrence, the appellant was seen knocking at the door of room No. 11; that he did not find the defendant Moore in his room; that a few moments after the appellant left the rooming house, Moore came to room No. 11, got his belongings and departed; that both Darak and Mrs. Devereaux had been given intoxicating liquor from a flask obtained by the appellant; that at the time of the robbery the appellant when spoken to in the Armenian language by Darak, to the effect that an opportune moment had arrived when help might be given Mrs. Devereaux, remarked that there was a man in the room formerly occupied by the appellant, armed with a gun, and that if they made a move they would be dead men. There is some testimony that another person was outside the house but there is absolutely no testimony that there was any such man in the room occupied by the appellant at a former period. Upon being arrested the testimony further shows that the appellant denied his acquaintance with the defendant Moore. Subsequently he admitted the former acquaintance. All this followed what we have said about the occurrence of the disappearance of the gun belonging to Darak. When taken to the jail after his arrest, as heretofore stated, the gun belonging to Darak, the jewelry, and the watch were found in the possession of the defendant Moore. All of these incidents, the taking of the gun, the plying of Darak and Mrs. Devereaux with intoxicating liquor, the going to the rooming house occupied by Moore a short time before the robbery, tally exactly with the plan of the robbery as disclosed by the testimony of the accomplice Moore, and we think, beyond controversy, tends to connect the appellant with the commission of the crime charged in the indictment, and furnishes ample justification for the jury accepting the testimony of the accomplice as to the robbery as being true and correct, and of the appellant's planning the same and participating therein.

[3] We find no error of the court in refusing requested instructions, and will confine our further discussion to the alleged error of the court in giving the following instruction:

> "The defendant has offered himself as a witness on his own behalf on this trial, and, considering the weight and effect to be given his evidence, in addition to noticing his manner and the probability of his statements taken in connection with the evidence in this cause, you should consider his relation and situation under which he gives his testimony, the consequences to him relating from the result of this trial, and all the inducements and temptations which would ordinarily influence a person in his situation. You should carefully determine the amount of credibility to which his evidence is entitled; if convincing and carrying with it a belief in its truth, act upon it; if not, you have a right to reject it."

Under the authorities cited in the case of People v. Longland, 52 Cal. App. 499, 199 P. 546, this instruction should not have been given, and it is error for the court to single out and direct the jury's special attention to the testimony of any particular witness. This, however, does not, in view of section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution, necessitate a reversal of the judgment. While the court should not, by any language in its instructions, tend to either disparage or strengthen the testimony of any witness, yet if the language used by the court is only the statement of a commonplace fact, or the recital of what is, we may say, universally known by all persons competent to act as jurors, we cannot, for such error on the part of the trial court, conclude that there has been a miscarriage of justice. It is surely commonplace to say that any one who would plan or participate in a crime such as that with which the appellant stands charged would not hesitate to testify at least strongly in his own behalf. The jury, if possessing common intelligence, is aware of the predicament in which a defendant stands when charged with a robbery committed by force of arms. The jury is aware that a defendant under such circumstances is facing a possible long period of incarceration. The jury will necessarily notice the manner in which the defendant testifies; they will consider the probability of his statement; they will also fully weigh the situation under which he gives his testimony, and likewise, the consequences resulting to the defendant from a verdict of guilty. While the court should not have given the instruction set forth herein, we cannot say that because the court told the jury what all jurors competent to act as such must necessarily know, constitutes grounds of reversal.

The order and judgment appealed from are affirmed.

DODGE et al. v. MITCHELL, County Superintendent of Schools. (Civ. 6112.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 15, 1928.

1. Schools and school districts ⚷42(2)—Petition for election cannot be had to determine whether elementary or common school districts annexed to city high school districts shall be withdrawn and independent high school district organized (Pol. Code, § 1733a).

Right under Pol. Code, § 1733a, of majority of heads of families or electors of specified elementary school districts, which are part of one or more union or joint union high school districts to petition for election to determine whether independent school district shall be organized, cannot be extended to elementary or common school districts which have been annexed to city high school districts.

2. Constitutional law ⚷70(1)—Courts must construe law as written.

Courts must construe law as written, not as it might be written, however advantageous or desirable such latter course might be to interested citizens or prospective litigants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; H. G. Ames, Judge.

Petition by Donald J. Dodge and others for writ of mandate requiring R. P. Mitchell, as County Superintendent of Schools of Orange County, to call an election. From a judgment denying the writ, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

Diehl & Anderson, of Costa Mesa, for appellants.

Z. B. West, Jr., S. B. Kaufman, and D. G. Wettlin, all of Santa Ana, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal from a judgment by virtue of which an application for a writ of mandate was denied.

The essential facts are that, under the provisions of section 1734b of the Political Code, by order of the board of supervisors of Orange county, certain common school districts therein were annexed to a city high school district. Several years thereafter, for apparently satisfactory reasons, in presumed accordance with procedure outlined in section 1733a of the Political Code, "a majority of the heads of families" living within such common school districts, presented a petition to the county superintendent of schools, by which the petitioners, on behalf of the common school districts theretofore annexed to the city high school district, sought to have an election called for the purpose of determining whether such common school districts might withdraw from said city high school district and from such elementary school districts form an independent high school district. The county superintendent of schools denied such petition. Thereupon a writ of mandate was sought from the superior court requiring the county superintendent of schools to call such election. The petition for the writ was denied, and judgment entered accordingly. It is from such judgment that this appeal is taken.

[1] So far as concerns the questions here involved, section 1733a of the Political Code, in substance, provides that, in circumstances therein set forth "a majority of the heads of families or of the electors" of certain specified elementary school districts which "are a part of one or more union or joint-union high-school districts" may present a petition to the county superintendent of schools to the effect that he shall call an election for the purpose of determining whether or not an independent union or joint union high school district shall be organized, to be composed of the elementary school districts represented by the petitioners. Neither by the terms of the statute to which reference has been had, nor by any other statute to which the attention of this court has been directed, is a similar right or privilege extended to elementary or common school districts which have been annexed to city high school districts.

Judged by the opening brief, it would seem to be the contention of appellants that the statute (section 1734b) is unconstitutional, in that it is not uniform in its operation. However, by their closing brief, the following admission is made:

> "However, in this appeal, the appellants do not contend that section 1734b of the Political Code is unconstitutional. In fact they admit, for the purposes of this appeal, and in accordance with the decisions cited above, that section 1734b of the Political Code is constitutional. Their contention is that section 1734b is constitutional, that it being constitutional, it must have a uniform operation, and in order that it have a uniform operation, all elementary school districts annexed to high school districts under its provisions must have an equal opportunity to withdraw from the high school districts to which they were annexed, and if some of them thus annexed be able to use the provisions of section 1733a of the Political Code, all must be able to do the same."

[2] In other words, the position finally assumed by appellants is that, notwithstanding the absence of statutory law granting the privilege which is sought by appellants, the right should be accorded the elementary school districts which they represent, because by the statute to which they refer other elementary school districts annexed to union high school districts, as distinguished from city high school districts, are given such right. No authority is cited by appellants in support of such suggested legal principle. It is clear that a judgment in accordance with appellants' contention in effect would amount to judicial legislation and be a plain usurpation of legislative functions. Assuming that the statute is constitutional so far as concerns the situation here involved, the law must be construed as written, not as it might be written, however advantageous or desirable such latter course might be to interested citizens or prospective litigants.

The judgment is affirmed.

CHAMPAGNE v. PASSONS et ux.
(Civ. 3634.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 17, 1928.

1. Joint adventures 🔑1—Agreement for development and sale of land, whereby plaintiff was to devote all his time without compensation and defendant to furnish money, held joint adventure.

Agreement between plaintiff and defendant for development and sale of land purchased by defendant, whereby defendant was to advance money for development and equipment and plaintiff was to devote all his time and do all necessary work for its development without compensation, and at end of three years an accounting was to be had under which plaintiff was to pay defendant one-half of all money expended and defendant was to convey to plaintiff one-half of property, held to constitute a joint adventure.

2. Joint adventures 🔑5(1)—On defendant's attempted termination of joint adventure without cause, plaintiff could sue for accounting and apportionment of profits.

Where agreement between plaintiff and defendant for development and sale of land constituted joint adventure, on attempted termination of agreement by defendant without sufficient cause, plaintiff had right to sue for an accounting, and equity will decree an accounting and just apportionment of profits.

3. Joint adventures 🔑5(2)—That complaint for accounting alleges partnership does not bar relief, though testimony establishes only joint adventure.

The fact that complaint for an accounting and division of profits alleged a partnership does not bar relief in event testimony establishes only joint adventure.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action for an accounting by Joe Champagne against T. B. Passons and wife. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

I. Henry Harris and Chas. Mitschrich, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. P. Adams and W. W. Orme, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. This is an action by plaintiff for an accounting and division of profits based upon an oral contract relative to the development of a tract of land embracing 52½ acres. The trial court denied the plaintiff an accounting; held, that the agreement sued upon being in the nature of employment, the defendant T. B. Passons had a right to discharge the plaintiff at pleasure; and awarded judgment to the plaintiff for wages calculated on the basis of $5 per day.

From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

(During the course of this opinion the word "defendant" will be used as referring to T. B. Passons alone, unless otherwise stated.)

The record shows that on or about the month of January, 1922, the defendant entered into an agreement of purchase for the tract of land involved in this action, the purchase price being fixed at $25,000. After this agreement was entered into litigation arose, and for a period of about one year it appeared doubtful that title to the property could be secured. During this period the land was damaged to a considerable extent by flood waters, and the probability of developing the property so as to make it productive of any profitable income appeared doubtful. During this period of time the plaintiff and the defendant had been engaged in a ditch-filling enterprise in which they were both jointly interested. The defendant was not able, of himself, to do the work necessary to develop the property in question, by reason of physical infirmities, while the plaintiff, as shown by the record, was an excellent worker, capable of directing the manual labor and performing the manual labor necessary to be done upon the premises to which the defendant desired to acquire title. With these circumstances in view the defendant proposed to the plaintiff, some time during the month of March, 1923, that they go in together in the development and exploitation of the land, and divide the profits between them, equally; that this association should be continued for three years from and after the 31st day of March, 1923, at which date an accounting was to be had and a division of profits made, if any. The agreement provided that the defendant was to contribute the money necessary to finance the enterprise, furnish the teams, machinery, and equipment necessary to be used in making the improvement; to pay for the land and to manage the business portion of the venture. The plaintiff was to contribute all his time and services to the improvement and development of the land during the three-year period; was to use the machinery and equipment in securing outside work whenever possible, and to turn over to the defendant, to be applied to the common fund, all the earnings so obtained. These funds were to be taken charge of by the defendant, and an account kept thereof. Out of the money derived from the sale of products of the land or the land itself, and the earnings of the plaintiff, there should be paid the living expenses of the plaintiff and of the defendant's family, the expenses of developing and improving the land, and such items as might be properly attributed thereto. At the end of the three-year period it was agreed that an accounting should be had between them, at which time the plaintiff was to pay to the defendant one-half of the amount invested in the ranch, the improvements, the expense of development and operation, and living expenses, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. It was further agreed that the purchase price of the land should be reckoned at $28,000 in the settlement between the plaintiff and the defendant, the difference between the $25,000, the real purchase price of the land, and the price agreed upon, representing cost and expense and trouble of litigation incurred by the defendant. The agreement further provided that if at any time during the course of the three-year period, and before the end thereof, the agreement was terminated, the plaintiff was to receive $5 a day for the time that had elapsed after the 31st day of March, 1923, or that if the plaintiff died, within that period, the defendant would send to the mother of the plaintiff a like amount in lieu of plaintiff's interest.

After the making of this agreement, the plaintiff proceeded to do and perform all the work contemplated under the agreement for and during the period of 14 months, earned approximately $5,000 by outside work which he either performed himself or had charge and management in the performance of by others. This money was turned over to the defendant, who took charge of it and entered the same in a book in which the receipts and expenditures were kept. It appears that the plaintiff and defendant obtained a book of accounts in which all the items showing receipts and expenditures during the period mentioned were entered. This account book shows that during the period in question the total receipts amounted to the sum of $23,561.58, and the total amount expended aggregated $17,970.88, leaving a net receipt of $5,590.70.

During the course of the 14-month period a part of the 52½-acre tract of land was subdivided and sold, and the proceeds, so far as received from the sale thereof, it would appear, were applied on the original purchase price of the land. Just what amount of the proceeds of the sale of the subdivided tract were applied on the original purchase price does not appear. The defendant, however, testified that he was "pretty sure" that $9,100 of the proceeds of the sale of the subdivided tract were so applied.

The record shows that the work and labor performed by the plaintiff was entirely satisfactory, and that there was never any disagreement between the plaintiff and the defendant relative to the development work, the outside work performed by the plaintiff, or the handling or expenditure of any of the funds, and that the premises had been developed so that the unsold portion had reached the value of at least $60,000. On the 2d day of June, 1924, the defendant, yielding to the insistence of the defendant Ella M. Passons, his wife, acting upon the theory that the association was one of master and servant or employer and employé, notified the plaintiff that he would have to quit, or was discharged and tendered him $5 a day for the 14-months period. This sum the plaintiff declined to accept, and thereafter instituted this action.

The trial court, among other things, found as follows:

> "That in the latter days of March, 1923, the plaintiff and defendant T. B. Passons, entered into a working agreement, but not a copartnership; * * * that said agreement between the plaintiff and defendant T. B. Passons was oral, and never reduced to writing; that in said agreement it was provided that the said property was to be developed and a portion thereof might be sold; that defendant, T. B. Passons, should advance such money as might be necessary to purchase such tools or implements as he did not then have, to be used in and about the development of said property; that the plaintiff was to devote his entire time and attention to the enterprise, and do any and all work necessary in the development of said land for a term of three years, without compensation, except that the defendant T. B. Passons should furnish the plaintiff with a room in his house, board him, do his washing and furnish him with necessary spending money; * * * that in the event work could be obtained by using the tractor and other implements owned by the defendant, the plaintiff was to do said work, and the proceeds therefrom should be paid to the defendant, T. B. Passons; that either party to said agreement might terminate the same at his pleasure at any time during the said three years, and that in the event of such termination, at the request of either party, the plaintiff should be paid in full for his services, in addition to his board, room, washing and necessary spending money, at the rate of $5.00 per day; that at the end of the three-year period, in the event that the agreement continued in full force during that time, and plaintiff had performed all his said duties under said agreement, an accounting was to be had between the plaintiff and defendant of all moneys had and received, at which time the plaintiff should pay to the said defendant one-half of all the moneys the defendant had expended in connection with said property, including the cost of the improvement, upkeep, and other expenses connected therewith, interest on said $28,000.00, and taxes, and that thereupon the said defendant would convey to the plaintiff one-half of all of said property remaining unsold, but there was no provision in said contract that in the event of a loss, any portion thereof was to be borne by the plaintiff."

It may be here stated that the testimony shows without contradiction that the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant provided that in the event of the land or improvement being washed away by floods, or that there was no profit, that the plaintiff was to have nothing for his three years' work and the defendant was to lose the money which he had invested in the property. This uncontradicted testimony appears to have been entirely overlooked. The trial court further found that under said contract the defendant had received approximately $16,000 on contracts of sale for the portion of the tract subdivided and sold, and that he would receive approximately the further sum of $25,000, and that the value of the remaining portion of the premises was about the sum of $60,000. The court also found:

> "That for a long time prior to June 1, 1924, while the plaintiff was living in the home of the defendants', plaintiff spent a great part of his time in gambling in the house and on the premises of the defendant, over the objections of the defendant, and for a long time prior to June 1, 1924, in the home of the defendants', he maintained intimate, illicit relations with women, and with one woman habitually for some time, without the consent of the defendants, or either of them."

And after finding that the defendants objected to such conduct, the court found that on the 1st day of June, while such conduct on the part of the plaintiff was continuing, the defendant informed the plaintiff that by reason of such conduct and the plaintiff's refusal to desist therefrom, that he elected to and did terminate the agreement and offered to pay the plaintiff the sum of $5 per day, etc.

The record shows that so far as objection to the gambling on the part of the plaintiff, in the house where the plaintiff and the defendants resided, is concerned, no objection was ever made thereto by the defendant. The record also shows that the defendant, at various times participated in the games of poker that were played on the premises referred to, and the record further shows that no objection was ever made by any one to whatever drinking took place upon the premises. The record does show, by the admission of the plaintiff himself, and not by any testimony introduced by the defendants, that some time during the year 1923 the plaintiff had had illicit relations with a certain woman on the premises occupied by the parties to this action, but of this the defendants had no knowledge until the date of this trial. There is no testimony, however, showing such relations at any time during the year 1924. The only testimony that lends any color whatever to the claim that the plaintiff was guilty of any improper act or conduct during that period is the testimony of Ella M. Passons to the effect that one night about ten days or three weeks previous to the 2d day of June, 1924, she passed through the lighted dining room wherein was situated a cot on which a Mrs. Sullivan slept, and that as she passed through the room she saw the plaintiff engaged in rubbing the back of Mrs. Sullivan, and in explanation plaintiff stated that Mrs. Sullivan was ill and suffering from a severe backache. Mrs. Sullivan was clad in her nightclothes, and the plaintiff had on his overalls (which we take to be ranch clothes). That there were any improper relations between the plaintiff and Mrs. Sullivan was denied by both of them. The doors to the room were unlocked, and, as stated, the room was lighted. It appears that the plaintiff occupied a bedroom which could be reached by going through the dining room, and that the defendants occupied a room adjoining the room occupied by the plaintiff. The testimony does not show that anything was said to either the plaintiff or Mrs. Sullivan about this incident. That Mrs. Sullivan, who then was an employé upon the premises, was not discharged by reason of said incident, and remained on the premises until the house occupied by the plaintiff, the defendants, and herself was leased to other parties; this lease taking effect on the 3d day of June, 1924.

The contention of the appellant is that the circumstances disclosed by the record establishes a copartnership. On the part of the respondents it is urged that the relationship was terminable at the pleasure of either one of the parties, and that the relationship was one of employment. The trial court, as we have stated, found that the relationship might be terminated at the pleasure of either of the parties; found that there was no copartnership, and designated the arrangement as a "working agreement." As to what the agreement establishes, we think is shown beyond question by the testimony of the plaintiff and the defendant, between which there is really no substantial conflict. Other witnesses testified as to their recollection, as to what was told them, but as to the oral agreement we think the contract must be held to be such as testified to by the plaintiff and defendant as no other persons were present when it was made. The plaintiff testified in substance as follows:

> "T. B. Passons, in March, 1923, made me this proposition: He asked me if I would stick with him for three years, and at the end of three years to divide the ranch in half that he was going to buy. He said: 'If you don't want to stick with me, I can't buy the ranch.' He said he was going to develop the ranch to the best interests of the copartnership, and if we could sell part of it or all of it to good advantage, we would do it, and if we couldn't, we would divide the land at the end of three years. He was to attend to the business part, and I was to do whatever he told me about the working part. I was to work on the outside; that whatever money I could make would be turned over. The defendant said he could attend to the financing part, either from the money from operations from sales of the ranch or work I did on the outside, and then borrow and pay from that. I was to get nothing for three years. At the end of three years I was to get half, after we deducted the cost of the ranch expenses with my half of the cost and expenses at 7 per cent. interest; that if we could not meet our payments and we lost the ranch, I was to lose all my labor. If the water came up and we lost the ranch he was to lose his money, I was to lose my labor. Each party was to buy his own clothes. The provisions for Mrs. and Mr. Passons and his family was to be charged to the account, and to be kept track of as expenses. In the event that we did not get enough out of the property, Mr. Passons was furnishing the money. If it came to losing his money, I was to lose my labor. When he told me what he would do I told him I would stick with him for three years. The only way he could let me go was if I died he was to pay my mother $5.00 a day for the time I had put in, including Sundays and holidays. Also, if I proved dishonest or refused to do my work."

The witness then testified that an account book was obtained and all the expenses of maintaining both the plaintiff and the defendants, and all the cost and expenses of managing the property, all the receipts from the property and receipts of money earned by the plaintiff for outside work and in managing the truck and tractor when used by other persons under his direction, were entered in this book so as to show a complete account which was to be taken into consideration at the end of three years in making division of the profits and with what remained in the event of there being any profit or property to divide.

Mrs. Passons, one of the defendants, testified as to her recollection of the agreement as told to her by the plaintiff and the defendant as follows:

> "Mr. Passons said to the plaintiff: 'Now, I will make an agreement with you. If you will stay with me three years and fulfill all your work and do everything that you should, and at the end of three years you will pay half of the first cost of the place, which was $28,000.00, 7 per cent. interest thereon, half of the upkeep and improvements, half of the living and all the expenses, then I will go 50-50 with you, but if at any time you do not do your work, or do not suit in any manner, you are to take $5.00 a day for your work,' and the plaintiff replied, 'All right, I am perfectly satisfied.' He was to get his board, room and washing and the $5.00 a day all the time that he put in, if they did not get along or he did not suit."

The defendant, after testifying as to the purchase of the ranch and that he bought it in pursuance of the contract therefor, herein referred to, testified as to what took place between himself and the plaintiff, as follows:

> "Well, I had talked with Joe, that is, roughly, over the matter several times previous to this about his taking a working interest in this ranch. We were working together in filling a ditch, and we had talked it over in a rough manner, and we got it down to the point where we thought we could agree, and we went over it that night after we came in from work, like we had talked it over at different times. We got together where it seemed like it was plausible for everybody concerned, and that I was to pay the first costs of the ranch, which was $28,000.00. Mr. Champagne was to stay with me for three years. I said: 'Joe, we have about decided to go in together. Now, we want to understand each other thoroughly,' and I went into the first costs of the ranch that he was to pay half of the first costs back, and he was to remain with me three years; he was to pay half of the expenses of the upkeep on the ranch and improvements on the ranch, at the rate of 7 per cent. interest, and if we were together at the end of three years, after the expense of half of the upkeep, and I got half of my money back of the first cost, that he was to receive half of the net profits of this ranch, and in case we couldn't agree in the meantime, that Joe was to receive $5.00 a day straight for the time that he was with me."

The defendant further testified that the word "partnership" was not used. Also testified as to the keeping of the accounts, and it maybe here stated that there is no conflict in the testimony that all the expenses of operating the ranch, living expenses, etc., of all the parties was charged up, and that all of the money which came from the outside from work performed by the plaintiff, as herein stated, was entered in the account book and used in payment of expenses of developing the land and maintaining the parties to this action.

While the court found that the agreement might be terminated at pleasure, the defendant, testifying along the theory that the agreement was one of employment, testified as follows:

> "Q. Well, you had a right to discharge him any time you felt like it? A. Not when I felt like it.
> "Q. Well, you only had a right to do it then for cause; is that right? A. For cause, yes, sir.
> "Q. And it was not understood that you could arbitrarily discharge him? A. I don't understand that question.
> "Q. If the notion struck you that you did not want Joe at any time during the three years, you did not have the right to discharge him and give him $5.00 a day because he did something that was wrong. Is that right? A. Well, I couldn't do that just because I took a notion, if he hadn't done anything and everything was pleasant, why, I couldn't just say 'Joe, I don't want you any more; here is your money;' I couldn't do that."

In relation to the land overflowing, the witness testified:

> "It was understood that he go out and I go out without anything; we couldn't hold each other to nothing.
> "Q. Well, now, I don't know that I have got it exactly clear, Mr. Passons, but you don't contend, do you, that you could if you wanted to, after Joe had worked there we will say a great length of time like 2 years, 11 months, if you made up your mind that you didn't like Joe any more, you were not as fond of him as you were, that you could discharge him and give him $5.00 a day for the 2 years and 11 months, although the property had advanced in value to a large sum of money? A. For no cause?
> "Q. Yes. A. Why, no, I couldn't do that."

While other witnesses testified some to the effect that they were told by the defendant, in the presence of the plaintiff, that in case of disagreement, either one could terminate the association, and some witnesses testified that they understood it could be terminable at pleasure, what we have stated, taken from the testimony of the plaintiff and the defendant, and in substance corroborated by Mrs. Passons, one of the defendants, we think must be accepted as correctly showing what the agreement was between the parties, and that as against the statement of the defendant, irrespective of the statement of the plaintiff that the contract could not be terminated at pleasure, is not really controverted by testimony of witnesses as to their recollection of the use of words and understanding gained by having the agreement related to them at a considerable period of time antedating the hour of giving their testimony.

have his board and washing. That at the end of the three years an accounting was to be had of all the receipts and expenditures. That the plaintiff was to pay to the defendant one-half of all the money expended or that there was to be charged against the plaintiff one-half of all the money expended for all the items which we have mentioned, and interest thereon at 7 per cent. The defendant was then to convey to the plaintiff one-half the property. That during the course of the 14-month period, some 20 acres of the land were subdivided and sold on contracts, the defendant having received approximately $16,000, and has coming on the contracts approximately $25,000 additional. That the plaintiff's work was satisfactory. That the work done with the equipment amounted to the sum of $4,981.04. That the plaintiff was ready, able, and willing to do all the work required of him. That the defendant was to attend to the financial part of the business, and the defendant was also to direct the work of improvement which was to be performed by the plaintiff. The record shows that an account was kept of all moneys received as herein stated, the money paid for labor, for lumber, groceries, oil, gas, etc., one of the items charged as expenses for maintaining the plaintiff and the defendant or for maintaining a family being $500 for groceries. The cost of buying the horses was also entered as a charge, to be considered as an item of expense upon making settlement at the end of three years.

Irrespective of the finding of the court that the plaintiff and defendant entered into a "working agreement," we think the foregoing facts constitute, uncontrovertibly, a joint adventure. It lacked only one element of constituting a copartnership. It does not appear that the plaintiff had any authority to contract so as to bind the interest of both the plaintiff and the defendant, but it does appear that the plaintiff and the defendant were entering into an agreement or undertaking relative to the development and sale which included first the purchase price of the lands to be bought and all the expenses thereof, and were contemplating a venture where the defendant was staking what money it would be necessary to advance over and above the receipts that might be had, against the labor of the plaintiff. This, we think, without citation of authorities, conclusively establishes a joint adventure. If a joint adventure, irrespective of the fact that the defendant himself testified that the agreement could not be terminated at pleasure, then the finding of the court that the agreement could be terminated at pleasure has no support.

In 33 Corpus Juris, p. 841, a "joint adventure" is defined as follows:

> "A joint adventure has been aptly defined as a special combination of two or more persons where in some specific venture, a profit is jointly sought without any actual partnership or corporate designation."

We do not need to cite any further authorities than the chapter on joint adventure found in 33 Corpus Juris, beginning on page 839. Here, there is every element of the parties entering into an undertaking seeking a profit, and, in addition thereto, a stipulation that in a certain event one shall lose all of his labor, all the earnings that he has turned over to the joint account, and the other loses all the money that he has put into the venture.

[2, 3] We do not need to discuss the question as to whether the defendant did or did not have sufficient cause to cancel or terminate the agreement had it been one of employment. Not being one of employment, and there being no objection to the work carried on and performed by the plaintiff, all of which is expressly testified to by the defendant as being entirely satisfactory, no cause is shown for the termination or attempted termination of the relationship of joint adventurers, even though it may be conceded that the defendant had a right to insist that the plaintiff occupy some other room, notwithstanding at least six months had expired, if not more, since any conduct on his part was such as would have laid a foundation for terminating the relationship of employer and employee or master and servant, if such relation had existed. All we need to say is that the attempted cancellation of the defendant laid the foundation for an action of accounting on the part of the plaintiff, and the refusal of the court to take an accounting constitutes reversible error.

While the respondent has cited a few authorities to the effect that the relationship of master and servant may be terminated by reason of the improper conduct of the servant, those cases are not applicable, for the reason that the relationship of master and servant did not exist in this case. The fact that the agreement provided for a basis of settlement under certain contingencies did not warrant either party in arbitrarily excluding the other from accruing benefits. Such a construction is not only inconsistent with equitable principles, but offers a premium on fraud. Especially is this true where, as shown by the record in this case, the repudiating parties stand to gain several thousand dollars by barring the other party from the enterprise. The venture was proving exceedingly profitable, and under such conditions the temptation to exercise one's "pleasure" and deprive the other party from participating in the "harvest money" was so great that equity will hestitate to stamp such action with approval. A definite period was fixed for the continuance of the adventure, and even though the relationship is such that it may be dissolved at will, this does not carry with it the correlative that the rescinding party shall thereby become entitled to appropriate to his own use and benefit all the enhanced value and emoluments arising from the venture. Equity will decree an accouning and just apportionment of the profits. As said in Butler v. Union Trust Co., 178 Cal. 195, 172 P. 601, quoting from page 198 (172 P. 602):

> "A joint adventure, however, is similar to a partnership, and, being of a similar nature, the right to an accounting of profits in accordance with the agreement therefor and the obligations growing out of such agreement between the parties are governed by the same rules of law"—citing 23 Cyc. 453; Petrie v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY FLOOD CONTROL DIST v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 6137.)★

Rehearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 20, 1928.

Prohibition ⟹20—Truth of allegations of undenied complaint, incorporated in petition for writ of prohibition, held admitted by petitioner.

Where enforcement of assessments of flood control district had been restrained at suit of city, and district petitioned for writ of prohibition to require court to dissolve the injunction, the district, having incorporated in its petition the city's complaint together with the district's demurrer thereto, was bound by the allegations of such complaint; they not having been denied.

On petition for rehearing. Petition denied. For former opinion, see 271 P. 518.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, Roy W. Dowds, Flood Control Counsel, and W. Sumner Holbrook, Jr., Deputy Co. Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

R. C. McAllaster, City Atty., and Harold P. Huls, Deputy City Atty., both of Pasadena, for respondents and intervener.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Alan Patten, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, W. Turney Fox, City Atty., of Glendale, Chester L. Coffin, City Atty., of Santa Monica, and Nowland M. Reid, City Atty., and C. A. Windham, Chief Deputy City Atty., both of Long Beach, amici curiæ.

PER CURIAM. In its petition for a rehearing herein, petitioner district contends that this court erred in holding that the district is bound in its application for a writ of prohibition by admissions of the truth of the allegations contained in the complaint of the city of Pasadena, intervener herein, filed in the city's action in the superior court for an injunction and to have the assessments under consideration declared void. Petitioner also contends that this court committed further error in holding that the rules of law laid down in the case of Crocker v. Scott, 149 Cal. 575, 87 P. 102, do not apply in this proceeding.

The district embodied in and made parts of its petition herein for a writ of prohibition a copy of the complaint of the city and a copy of the demurrer of the district to the complaint, which demurrer has not yet been passed upon by the superior court. By making the undenied complaint a part of its petition for the writ, for the purposes of its petition for the writ, the district adopted the allegations of the complaint as true. The demurrer raised the question whether the complaint states a cause of action. While the demurrer remains undisposed of, the admissions thereby made that the matters well pleaded in the complaint are true continue to bind the district. When a party to an action, as in this proceeding, stands upon a pleading and his demurrer thereto, so long as he stands thereon, in legal effect, for the purposes of the action, he admits and continues to admit the truth of the matters well pleaded in the pleading. Estate of Chase, 169 Cal. 625, 627, 147 P. 461.

Further elaborating upon our holding that the rules of law laid down in the case of Crocker v. Scott, supra, do not apply in this case, attention is called to the fact that the complaint in that case affirmatively showed that the taxing authorities had jurisdiction to levy the taxes complained of and proceeded regularly in making the assessment and levy, and that injunction should not have issued, while in this proceeding it appears that the assessing authorities failed to acquire jurisdiction to assess. Under the latter circumstance the law does not afford the city adequate redress.

Judge Cooley announces in his work on taxation (3 Cooley, Taxation, § 2, pp. 1414, 1447, 1453) the following:

> "Cases of fraud, accident or mistake, cases of cloud upon the title to one's property, and cases where one is threatened with irremediable mischief, may demand other remedies than those the common law can give, and these, in proper cases, may be afforded in courts of equity."

Our Supreme Court said in Las Animas, etc., Land Co. v. Preciado, 167 Cal. 580, 584, 140 P. 239, 241, that—

> "The fundamental proposition * * * is that equity will afford relief to a party from whom an illegal tax has been collected or is sought to be collected. But as equity makes good only the deficiencies of the law, it will not interpose between the property owner and the fiscal officers where the law then or thereafter affords him adequate redress. But stating it conversely, where the law then or thereafter does not afford the owner adequate redress, equity will interpose for the protection of his property rights."

In the latter case the Supreme Court also announced that where the complaint is addressed to asserted irregularities or illegalities in the ministerial and executive processes fixing the lien upon property, and there is an equitable duty to pay some tax, courts have shown a proper reluctance to come to the relief of an individual and enjoin the collection of the tax as a whole to the great disturbance of the revenues. But, where a cloud is cast upon the individual's title by the void assessment it would be a grievance which would entitle him to go into a court of equity for relief. In that case injunction was granted restraining the proper officers from advertising the plaintiff's property for sale and from selling it for nonpayment of the tax, and the holding in Crocker v. Scott was carefully considered and was held not to apply where the tax was void, for the reason that the law does not afford adequate relief against the cloud of the void tax.

In this matter we held that the void assessments were clouds upon the titles to the city's lands and that extrinsic evidence is required to show that fact. Therefore, the titles are not merchantable and the equitable remedy of injunction may be invoked in the city's action to remove the cloud.

Rehearing denied.

SCHADE v. STEWART. (L. A. 9233.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 27, 1928.

1. Executors and administrators 🔑102—Realty described in trust deed securing note constituting asset of estate, when purchased by executrix at trustee's sale, becomes asset of estate.

Real property described in deed of trust given to secure note constituting asset of decedent's estate, when purchased at trustee's sale by executrix acting in representative capacity, also becomes asset of estate, subject to possession and control of representative for purposes of administration.

2. Executors and administrators 🔑39—Title to realty purchased by executrix and becoming asset of estate vests on acquisition in persons succeeding to estate.

Where real property described in deed of trust given to secure note which constitutes asset of decedent's estate is purchased at trustee's sale by executrix and becomes asset of estate, legal title to such property in same manner as title to property owned by decedent at date of death vests eo instanti on acquisition in persons entitled to succeed thereto under provisions of decedent's last will, or, in cases of intestacy, in heirs at law according to laws of succession.

3. Trusts 🔑200(1)—Trustee's deed, executed during administration to executor, need not designate specific persons as grantees.

Trustee's deed, executed during pendency of administration, pursuant to purchase by personal representative in representative capacity, need not name specific heirs or devisees as grantees, since property thus vested in heirs or devisees is subject to representative's right of possession and control for purpose of administration.

4. Trusts 🔑200(1)—Trustee's deed, if made to executrix or to estate, would have been sufficient to vest title in person succeeding to property.

Trustee's deed executed during administration pursuant to purchase by personal representative in representative capacity, if granting property to executrix or to estate, naming it, would have been sufficient to vest title in persons entitled to succeed to property.

5. Deeds 🔑31—Language indicating with reasonable certainty intent to pass title to realty of estate to heirs or devisees is sufficient.

Any language which indicates with reasonable certainty intent to pass title to realty of decedent's estate to those entitled to succeed as heirs or devisees is sufficient.

6. Trusts 🔑200(1)—Trustee's deed to "heirs or devisees" of decedent showed intention to vest property in persons entitled to take pursuant to decision of probate court, and was not void for uncertainty of grantees (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1452, 1581; Civ. Code, § 3538).

Deed by trustee pursuant to deed of trust in favor of decedent conveying real property to "heirs or devisees" of deceased, reciting note and trust deed in favor of deceased, default of trust deed and note, exercise by executrix, of option to declare full amount of indebtedness due, and sale of property to heirs or devisees of deceased, furnished intrinsic evidence of intent to convey to heirs if court should determine property vested in heirs and to devisees if probate court determined property vested in devisees pursuant to decedent's will, and delivery of deed to executrix vested title in persons entitled to succeed to property, and hence deed was not void for uncertainty in designation of grantees, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1452, 1581, and Civ. Code, § 3538.

7. Executors and administrators 🔑438(8)—Executrix held proper party to sue in ejectment against grantor of trust deed, conveying property to heirs or devisees of decedent without joining heirs and devisees (Code Civ. Proc. § 1582).

In action in ejectment by executrix against maker of trust deed in favor of decedent under which property was conveyed by trustee to heirs and devisees of decedent, executrix was proper party to action without necessity of joining heirs and devisees under Code Civ. Proc. § 1582, since property was subject to control and possession of executrix in same manner as realty vested in decedent at date of death.

Shenk, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action in ejectment by Clara K. Schade, as executrix of the estate of Jennie C. Hurd, deceased, against Addie L. Stewart. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 264 P. 750.

Matthews & Walter, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hugh A. McNary and O'Melveny, Tuller & Myers, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This appeal is taken from a judgment for plaintiff in an action of ejectment to recover the possession of certain real property in the city of Watts, county of Los Angeles, this state. Plaintiff sued as executrix of the estate of Jennie C. Hurd, deceased. Defendant purchased said real property from said Jennie C. Hurd in 1912, and as a part of the purchase price thereof executed a promissory note payable to decedent, which was secured by a deed of trust covering said real property. Defendant having made default in the payment of installments of principal and interest, plaintiff, as executrix, exercised the option contained in the note to declare the full amount of the indebtedness due, requested the trustee, Title Guarantee & Trust Company, a corporation, to sell the property as provided in said deed of trust and, as executrix, became the purchaser at the sale held. Thereafter, and while the will of Jennie C. Hurd, deceased, was still in course of probate and open to attack, said trustee executed a trustee's deed, naming as grantees the "heirs or devisees of Jennie C. Hurd, deceased." In her will, duly admitted to probate by the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, decedent name the Salvation Army and sixteen natural persons as legatees and devisees.

It is appellant's contention that the deed naming the "heirs or devisees of Jennie C. Hurd, deceased," as grantees, through which plaintiff claims the right of possession in her representative capacity, is void for uncertainty in the designation of a grantee. Appellant argues that such a designation falls under the condemnation of the rule of the common law that a grant to J. S. or W. S. in the disjunctive is void for uncertainty. Respondent's theory is that the effect of the conveyance was to vest title to the property in the same manner as if the deed had been executed to Jennie C. Hurd during her lifetime and said property upon her death had become a part of her estate; that is, respondent asserts, the deed conveys title to the class of persons (who must inevitably be either heirs or devisees) which the probate court by its decree of distribution shall determine are entitled to the said property. That the intent of the grantor and also of the executrix was as respondent contends it to have been there can be nc doubt. The two important questions in the case go to the intent of the parties to the deed and the certainty of giving it effect.

[1-3] The note secured by deed of trust upon the property in question was an asset of decedent's estate. Real property described in a deed of trust given to secure a note constituting an asset of a decedent's estate, when purchased at a trustee's sale by an executrix acting in her representative capacity, also becomes an asset of the estate, subject to the possession and control of the said representative for purposes of administration. The legal title to such property, in like manner as the title to property owned by decedent at the date of death vests eo instanti upon acquisition in those entitled to succeed thereto under the provisions of the decedent's last will and testament, or, in cases of intestacy, in the heirs at law according to the laws of succession. State v. Miller, 149 Cal. 208, 210, 85 P. 609; Estate of Patterson, 155 Cal. 626, 637, 102 P. 941, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 654, 132 Am. St. Rep. 116, 18 Ann. Cas. 625; Western Pacific Railroad Co. v. Godfrey, 166 Cal. 346, 349, 136 P. 284, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 825; Estate of Yorba, 176 Cal. 166, 169, 167 P. 854. Although the decree of distribution does not create, but only declares, the title which accrued at the moment of decedent's death, or, in the case of after-acquired property, at the date of acquisition, until the title has been thus declared, it is often impractical, if not impossible, to determine the persons in whom it is vested. To require a trustee's deed executed during the pendency of administration, in pursuance of a purchase by the personal representative in her representative capacity, to designate as grantees the specific heirs or devisees in whom title is vested would often demand a solution of difficult questions of law and fact within the exclusive jurisdiction of the probate court to be settled only by the decree of distribution. By reason of this fact and the further circumstance that property thus vested in heirs or devisees is subject to the representative's right of possession and control for purposes of administration, a designation other than one naming specific persons as grantees is necessary and appropriate.

[4] A deed granting the property to plaintiff, as executrix, or to the estate, naming it, would have been sufficient to vest title in those entitled to succeed to the property. In commenting upon the effect of a deed granting real property to executors, this court, in Newlove v. Mercantile Trust Co., 156 Cal. 657, 105 P. 971, where the grant was to Joseph H. Newlove and Charles W. Newlove, "as executors of the last will of said John Newlove, deceased, * * * in trust for all the persons interested in the estate of said John Newlove, deceased, according to their respective interests therein," said:

"We are satisfied that it must be held, in view of the deed made by Kaiser to the executors of the will of John Newlove subsequent to his death in execution of the agreement of sale, that the Newlove Ranch must be treated as part of the property of deceased at the time of his death. * * * As we have before said, the effect of the conveyance of the Newlove Ranch by Kaiser to the executors of the will of John Newlove was to vest a legal title to the property in the same manner as if the deed had been executed prior to the death of John Newlove. The property was thenceforth, if not before, a part of his estate, and plaintiff had a legal title to an undivided one-twelfth, subject to the possession of the executors for purposes of administration."

[5] It is to be observed that under such a deed title is declared to vest, not in the personal representative named as grantee, but in those entitled to succeed to the property, either by virtue of decedent's will or the laws of succession, whose identity is not legally determinable until the decree of distribution shall have been entered. The circumstances of the situation admit of no greater definiteness in the ascertainment of a grantee. It is not declared, either in Newlove v. Mercantile Trust Co., supra, or in any other case brought to our notice, that a grant to the personal representative is the sole way in which title may be conveyed to those entitled to succeed as heirs or devisees. Any language which indicates such an intent with reasonable certainty is sufficient.

In Arnett v. Fairmont Trust Co., 70 W. Va. 296, 73 S. E. 930, the testatrix's will contained the following provision: "If any money left after distribution let it be return to the estate of C. W. Arnett." C. W. Arnett was testatrix's predeceased husband. The court interpreted the provision as vesting the property in the individual who succeeded to title to the property of C. W. Arnett upon his death, which in the state of West Virginia was the executor of his estate, to be taken, held, and administered by said executor as a part of the estate of said Arnett and distributed as the terms of his will directed. See, also, McKee v. Ellis (Tex. Civ. App.) 83 S. W. 880. In Hill v. Jackson (Tex. Civ. App.) 51 S. W. 357, the grantees were named as "the heirs of John Jackson and Sabina Jackson (or * * * whoever under the law is entitled to take the same)." The designation was held sufficient. In McKee v. Spiro, 107 Mo. 453, 17 S. W. 1013, a deed to "the heirs and legal representatives, whether, under her last will and testament, or by inheritance of her, Evelina J. Sharp, deceased," was upheld, and in Webb v. Den, 58 U. S. (17 How.) 576, 15 L. Ed. 35, a deed to the "legatees and devisees of Anthony Bledsoe, deceased," was held to be sufficient on the ground that it necessarily referred to the will of said Bledsoe to ascertain the persons who were legatees and devisees. So in the instant case, a reference to the will, if it were not set aside, would make certain the class of persons who were to take as grantees, and, if the will were set aside, the laws of succession to property in cases of intestacy (Civ. Code, §§ 1383–1405) would make certain those entitled to take.

[6] The above-cited decisions are illustrative of a tendency on the part of the courts to give effect to the obvious intention of a person as revealed by the language of the deed interpreted in the light of the circumstances which most probably influenced the conduct of the person whose purpose or intent is the subject of inquiry. The deed in the instant case, executed by the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, a corporation, and conveying the real property therein described to the "heirs or devisees of Jennie C. Hurd, deceased." recites the execution of said note and deed of trust made in favor of Jennie C. Hurd, since deceased; the default of the maker of the said deed of trust and note; the exercise of the option to declare the full amount of the indebtedness due by the executrix; the sale, pursuant to notice duly given, of the property embraced in the deed of trust to the parties of the second part ("the heirs or devisees of Jennie C. Hurd, deceased"), and the conveyance of said property "unto the said parties of the second part herein, their heirs or assigns forever." We think the deed thus indubitably furnishes intrinsic evidence of an intent to convey to heirs if the probate court should thereafter determine the property to have vested in heirs and to devisees if the probate court should determine said property to have vested in devisees pursuant to the last will and testament of decedent. In brief, it was the intention of the grantor to augment the estate of Jennie C. Hurd, deceased. This construction is strengthened by a consideration of the circumstances of the transaction, which conclusively show that such should have been, and in fact was, the object of the parties. A delivery of the deed to plaintiff as executrix vested title in the persons entitled to succeed to the property. It was but the natural, logical, and just effort to return the title back into the stream from which the deed from decedent to defendant diverted it.

The case of Hogan v. Page, 2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 605, 17 L. Ed. 854, furnishes a helpful analogy. It is there stated that a difficulty had occurred at the land office in respect to the form of patent certificates and patents, arising out of applications to have them issued in the name of an assignee of the original grantee, thereby imposing upon the office the burden of inquiring into the derivative title presented by the applicant. As a result, a formula was adopted of issuing the patent to the original grantee "or his legal representatives." The formula was held to embrace representatives of the original grantee in the land by contract, such as assignees or grantees, as well as by operation of law, and to leave the question open to inquiry in a court of justice as to whom the certificate, patent or confirmation should inure.

In Ready v. Kearsley, 14 Mich. 215, a deed to "S or his heirs" was upheld. The court, in an opinion written by the eminent Mr. Justice Cooley, said:

"The deed is to Stewart or his heirs; and it is supposed to fall under the condemnation of that rule of the common law, that a grant made to J. S. or W. S. in the disjunctive, is void for uncertainty [citing authorities].

"It is evident, however, that the reason upon which the case instanced rests, does not apply to this deed. A grant to J. S. or W. S. is void from the manifest impossibility of determining which shall take, when the grantor has failed to express his intent. But no such difficulty can arise in the case of a grant to J. S. or to his heirs. If J. S. is living, he has no heirs; and no two parties can claim adversely as grantees under the deed. The manifest intent here was to vest the title in Stewart, if living, and in his heirs or devisees, if he were then dead. Conveyances in this form by public officers or boards have not been uncommon, for the reason that such conveyances are usually made at a period subsequent to that when the right to the conveyance accrued; and it is not always known when the deed is made, that the party entitled is living."

By applying the reasoning adopted by Mr. Justice Cooley in the above-quoted excerpt to the concrete facts of this case no uncertainty is left to cloud the situation. "That is certain which can be made certain." Civ. Code, § 3538. The will makes absolute disposition of all decedent's property to certain named devisees and legatees. If the will is valid, the question of heirship would not arise. If, on the other hand, the will should be held to be invalid, the question of devisees or legatees would not be in the case. It is certain that the fixing of the status of one class would eliminate the other as distributees of the estate. The common-law rule that a deed to "J. S. or W. S." is void for uncertainty cannot rule the decision in the instant case. In the former case there was no method by which the grantor's intent could be discovered. In the instant case no such irremediable uncertainty exists. But even the common-law rule of strict construction as applied to deeds has been greatly relaxed or modified in this state by statutes and judicial decisions, with a view of effecting the grantor's intent as shown by extrinsic circumstances pertinent to that issue. Authorities are numerous on this point. It is not, however, intended by this decision to depart from the rule of the common law in proper cases, but to withhold a strict application with respect to cases like the present one, wherein a good and sufficient reason appears upon the face of the transaction for so doing.

Respondent calls upon us to keep in mind the far-reaching effect that a decision adverse to that rendered by the trial court would have upon title as affecting many persons and unsettling vast property rights. It is claimed that it is, and for many years has been, the practice of the large title companies of this state to make deeds in the form of the one here in question; that this practice is not limited to the state of California, but obtains in other states. From what has been said, it is not necessary to decide whether courts will take judicial notice of such a practice or usage on the theory that they ought to take notice of the "due course, rules and forms of business." Sections 1452 and 1581, Code of Civil Procedure, wherein "heirs" and "devisees" are coupled with the disjunctive "or," as in the deed before us, are cited by respondent as buttressing her claim that the phrase "heirs or devisees," as used in the Code, has exactly the same relative meaning as those words were used and intended to be used by the grantor in the deed before us for construction. The suggestion adds support to the view already expressed. Ready v. Kearsley, supra.

[7] The property being subject to the control and possession of the plaintiff as executrix in the same manner as real property vested in decedent at the date of her death, the plaintiff was a proper party to bring the action, and the joinder of heirs and devisees was not required. Code Civ. Proc. § 1582.

SHENK, J. I dissent. There are two ways by which title to real property may devolve. One is by operation of law, and other is by an instrument in writing. Section 1091, Civ. Code. The devolution here attempted was by an instrument in writing which was voluntary. In such case the party who is to take as grantee must be sufficiently ascertained by the writing itself, or it is a nullity. Rixford v. Zeigler, 150 Cal. 435, 88 P. 1092, 119 Am. St. Rep. 229. The general rule that a deed to "J. S. or W. S." would be void for uncertainty is not questioned. Here the deed runs to the "heirs or devisees." It must be assumed that there may be heirs who are not devisees, and likewise that there may be devisees who are not heirs. If A and B are heirs and not devisees and C and D are devisees and not heirs, a conveyance to "A and B or C and D" would seem to me to be fatally uncertain as to the parties' grantee. Furthermore, to constitute a delivery of a voluntary conveyance, there must not only be delivery by the grantor but an acceptance by the grantee. Bank of Healdsburg v. Bailhache, 65 Cal. 327, 4 P. 106; 9 Cal. Jur. p. 149. Who is to accept the conveyance here involved? Neither of the designated classes would act for the other. Their interests may be adverse. The analogy between the effect of this deed and the passing of title to the "heirs or devisees" by operation of law is by no means satisfactory. In the one case the law requires the voluntary act of the grantor to designate his grantee, who must be a natural or an artificial person capable of taking title, and this designation must be certain. In the other case the law designates the repository of the title of deceased persons subject to administration. The one is a matter of contract, among the incidents of which is certainty of the contracting parties. The other is a matter of legislative control unrestrained by contract or by constitutional provision safeguarding the contractual relation. Without something further in the designation of the grantees herein, I fail to see how the title vested in them, if it be vested, may be disturbed by creditors of the estate who would be privileged to resort to the property to satisfy their claims if the title had been taken by the representative of the estate subject to administration. If they take at all, they take by means of a voluntary conveyance from a third party, not subject to administration, or in a representative capacity, but as persons in esse. When the deed is recorded, section 4132 of the Political Code requires the recorder to index the "Names of Grantees." This is impossible in the case of this deed, for the grantees are unnamed, are in the disjunctive, and no means are provided in the instrument itself for their determination except by a lawsuit or other court proceedings. This, to my mind, is neither authorized nor contemplated by our law governing the voluntary transfer of title to real property.

BERTSCHMAN v. COVELL et al.

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 11, 1928.

1. Mortgages 🔑343—Member of law firm representing trustee had authority to conduct foreclosure sale under trust deed which permitted sale by trustee or agent.

Member of law firm, representing trustee in foreclosure of deed of trust which expressly provided that sale might be conducted by trustee or agent, had authority to conduct sale, notwithstanding want of express or formal authorization.

2. Mortgages 🔑343—Trustee's acceptance of proceeds and execution of deed cured any irregularity in attorney's conduct of foreclosure sale under deed of trust.

If trustee's appointment of member of his law firm to act as agent in conducting foreclosure sale under deed of trust was informal, rendering sale irregular, informality was cured by subsequent ratification by trustee's acceptance of proceeds of sale and execution of deed to purchaser's transferee.

3. Mortgages 🔑369(6)—Subsequent incumbrancer held not entitled to avoid foreclosure sale because of agreement restricting bidding; objection being available to debtor alone.

Subsequent incumbrancer held not entitled to set aside foreclosure sale under prior trust deed because of agreement of two of bidders not to bid against each other, since subsequent incumbrancer had right to attend sale and bid in property, and debtor alone was entitled to complain of improper agreement among bidders.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Action by Maude M. Bertschman against George F. Covell and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hawkins & Hawkins, of Modesto, for appellant.

A. J. Carlson and Vernon F. Gant, both of Modesto, and Young & Hudson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiff prosecutes this appeal from a judgment in the defendants' favor after the sustaining of a demurrer to her amended complaint, the plaintiff declining to further amend. The plaintiff was the holder of a mortgage upon certain real property in Stanislaus county, owned by one Blanche B. Morton, who, prior to the making of said mortgage, had made, executed, and delivered to the defendant Western American Realty Company, as trustee for the defendant Anglo-California Trust Company, a trust deed to secure the payment of a promissory note to the latter for the sum of $100,000, and which trust deed had been duly recorded prior to the execution of the plaintiff's mortgage. Blanche B. Morton having defaulted in her payments upon the aforesaid note, the trustee proceeded to sell the property covered by both these incumbrances at trustee's sale. It is not disputed that notices of default and of the election to sell under the terms of the deed of trust were duly made, given, and recorded as required by the terms thereof, nor is it disputed that the notice of sale was duly and regularly given by the trustee for the prescribed period, nor is there anything in the record to show that the plaintiff was not made fully aware of the foregoing facts and of the time and place of said sale prior to the holding thereof. The record disclosed that Blanche B. Morton, subsequent to the creation of said incumbrances, had leased the property covered thereby to one W. W. Cox, who had engaged in farming operations thereon, and was so engaged at the time of the giving of the trustee's notice of default and election to sell the property under said trust deed. Thereafter, and before said sale, Cox purchased and became the owner of said note and of the deed of trust securing the same, and was the owner thereof at the time of such sale. On the date of the sale, and at the place thereof, one R. G. Hudson, a member of the law firm of Young & Hudson, who were attorneys for the trustee, appeared and, assuming that he had power so to do, proceeded to conduct said sale and to continue the holding thereof to a later date, upon which he proceeded to hold said sale, offering the property for sale in a single parcel, and selling the same to the defendant George F. Covell, who bid $50 more therefor than the amount of $100,000 due upon said note, with interest and of the added cost of the sale. The property thus being sold to Covell, he recognized the lease of Cox, and permitted him to retain possession and to summer fallow and harvest the crop. Blanche B. Morton, the maker of said note and its security, has never, so far as the record discloses, objected to said sale on account of any irregularities occurring therein, and, while made a defendant in this action, has not appealed.

[1, 2] The plaintiff makes two main contentions upon this appeal. The first of these is that the trustee's sale was irregularly conducted because of the fact that R. G. Hudson, who appeared and assumed to act as the agent of the trustee, had no authority so to act, and that in so acting he exercised a discretion in the making of said sale, and appeared in the matter of postponing the date thereof which the trustee was alone empowered to exercise, and which it could not lawfully transfer to another. There is no merit in this contention, for, while it may be true that Hudson had not prior to said sale been constituted the agent of the trustee by any express or formal authorization to act, he was, as a member of the law firm representing such trustee, at least informally designated as its agent to conduct said sale. The deed of trust expressly provides that the sale thereunder may be conducted by the trustee or its agent, and, even if it be conceded that the appointment of Hudson to act as the agent of the trustee in the premises was informal, such informality would be cured by the subsequent ratification of the act of its said agent by the trustee, consisting in a receipt of the money which was the proceeds of said sale and the execution of the deed to the transferee of the purchaser at such sale. Pacific V. & P. Works v. Smith, 152 Cal. 507, 93 P. 85; Union Trust & Realty Co. v. Best, 160 Cal. 263, 116 P. 737.

[3] The appellant's other contention is, we think, equally without merit. It is, as alleged in her complaint, that the defendants Cox and Covell, who were present at said sale for the purpose of becoming bidders thereat, had entered into an agreement not to bid against each other; the consideration therefor being the agreement of Covell to convey the property to Cox for the amount bid thereon at the conclusion of the sale. Assuming the existence of such an agreement, it does not follow that the plaintiff would be entitled to take any advantage thereof for the purpose of having such sale avoided. The only person who would be entitled to complain of such an agreement between bidders would be the debtor, Blanche B. Morton. The plaintiff, as the junior mortgagee, had at all times the right to protect her own security by paying off or purchasing the prior incumbrance, or by being present at said sale and bidding for the property a sufficient amount to protect her own security. She did none of these things, and she makes no showing in her complaint that the aforesaid agreement between Covell and Cox in any way prevented the plaintiff from becoming a bidder at the sale or otherwise interfered with competitive bidding thereat. The action of Covell and Cox in agreeing between themselves as to the amount to be bid at the sale would be in no wise wrongful with respect to the rights and interests of each other or with respect to the rights and interests of any other person save and except the debtor herself, and could in no wise be made the basis of an attack upon the regularity of the sale in question on the part of a mere subsequent incumbrancer, whose only rights in the premises are those above set forth.

No error appearing in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

Where parties, after appeal, entered into several stipulations relating to contents of proposed bill of exceptions after time for certification had expired, thus leading appellants to believe that time for preparation and engrossment of bill had been waived, appellants were entitled to mandamus to require trial judge to certify engrossed bill of exceptions after his refusal to do so because of the delay.

fendants appealed from said judgment and in due time thereafter prepared, served, and delivered a bill of exceptions upon such appeal. On November 3, 1927, the plaintiffs prepared and delivered their proposed amendments to said bill of exceptions, and the matter of the settlement thereof came on for hearing before the judge of said court on or about December 8, 1927, at which time the parties entered into a stipulation as to what, in substance, said bill of exceptions should contain. Upon the filing of the bill of exceptions, the court settled the same, and directed it to be engrossed. It was then agreed between counsel that the attorney for the defendants should prepare the necessary pages to be inserted in said bill pursuant to stipulation, and should submit same to plaintiffs' counsel for approval. Thereafter, at various times, the parties entered into a number of stipulations as to the form and contents of the bill and the matter was pending until the early part of June, 1928; the appellants, apparently in good faith, proceeded with the final preparation and engrossment of the bill, and being led to believe by the conduct of counsel for respondents that the matter of time for the completion of said engrossment would not be insisted upon, and that it had been waived.

On or about June 12, 1928, counsel for respondents, for the first time, presented to appellants their objection to the certification of the proposed bill of exceptions, whereupon counsel for the appellants immediately presented the bill to Judge Butler for certification, but the judge required a brief notice to be given of the application of appellants for certification of the engrossed bill of exceptions, and on the 14th day of June a hearing was had upon such application and the objections thereto. At the conclusion of this hearing the trial judge sustained the objections and refused to certify said engrossed bill because of the delay.

As we have stated, it is apparent from the record that the appellants acted in good faith in the preparation of the bill, and it is also apparent that they were misled by counsel for respondents into the belief that the statutory time for the completion of its engrossment and for its certification had been waived by counsel for respondents. The record contains stipulations signed by counsel for respondents, relating to the contents of the proposed bill of exceptions, as late as the latter part of February or the 1st of March, 1928, which was several months after the appellants' time had expired.

In view of this situation and of the policy of this court to determine upon the merits all appeals prosecuted in good faith, we think the writ prayed for should issue. Cases presenting a similar principle are: Title Ins., etc., Co. v. Cal. Dev. Co., 171 Cal. 173, 152 P. 542; Slye v. Hunt, 29 Cal. App. 117, 154 P. 607; Kramm v. Stockton Electric Railroad Co., 22 Cal. App. 737, 136 P. 523; Hicks v. Masten, 101 Cal. 651, 36 P. 130.

It is ordered that the writ issue as prayed.

PERELLI-MINETTI et al. v. LAWSON et al.

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 27, 1928.

1. Frauds, statute of 🔑56(9)—Parol agreement for partnership in lands is valid and enforceable between parties.

Partnership in lands may be formed by parol agreement, and such agreement is valid and enforceable between the parties.

2. Partnership 🔑70—Partners bear confidential relations and are trustees for each other in partnership transactions.

Partners sustain confidential relations towards each other, and each is a trustee for the other in all partnership transactions.

3. Partnership 🔑67—Whether property owned by partner before formation of partnership and used for partnership purposes became partnership property is determined by agreement and conduct.

Whether property which was owned by one of partners before formation of partnership and thereafter used for partnership purposes has become part of partnership property or remains property of the one partner is determined by partnership agreement and conduct of partners.

4. Partnership 🔑68(1)—Partnership property need not be purchased with partnership funds and, as between partners, whether land standing in names of partners as individuals is partnership property is determined by understanding and intention.

Partnership property need not be purchased with partnership funds, and true method of determining, as between partners, whether land standing in names of partners as individuals is partnership property is to ascertain understanding and intention of partners themselves from their conduct and course of dealing.

5. Partnership 🔑68(1)—Facts held to show that land in which partners had interests before formation of partnership became partnership property.

Where partners each had undivided one-third interest in land before formation of partnership and thereafter purchased remaining one-third interest, facts held to show that land became partnership property.

6. Husband and wife 🔑264—Evidence held not to show that partnership land was community property of one partner.

Evidence held not to show that partnership real estate was community property of one partner, in view of Civ. Code, § 163.

7. Husband and wife 🔑267(1)—Statute requiring wife to join in instruments conveying or incumbering community realty is inapplicable to land acquired by husband prior to year 1917 (Civ. Code, § 172a, as added by St. 1917, p. 829).

Civ. Code, § 172a, as added by St. 1917, p. 829, providing that husband has management and control of community real property, but that wife must join with him in executing instruments leasing it for longer period than one year, or selling, conveying, or incumbering it, is inapplicable to land acquired by husband prior to year 1917.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1056(4)—Excluding evidence that lands were owned by tenants in common, if error, held harmless, where court so found.

Exclusion of evidence to show that individuals owned lands as tenants in common during existence of partnership, if error, held harmless, where court found that they in fact did hold lands as tenants in common.

9. Partition 🔑63(3)—In partition suit by beneficiaries and executors under deceased partner's will, evidence held to sustain findings that lands constituted partnership assets to which surviving partner was entitled for liquidation purposes.

In suit for partition by beneficiaries and executors under will of deceased partner against surviving partner and others, evidence held sufficient to sustain findings of trial court that lands were partnership assets to which surviving partner was entitled for liquidation purposes.

10. Quieting title 🔑44(3)—In suit to quiet title by beneficiaries and executors under deceased partner's will against surviving partner and others, evidence held to sustain findings for defendants.

In suit to quiet title by beneficiaries and executors under will of deceased partner against surviving partner and others, evidence held sufficient to sustain findings of trial court in favor of defendants.

11. Partnership 🔑258(8)—In suit by beneficiaries and executors under deceased partner's will against surviving partner and others to enjoin selling or mortgaging growing crops, evidence held to sustain findings for defendants.

In suit by beneficiaries and executors under will of deceased partner against surviving partner and others to enjoin surviving partner from selling or mortgaging growing crops, evidence held sufficient to sustain findings of trial court in favor of defendants.

12. Partnership 🔑258(8)—In suit by beneficiaries and executors under deceased partner's will against surviving partner and others to cancel mortgage upon growing crops, evidence held to sustain findings for defendants.

In suit by beneficiaries and executors under will of deceased partner against surviving partner and others to cancel mortgage given by surviving partner upon growing crops, evidence held sufficient to sustain findings of trial court in favor of defendants, in view of Civ. Code, § 2450, subd. 3, and § 2461.

13. Partnership 🔑244—Surviving partner had right, on death of partner, to continue in possession of partnership and to settle its business (Civ. Code, § 2450, subd. 3, and § 2461; Code Civ. Proc. § 1585).

Since death of partner dissolves general partnership (Civ. Code, § 2450, subd. 3), surviving partner, by express terms of Code Civ. Proc. § 1585, and Civ. Code, § 2461, had right to continue in possession of partnership and to settle its business.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action for partition of real property and other relief by Joseph V. Perelli-Minetti and others against W. H. Lawson and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

For opinion of the District Court of Appeal, see 264 P. 772.

Harry A. McKenzie and E. V. McKenzie, both of San Francisco, and W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for appellants.

Haven, Athearn, Chandler & Farmer, Athearn, Chandler & Farmer, and Walter Hoffman, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Upon the very earnest insistence of appellants that the decision of this case by the District Court of Appeal, affirming the judgment of the trial court, did not correctly state the law, and had done an injustice to the appellants, a hearing was granted by this court to enable it to carefully study the record upon appeal and the contentions of the parties with reference thereto. After careful consideration, we are satisfied with the decision of the District Court of Appeal of the state of California, in and for the Third Appellate District, and hereby adopt the opinion of said court, written by Presiding Justice Finch thereof, as follows:

The plaintiffs, who are beneficiaries under the will of A. J. Perelli-Minetti, deceased, brought this action for the partition of two tracts of land, to quiet their alleged title to an undivided half interest therein, to enjoin the defendant Lawson from selling or mortgaging the crops growing on the land, and to cancel a mortgage given by him upon such crops. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiffs have appealed.

Prior to June 9, 1921, Lawson, S. Scatena and Perelli-Minetti were the owners of the lands in suit, the legal title standing in the names of those persons, without further designation. They had operated the lands as partners, growing grapes thereon and manufacturing wine and grape juice. It is uncertain whether or not the real estate was partnership property, but the court found that, at the time stated, Lawson and Perelli-Minetti each owned an undivided one-third interest in the land, and therefore it will be assumed, for the purposes of this opinion, that the lands were not then partnership property. The court found:

"In the latter part of May, and prior to June 9, 1921, A. J. Perelli-Minetti and W. H. Lawson entered into an agreement for the formation of a partnership concerning the above-described lands, and did form a partnership for the purpose of buying and selling said lands and other lands and the growing, cultivating, harvesting, and selling of the crops therefrom, and for such other purposes incident thereto and necessary therein as might be deemed proper by said copartners * * * [and] agreed that said partnership should be operated under the firm name and style of Lawson & Perelli, and that the profits and losses arising out of the operation of said lands should be divided equally between them. Pursuant to said partnership agreement, and for the purposes of said partnership, on or about June 9, 1921, A. J. Perelli-Minetti and W. H. Lawson purchased from S. Scatena the remaining one-third interest of S. Scatena in the lands. * * *

"Pursuant to said partnership agreement and partnership, A. J. Perelli-Minetti and W. H. Lawson forthwith took possession of said lands and did business thereon under the firm name and style of Lawson & Perelli, incurred obligations, offered for sale, cultivated and maintained said lands, raised crops thereon, and harvested the same therefrom, for the joint benefit of each of them, and each of them shared equally in the cost of maintenance and operation of said lands, and in the cost of operating the same, and the planting and harvesting of the crops produced on said lands, and shared equally in all profits and losses arising or accruing out of the acquisition of said lands, or the cultivating, planting, harvesting, or marketing of the crops produced on said lands.

"Pursuant to said partnership agreement, and pursuant to said partnership, and on the 9th day of June, 1921, partnership books were opened and kept under the name of Lawson & Perelli. Said lands * * * were carried on said books as assets of the partnership of Lawson & Perelli. For the years 1921, 1922, and 1923 written income tax reports were returned to the United States government on partnership form, signed 'Lawson & Perelli, by A. J. Perelli-Minetti,' listing said lands as an asset of the partnership of Lawson & Perelli, and, among other things, indicating the amount of profits and losses concerning said partnership of Lawson & Perelli arising from the operation of said lands.

"From the time of said agreement of partnership until the death of A. J. Perelli-Minetti on or about December 12, 1924, A. J. Perelli-Minetti and W. H. Lawson did business as partners, and pursuant to said partnership agreement, under the firm name and style of Lawson & Perelli, and cultivated said lands in the manner provided in said agreement of partnership.

"Upon the death of A. J. Perelli-Minetti on or about December 12, 1924, W. H. Lawson, as surviving partner of the partnership of Lawson & Perelli, took control of, and at all times thereafter remained in control of, and now is in control and possession and entitled to the possession of said lands and the crops growing thereon and the appurtenances and the whole thereof.

"A. J. Perelli-Minetti and W. H. Lawson during said partnership executed on behalf of the partnership of Lawson & Perelli a mortgage upon the lands described in parcel 1, Exhibit A, to the California Joint-Stock Land Bank, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of California, as security for a promissory note in the sum of $35,000. Said mortgage is an outstanding obligation of the partnership of Lawson & Perelli.

"During said partnership A. J. Perelli-Minetti and W. H. Lawson, in behalf of said partnership of Lawson & Perelli, made and executed a mortgage to S. Scatena on the lands described in parcel 2, Exhibit A, as security for the payment of the sum of $41,000. Said mortgage is an outstanding obligation of said partnership.

"Said mortgages were carried on the partnership books of Lawson & Perelli as a liability against said partnership. For the years 1921, 1922, and 1923, written income tax reports were filed with the United States government on partnership forms. Said income tax reports were signed 'Lawson & Perelli, by A. J. Perelli-Minetti,' and said mortgages were listed on said reports as a liability against said partnership.

"W. H. Lawson, as surviving partner of said partnership of Lawson & Perelli, has, since the death of said A. J. Perelli-Minetti, at all times been and now is in the exclusive and entire control of said lands hereinbefore described, and the crops grown thereon, and all of the assets of said partnership. Said W. H. Lawson claims no interest in the assets of said partnership other than an interest as surviving partner of said partnership of Lawson & Perelli, and, as such surviving partner, the right to liquidate the affairs thereof.

"On or about the 11th day of April, 1925, W. H. Lawson, as surviving partner of Lawson & Perelli, and pursuant to his duties as such, made a chattel mortgage on growing crops on the lands described in Exhibit A to the Pacific Fruit Exchange, a corporation, duly authorized and existing under the laws of the state of California, as security for a sum of money not to exceed $15,000 advanced to said W. H. Lawson as surviving partner. Said W. H. Lawson borrowed said money in pursuance of his duties as said surviving partner and may be used only in liquidating the affairs of said partnership, and said mortgage was made, and the proceeds thereof may be used and are intended by him to be used only pursuant to his duties as such surviving partner.

"Upon the death of A. J. Perelli-Minetti, and immediately thereafter and ever since, W. H. Lawson, as such surviving partner, took possession and has maintained possession of the assets of said partnership, and has proceeded to liquidate the affairs of the same, paying bills of said partnership, collecting income accruing to said partnership, and caring for the lands, crops, and appurtenances thereto. Said W. H. Lawson has been diligent and faithful in the performance of said duty as surviving partner and in the liquidation of the affairs of said partnership.

"The assets of said partnership consist of the lands described in Exhibit A and the growing crops and personal property located on said lands, wine, machinery, trays, cooperage, and miscellaneous incidental property connected therewith.

"It is necessary for W. H. Lawson, as surviving partner of said partnership of Lawson & Perelli, to have exclusive control and possession of all of the assets of said partnership for the purpose of liquidating the affairs of said partnership.

"At the time of the death of said A. J. Perelli-Minetti on or about the 12th day of December, 1924, there were outstanding obligations existing against said partnership and bills receivable uncollected by said partnership. There are now outstanding obligations existing against said partnership and accounts receivable still uncollected. No accounting has ever been had as against any parties concerned or interested in said partnership. The affairs of said partnership are not yet wound up or liquidated."

In appellant's opening brief it is said:

> "There is only one primary issue in the case: Were the two ranches held as partnership land, or were the two owners tenants in common thereof? * * * Even if the land be deemed partnership property, still unless partnership creditors' rights intervened the land would descend to the heirs or be subject to testamentary disposition. * * * Therefore, we contend two propositions, that we are tenants in common; and if we are not tenants in common, there is no reason for any administration or handling of partnership affairs by the partner."

[1-4] The partnership agreement was not in writing. "A partnership in lands may be formed by an agreement in parol. Such parol agreement is valid and may be enforced between the parties." Musick Cons. Oil Co. v. Chandler, 158 Cal. 7, 12, 109 P. 613, 614; Koyer v. Willmon, 150 Cal. 785, 787, 90 P. 135; Scott v. Junquist, 179 Cal. 7, 9, 175 P. 412. The relations between the partners were confidential and each was a trustee for the other in all partnership transactions. Koyer v. Willmon, supra. "If property owned by one of the partners before the organization of the firm has been used for partnership purposes, it must be determined from the partnership agreement and the conduct of the parties whether it has become a part of the firm property or remains the property of the one partner. Thus a lease of premises occupied by the firm business, procured by one partner before formation of the partnership, may become firm property without formal assignment, if it is so understood and the partners regard it as such." Rowley's Modern Law of Partnership, § 277. "It is not necessary to show that the partnership property was purchased with partnership funds. Land standing in the name of an individual partner may have been contributed by him as his portion to the firm assets. The true method of determining, as between the partners themselves, whether land standing in the name of the individuals is or is not to be treated as partnership property is to ascertain from their conduct and course of dealing the understanding and intention of the partners themselves, which, when ascertained, should unquestionably control." Johnson v. Hogan, 158 Mich. 635, 123 N. W. 891, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 889. In McNab v. Mills, 199 Cal. 231, 248 P. 657, while they were the owners of a tract of land as tenants in common, the plaintiff and the defendant entered into an oral agreement of partnership, one of the terms of which was that the land "was to become the capital of the partnership and was to become partnership property." The land was thereafter operated by the partners as partnership property in accordance with the terms of the oral agreement. The court said:

> "While no written agreement expressing the terms and conditions of the partnership alleged to exist * * * was entered into, we are satisfied from a careful reading of the evidence that the actions, transactions, conduct, and understanding of the parties amply support the finding of the trial court that they entered into a partnership, which continued to exist. * * * In the language of the trial court: ' * * * Even though the ranch property in question may have originally come to the parties in the character of tenants in common, this character was destroyed by the parties having farmed and operated it upon joint account and as partnership property and by their acts thereby made it partnership assets.' "

[5] Appellants discuss the subject of trusts at considerable length, but the facts found by the court bring the case so clearly within the principles of law announced in the foregoing decisions that it is deemed unnecessary to pursue the subject further.

[6] Appellants contend that the interest of Perelli-Minetti in the land was community property, and that in such a case "no partnership lien can be created in land unless a wife joins in the conveyance." At the time of the organization of the partnership, section 172a of the Civil Code, enacted in the year 1917 (St. 1917, p. 829), provided:

> "The husband has the management and control of the community real property but the wife must join with him in executing any instrument by which such community real property or any interest therein is leased for a longer period than one year, or is sold, conveyed or incumbered."

[7] It need not be determined whether that section is applicable in partnership matters. The evidence does not show that the property in question was community property. Mrs. Perelli-Minetti testified that she was married 22 years ago; that at the time of their marriage Mr. Perelli-Minetti had no property; and that thereafter he acquired no property "by virtue of some one dying, any wills bequesting anything of that kind." Property acquired by gift after marriage is separate property. Civ. Code, § 163. The evidence does not show when the money with which Perelli-Minetti purchased the property was acquired. If acquired prior to the year 1917, section 172a is not applicable. Roberts v. Wehmeyer, 191 Cal. 601, 218 P. 22; Staton v. Buster (Cal. App.) 249 P. 878.

[8] It is contended that the court erred in excluding evidence tending to prove that Scatena, Lawson, and Perelli-Minetti owned the lands in question as tenants in common during the existence of their partnership. In their closing brief appellants say that the court found "each of the individuals [Scatena, Lawson and Perelli-Minetti] owned a one-third interest in both ranches as tenants in common." This last statement is correct. Since the issue was found in appellants' favor, the exclusion of evidence tending to prove that issue was of no possible effect against them.

[9-12] Appellants specify many particulars in which they contend that "the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision and judgment." It is unnecessary to follow these specifications in detail. The tracts of land referred to in the findings were known as the Geyserville ranch and the Santa Rosa ranch. There was a winery on the Geyserville ranch. Lawson testified:

> "We agreed like this—If we buy, * * * we will then go into a partnership * * * and make wine for ourselves, or grape juice, in the Geyserville ranch. * * * We agreed to take over * * * the Santa Rosa ranch, work it on up into condition and sell it in the next year at all the profit we could get out of it. * * * We would buy the Santa Rosa ranch, * * * Perelli-Minetti and I, and sell it. We would hold on to the Geyserville ranch, where the grape juice plant was, and manufacture grape juice, and our business would be under the name of Lawson and Perelli, * * * as partners. * * * We went to Mr. Norton's office, and drew up a contract, taking over all of the property of Scatena, Lawson, and Perelli, except the wine, and we went from then on, we were under the name of Lawson & Perelli, the firm name of Lawson & Perelli, and partners."

The lands were thereafter carried as partnership property on the firm's books, entered as such in the income tax statements, and treated by the partners as partnership property in all respects as stated in the findings. The partners maintained joint bank accounts. Up to April 26, 1923, moneys deposited therein were made payable "to either, or the survivor." After that time both their signatures were required. It was stipulated that:

> "All of the checks prior to that time * * * were in the name of Lawson and Perelli-Minetti, were signed * * * by either Mr. Lawson or Mr. Perelli-Minetti, the great vast majority of them all being signed by Mr. Perelli-Minetti."

It was also stipulated that:

> "Subsequent to July, 1923, * * * it was agreed between them that all bills, as far as possible, should be paid, one half by each, and that all the receipts coming in should be divided at the time, one half going to Mr. Lawson and the other half going to Mr. Perelli, and that as far as they could consistently, they followed that out up until the time of the death of Mr. Perelli."

Other than as appears from this stipulation, the business of the partnership was conducted in the same manner after July, 1923, as before that time. Nothing was done to dissolve the partnership, and there was no accounting between the partners. Most of the objections to the sufficiency of the evidence are covered by what has already been said, and the others are deemed to be without merit. The material findings are amply supported by the evidence.

[13] A general partnership is dissolved by the death of a partner. Civ. Code, § 2450, subd. 3. Lawson, as the surviving partner, had "the right to continue in possession of the partnership, and to settle its business." Code Civ. Proc. § 1585. "A partner authorized to act in liquidation may collect, compromise, or release any debts due to the partnership, pay or compromise any claims against it, and dispose of the partnership property." Civ. Code, § 2461; Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 168 Cal. 120, 138, 142 P. 83. "The surviving partner must settle the affairs of the partnership without delay." Code Civ. Proc. § 1585. Since more than three years have elapsed since the death of Perelli-Minetti, it is probable that the affairs of the partnership in question here have been settled, but, if they have not, then the plaintiffs may compel a settlement in an appropriate proceeding for that purpose.

PACIFIC READY-CUT HOMES, Inc., v. LAW et al. (L. A. 9531.)★

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 28, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank. Dec. 27, 1928.

1. Mechanics' liens ⚷212(1)—Assignee of securities to finance construction of houses cannot foreclose liens for labor and material furnished, where it negligently intrusted securities to assignor, who embezzled them.

Assignee of securities issued to finance construction of houses held not entitled to foreclose mechanics' liens for materials and labor furnished in construction of such houses, where assignee's negligence in replacing securities in hands of its assignor, who embezzled them, was the cause of its resulting loss.

2. Mechanics' liens ⚷127—Filing of construction contract held unnecessary to charge assignee of contractor with knowledge of its provisions (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183).

Assignee of original contractor assuming construction contract must be deemed to have notice of provisions of construction contract, making its filing as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, as to him unnecessary; such filing being for the purpose of giving notice to persons performing work or furnishing materials of the extent of the owner's liability.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Consolidated actions by the Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., against L. L. Law, whose true name is Lyle Laub, and against Peter Peterson and Nora Peterson, wherein the last-named defendants filed a cross-complaint against plaintiff and the Standard Accident Insurance Company as a cross-defendant. Judgment for cross-complainants against both cross-defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 272 P. 579.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

L. C. Woods and Culver & Nourse, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHENK, J. The plaintiff, Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., brought two actions against the defendants Peter Peterson, Nora Peterson, and L. L. Law to foreclose mechanics' liens. The defendants Peterson answered and also filed a cross-complaint, wherein they sought to recover from the plaintiff and its bondsman, Standard Accident Insurance Company, certain damages alleged to have been sustained by them by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to complete the construction of certain improvements on land owned by the Petersons, which consists of two residence lots in the city of Los Angeles. The actions were tried together. Judgment was entered in each case in favor of the Petersons on their cross-complaint and against both cross-defendants, viz. the Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., and Standard Accident Insurance Company, in the sum of $1,675 and costs. The plaintiff was denied the foreclosure of its alleged liens, and that company is the appellant in each case. The Standard Accident Insurance Company is not appealing. The record in both cases is the same except as to the description of the lots, and the facts, which are not in dispute, are substantially as follows:

On or about the 30th day of January, 1924, the Petersons, as owners, entered into a contract with one L. Law, a building contractor, whereby the latter agreed to construct on each of the described lots, in accordance with certain plans and specifications, a double bungalow and garage, for the contract price of $4,704. The total contract price was, therefore, $9,408. Under the contract, Law agreed to accept as payment of the contract price two promissory notes in the sum of $3,750 each, secured by first mortgages on said lots, and two promissory notes in the sum of $954 each, secured by trust deeds on said lots, which trust deeds should be subordinate to the mortgages. The notes, mortgages, and trust deeds were executed by the Petersons and delivered to Law before any work was done or materials were furnished in the construction of said improvements. On February 11, Law, while still holding the four promissory notes and said mortgages and trust deeds, proceeded to enter into two contracts, in writing, with the Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., whereby the latter would agree to construct the bungalows and garages on said lots in accordance with said plans and specifications for the stipulated price of $2,823 for each of the houses and $299 for each of the garages. The Petersons were requested by Law to consent to this arrangement but they refused to do so unless the Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., would provide security that it would construct said improvements in accordance with said plans and specifications. This the corporation agreed to do. Thereafter the Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., and Law entered into said contracts whereby the corporation agreed to and did accept from Law as full payment of its contract price the latter's promissory note due in 90 days and secured by the assignment to the corporation of the notes, mortgages, and trust deeds held by Law against the Petersons. On March 13, 1924, the Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., as principal, and Standard Accident Insurance Company, as surety, executed a bond binding themselves to the Petersons as obligors in the sum of $6,000, and conditioned on the faithful performance by the principal of all of the terms and conditions of the contract between the Petersons and Law. The Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., then entered upon the performance of the construction contract, and proceeded with the same until April 4, 1924, when it ceased its labor and the furnishing of any further materials. The Petersons completed the improvements as contemplated by the original contracts, and it is for the cost of such completion that they were awarded damages in these actions.

On April 23, 1924, the plaintiff filed its notices of lien on each of said lots claiming the reasonable value of the work performed and the materials furnished in the construction of said improvements and in due time commenced these actions to foreclose said liens.

It further appears that, when Law entered into his written contracts with the plaintiff, he represented to it that he would cause the securities then assigned to it to be negotiated within 90 days after February 11, 1924, so as to net the plaintiff the sum of $6,094 in cash; that prior to the 12th day of May Law went to the plaintiff and stated that he had a purchaser for the Peterson notes; that the money was in escrow with the Title Insurance & Trust Company, and he requested the plaintiff to transmit the Peterson securities and the Law note to the Title Insurance & Trust Company with its instructions. The plaintiff prepared such instructions, authorizing the Title Insurance & Trust Company to use the notes and collateral provided the sum of $6,094 be paid to the plaintiff. The instructions and other documents were placed in an envelope by the plaintiff and sealed. At the request of Law himself, he was permitted by the plaintiff to take the envelope and its contents for delivery to the Title Insurance & Trust Company. Instead of delivering the document to the Title Insurance & Trust Company intact, as he said he would do, he removed therefrom the instructions of the plaintiff and substituted instructions directing the Title Insurance & Trust Company to pay the money to himself. The money was paid to him on or about March 24, 1924. On or about the 12th day of April following, the plaintiff first discovered that it had been swindled by Law. It had him arrested for embezzlement, but, pending his preliminary hearing, he was removed from the jurisdiction under the extradition law to Indiana, where about forty counts of embezzlement were pending against him. Upon the discovery of the fraud, the plaintiff immediately served written notice of rescission on Law, the Petersons, and the Standard Accident Insurance Company, purporting to rescind all of the contracts between the plaintiff and Law and also the contract evidenced by said surety bond. The ground of the rescission was that all of said contracts with the plaintiff had been obtained through the false and fraudulent representations of Law and without any intention on his part to perform the same. The plaintiff thereafter brought an attachment suit against Law in Indiana, the efficacy of which is questionable.

The court found, among other things, that Law had assigned his contracts with the Petersons to the plaintiff; that the plaintiff accepted the assignment thereof and as a part of the same transaction executed the surety bond in favor of the Petersons; that the plaintiff took Law's 90-day collateral note secured by the Petersons' obligations as full payment of the contract price; that, in his dealing with the plaintiff, Law was not acting as the agent of the Petersons, but, on the contrary, dealt with the plaintiff wholly on his own behalf; that the first and only fraud appearing throughout the entire transaction was when Law obtained possession of the Peterson securities and his own promissory note and converted the proceeds thereof to his own use.

The plaintiff makes no claim, and there is no showing whatever, that the Petersons knew of or participated in the fraud practiced on the plaintiff by Law. The plaintiff was fully protected when it received the 90-day note of Law secured by the assignment of the Peterson notes, mortgages, and trust deeds. It was only through the plaintiff's negligence in intrusting the custody of the documents to Law that it suffered any loss.

[1] It is insisted by the plaintiff that the record shows that at the time Law entered into the contract with it he had no intention of performing the same and intended to get possession of the notes and other documents and convert them to his own use. Therefore, it is argued, said contract was properly rescinded, and there was no foundation for the execution of the surety bond. The answer to the contention is that, when Law executed and delivered his 90-day note and assigned the security for the same to the plaintiff, the contract had been fully executed and the plaintiff was fully protected. It was only because of the plaintiff's negligence in placing the documents in the hands of Law that it suffered any loss. The plaintiff was not obligated in any way to deliver the documents to Law, and, when it did so, it must be held responsible for its own negligent act.

[2] The plaintiff makes the further point that none of the construction contracts were filed for record as provided by section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that therefore the Petersons are not entitled to insist upon the protection thereof. The purpose of the filing of a construction contract for record is to give notice to all persons performing work or furnishing materials on the job of the extent of the owner's liability. The position of the plaintiff herein is that of an original contractor, and it, of course, must be deemed to have had notice of the contract provisions. We fail to see how the requirements of section 1183 have any applicability to the facts in this case.

The judgments are affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; LANGDON, J.

PACIFIC READY-CUT HOMES, Inc., v. SEEBER et al.

EHLEN v. WILLISTON & MEYFARTH et al.

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 28, 1928.

1. Principal and agent 🔑23(5)—Evidence sustained finding of ostensible agency of person embezzling money for construction of homes, requiring loss to be borne by principal (Civ. Code, § 2300, 2317, 2334).

Evidence held to sustain finding that party absconding with money paid to him for construction of homes was the ostensible agent of company furnishing labor and materials, with ostensible authority to bind it on contracts made by him with the various owners and materialman, under Civ. Code, §§ 2300, 2317, 2334, so that resulting loss should fall on company, precluding foreclosure of mechanics' liens for labor and material furnished.

2. Principal and agent ⚿160½—Persons intending to contract with principal could hold principal for resulting loss through agent's embezzlement where principal was disclosed when contracts were signed.

Under contract for erection of homes, signed by agent, who embezzled money paid thereon, and on which name of principal was disclosed, persons entering into contracts, who intended to enter into contract with principal and believed that they were so doing through its agent, held entitled to hold principal for resulting loss.

Department 2.

Appeals from Superior Court, Orange County; E. J. Marks, Judge.

Consolidated actions by the Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., against C. W. Seeber and others, and by H. O. Ehlen, etc., against Williston & Meyfarth, the Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., and others. From the judgments, the Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 272 P. 577.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Scarborough, Forgy & Reinhaus, of Santa Ana, for respondent Ehlen.

Kenneth H. Burns and C. N. Mozley, both of Santa Ana, for respondents Brown, Williston, and Meyfarth.

C. I. Sweet, of Los Angeles, for respondent Brown.

Seth B. Smith, of Los Angeles, for respondents Seeber and Cushing.

T. E. Burnham, for respondent Zumwalt.

Head, Rutan & Scovel, of Santa Ana, for respondent Crane.

SHENK, J. Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., brought five actions to foreclose mechanics' liens for lumber and materials furnished by it to the defendants C. W. Seeber, Williston & Meyfarth, Cora Zumwalt, Alice M. Brown, and C. W. Brown, as owners, respectively, in said actions. H. O. Ehlen, a plumbing contractor, was plaintiff in six actions brought to foreclose mechanics' liens for plumbing labor and materials, one against each of the persons named as defendant in the foregoing five actions and the sixth against Hattie J. Crane, all as owners. In each of the six actions brought by H. O. Ehlen, the Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., and C. O. Neese were also joined as defendants as the parties to whom and at whose request the plumbing labor and materials were furnished. C. O. Neese was also made a defendant in the five actions brought by Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., as the contractor and agent of the owners to whom the lumber and materials were furnished by it. It is undisputed that the materials furnished by appellant and the labor and materials furnished by H. O. Ehlen were so furnished and at the request and order of C. O. Neese and that C. O. Neese received from the respective owner defendants the full contract price therefor. C. O. Neese disappeared and absconded with the money paid to him by the respective parties.

The eleven actions were tried together on the issues raised by the various complaints, answers and cross-complaints and answers thereto. In the five cases brought by the Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., the trial court found that C. O. Neese was the ostensible agent of the plaintiff in the transactions involved and that he contracted with the various owner defendants as the ostensible agent of his principal; that the plaintiff therein was paid in full for the materials furnished, and rendered judgments for the defendant owners. In the six actions brought by H. O. Ehlen the trial court made a similar finding of the ostensible agency of C. O. Neese and further found that the Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., as principal, had received payment through its agent, C. O. Neese, on account of the contract price for plumbing labor and materials alleged to be due to H. O. Ehlen. The court denied the foreclosure of liens asserted on behalf of H. O. Ehlen, but rendered judgments in his favor against Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., for the amounts found to be due. The Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., has appealed from the judgments against it in each of the eleven cases. The appeals are consolidated and submitted on one set of briefs. The sole question presented for our consideration is whether the evidence sustains the finding that C. O. Neese was the ostensible agent of the Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., with ostensible authority to bind it on the contracts made by him with the various owner defendants and with H. O. Ehlen.

The plaintiff, Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., is a corporation, which has its principal office in the city of Los Angeles. It has for its declared purpose the reduction of labor costs to builders. It cuts and machines lumber materials for an entire building at its factory in accordance with plans and specifications selected by the prospective builder and delivers them at the building site ready to be placed into the structure. For the extension of its business, the officers of the corporation arranged with numerous individuals, for a specified commission on all orders sent in, to advertise its business and prevail upon prospective builders, within assigned territory, to engage the services of the corporation in supplying complete ready-cut lumber and materials. The corporation also advertised a service which included arrangements for financing the construction of buildings in its home territory of Los Angeles. It insists, however, that the individuals who undertook to extend the business of the corporation into other assigned territories were independent contractors and were engaged only to sell its product and to be responsible on their own account as contractors to the prospective builders. Mr. Baumgarten, an officer of the corporation, who concluded the arrangements with C. O. Neese for the Orange county territory, testified that there was no written contract with him, but that, pursuant to an oral understanding, Neese undertook to become what Mr. Baumgarten and the corporation insist was a "distributor" or purchaser of ready-cut building materials for Pacific Ready-Cut Homes to be erected in his exclusive territory, as distinguished from an agent who could bind Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., as a principal, on the contracts made by Neese as building contractor with the prospective builders. The contract made with each of the defendant owners in the five actions brought by Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., was in writing, and was signed by C. O. Neese, contractor, and by the owner as buyer. The contracts for plumbing work and materials to be installed in each of the structures involved in the six cases brought by H. O. Ehlen were orally made between H. O. Ehlen and C. O. Neese.

All parties to this controversy concede that it is settled law that ostensible agency cannot be created alone by the representations of the purported agent himself, but that there must be some act or conduct on the part of the principal by which he either intentionally or by want of ordinary care causes or allows a third person to believe that the agent possesses the authority to bind him as principal (Civ. Code, §§ 2300, 2317, 2334), and that, if there is in the record evidence of either intentional or negligent conduct on the part of the appellant which would lead the respondents to believe that Neese was, in fact, its agent, with authority to bind it on the contracts involved, and other contentions of appellant are answered, the findings of the trial court are sustained.

It must be concluded from a review of the evidence that the record is replete with instances of want of ordinary care, at least, as a result of which respondents could be led to believe, and in fact did believe, that Neese was the agent of the appellant, with authority to bind it as principal on the contracts involved. It was in evidence that, for a period of a number of months before and during which the contracts involved were entered into, there was displayed outside of Neese's office in Santa Ana a large sign bearing the words "Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc.," and a similar small sign on the desk in the office but without the abbreviation "Inc." Mr. Baumgarten, district sales manager and the only representative of the corporation who visited Neese's office, denied that he saw the sign outside, or, if he saw it, that it bore the abbreviation "Inc.," although he admitted that, if there was a sign outside, it was the sign that was authorized by the company. Wherever Pacific Ready-Cut Homes were being constructed, it was in evidence that at least one large sign, "Built by Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc.," was placed on the construction site. C. O. Neese used business cards and letterheads with the firm name "Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc.," printed thereon, the cuts and copy for which, according to the testimony of Mr. Baumgarten, were furnished by the advertising department of the appellant. Mr. Baumgarten, himself by letter to Mr. Neese, approved the form of the letterheads. In that letter he stated:

> "I like your letterhead, business card and your envelope very much and I can see that you appreciate the importance of setting the name 'Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc.' in the foreground."

Neese and his assistant also carried signs on their automobile bearing the name of the corporation, which were made at the paint shop of the appellant, although, Mr. Baumgarten contends, without the knowledge or consent of the officers of the company. Checks of the defendants were drawn in favor of Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., and were indorsed by C. O. Neese. The telephone directory listed "Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc.," with the address and telephone number of Neese's office in Santa Ana. Nothing, with the exception of giving some ineffectual warnings or orders to Neese, was done by the appellant during this period to prevent C. O. Neese from representing that he was acting as the agent for and on behalf of Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., as principal, or to prevent others from relying on those representations. Mr. Baumgarten testified:

> "Q. You didn't follow it up to see that he carried out your orders? A. It is very evident that we were negligent in that."

There was additional evidence in some of the cases from which the conclusion could be drawn that the appellant intentionally caused certain of the respondents to deal with C. O. Neese as its authorized agent. As to all of the respondents there is sufficient in the record from which the trial court could justly reach the conclusion that the appellant had knowledge that Neese was holding himself out as its agent and allowed him to do so without attempting to take any effective measures to prevent third persons from relying on his conduct. In this the appellant was guilty of want of ordinary care.

[2] The appellant makes the further and final contention that, even if there be sufficient in the evidence to support a finding that an ostensible agency existed, still each written contract shows on its face that it was signed by C. O. Neese on his own behalf and not as agent; that the evidence is undisputed that the principal was disclosed at the time the contracts were signed; that the rule is that a claimant may hold either the principal or the agent on a contract signed by the agent apparently on his own behalf without disclosing his principal for whose benefit it was, in fact, made, but that such rule may not be invoked to hold the principal when the principal is disclosed, because the contract is evidence of an election to extend credit to the agent only, and extrinsic evidence cannot be introduced to vary its terms or make a different contract for the parties. The appellant cites Ferguson v. McBean, 91 Cal. 63, 27 P. 518, 14 L. R. A. 65, in support of its contention. General language in that case, unnecessary to the decision, however, would seem to support the contention. But in the later case of Geary St. R. R. Co. v. Rolph, 189 Cal. 59, 207 P. 539, the court restricted the application of the Ferguson Case to the particular circumstances there appearing, viz., where it appeared that the plaintiff deliberately chose to take the contract of one party alone instead of a contract of both. No question of principal and agent was involved. The Geary St. R. R. Co. Case states the rule which is now controlling, as follows:

> "We are also of the opinion that the better reason, as well as the weight of authority, is against the proposition that the mere fact that the principal is known to the third person at the time he contracts with the agent prevents such third person from holding the principal liable on the contract made in the name of the agent. * * * That the principal is not liable in such a case if the circumstances, or the terms of the contract, or the two combined, show an intent by the other party to take the agent as his debtor or obligor, in preference to the principal, is, as we have said, well established, and it is manifestly in accordance with reason and justice. In such a case the election takes place at the time of the making of the contract. But where no such election or intent appears, and there is nothing more than a contract made in the name of the agent, knowing him to be such and with knowledge of the identity of his principal, the case is, and should be, governed by the well-known principle that he who acts by another acts by himself, that the contract of the agent, within the scope of his authority, is in legal effect the contract of the principal. * * * An examination of the decisions of the subject shows that the idea that the principal cannot be held liable in cases where the third person, at the time of contracting, knew the principal and his relation to the transaction, arises from the unfounded assumption that, since the decisions holding the principal liable when the contract does not disclose his name or interest, refer to him as the 'undisclosed principal,' the doctrine does not prevail when he is known. But this language is used because the principal was insisting, not that he is not liable when he is known, but that he is not liable when the contract does not on its face purport to bind him, or to be for his behoof or benefit. It is this circumstance that is referred to by the word 'undisclosed.' The principal would have no standing in court to say he is not liable when his authorized agent makes a contract purporting to be for him and the party taking it had full knowledge of the fact that it was for him. The liability when he is undisclosed does not arise from his not being known, although sometimes fraud from that fact is also involved, but from the fact that the contract of his authorized agent, though not in his name, is really for his benefit and in his business. Thus Mr. Mechem says: 'The principal is also liable on all informal contracts entered into on his account and by his authority and not expressly made on the agent's responsibility rather than the principal's. * * * Where a person is known to be acting as the agent of a disclosed principal, the presumption is that the principal and not the agent is to be bound.' (2 Mechem on Agency, sec. 1710; see, also, sec. 1717.)"

The court in that case applied the doctrine and the reasoning to circumstances involving an oral contract, but no good reason appears why it should not apply as well when the contract is written. Since the decision in Geary St. R. R. Co. v. Rolph, supra, the District Court of Appeal has applied the doctrine of that case to a case wherein the parties had entered into a written contract. Marshall v. Bernheim, 64 Cal. App. 283, 221 P. 401.

It is undisputed that each of the respondents, at the time he entered into his contract with C. O. Neese, intended to enter into a contract with Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., as the principal, and believed that he was so doing through C. O. Neese as its agent. We conclude that the doctrine of Geary St. R. R. Co. v. Rolph, is applicable to these cases, and that the findings of the trial court are sustained.

The judgments are affirmed.

FORCE v. HART. (L. A. 9501.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 27, 1928.

1. Pleading 🔑201—Motion to discharge attachment cannot serve as demurrer, if defect in complaint is curable by amendment.

Motion to discharge an attachment cannot serve as demurrer, if defect in complaint can be cured by amendment.

2. Attachment 🔑4—Right to attachment held not defeated because cause of action sounds in damages.

That cause of action sounds in damages would not defeat right to attachment.

3. Attachment 🔑5—Attachment lies on cause of action for damages for breach of contract, where damages are readily ascertainable and basis of computing damages is reasonable and definite.

Attachment will lie on cause of action for damages for breach of contract, where damages are readily ascertainable by reference to contract and basis of computation of damages appears to be reasonable and definite.

4. Attachment 🔑8—Attachment held not defeated merely because damages for breach of contract are unliquidated.

Fact that damages for breach of contract are unliquidated will not alone defeat attachment.

5. Attachment 🔑5—For attachment to lie, contract sued on must furnish standard for clearly ascertaining amount due, and damages must be determinable by proof.

For attachment to lie on cause of action for damages for breach of contract, contract sued on must furnish standard by which amount due may be clearly ascertained, and there must exist basis on which damages can be determined by proof.

6. Attachment 🔑5—Attachment held properly allowed contractor for damages for breach of contract to employ contractor to construct building, where damages could be ascertained.

In contractor's suit for damages for defendant's breach of contract to employ contractor to construct building, where obligation of defendant to pay money in specific amount was fixed by contract, and difference between contract price and cost of building, conceded to be measure of damages, appeared, and damages were direct consequence of repudiation of contract by defendant, and cost of labor and materials for constructing building were capable of definite ascertainment, motion to discharge attachment by plaintiff on ground that sums due were not definite, liquidated, or capable of being made definite, was properly denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William Hazlett, Judge.

Action by James A. Force against Mrs. Lillie Hart, in which plaintiff filed affidavit for an attachment. From an order denying defendant's motion to discharge attachment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. G. Bittleston and R. G. La Noue, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henry Trowbridge, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from an order denying the defendant's motion to discharge an attachment. Three causes of action are set forth in the complaint. The first seeks to recover the sum of $4,110 as the reasonable value of services alleged to have been rendered by the plaintiff in preparing and drafting certain plans and specifications ordered and accepted by the defendant. The second is for $71.50 for sums laid out by the plaintiff for a building permit. The third cause of action alleges that, on or about the 19th day of April, 1926, the parties entered into a contract whereby the defendant agreed to employ the plaintiff to construct a three-story brick apartment house on land belonging to the defendant in accordance with said plans and specifications and to pay to the plaintiff for such construction the sum of $68,500, that the defendant, without right, repudiated said agreement and refused to permit said building to be erected, and that, because of such repudiation and refusal, the plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $5,700.

At the time of the issuance of the summons, the plaintiff filed an affidavit for an attachment pursuant to subdivision 1 of section 537 and section 538 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in which affidavit it was averred, among other things, that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff "upon an implied contract for the direct payment of money" in the sum of $9,881.50, which is the aggregate of the several sums alleged to be due in the three causes of action. The affidavit specifically set forth that in the total amount sued for the sum of $5,700 was "for damages for defendant's breach of contract whereby she agreed to employ plaintiff to construct for her a certain building in accordance with said plans and specifications." The writ was issued and levied. In due time the defendant moved the court to discharge the writ on the grounds (1) that the writ was improperly issued, in that the contract alleged in the third cause of action "is not a contract, express or implied, for the direct payment of money"; and (2) that the writ was improperly issued, in that the indebtedness alleged in the affidavit to be due and owing from the defendant to the plaintiff exceeds the indebtedness set forth in the complaint. The court entered an order denying the motion, but further ordered that:

"It appearing from the affidavit on attachment of the plaintiff, that said attachment was improperly issued for all sums in excess of five thousand ($5,000) dollars all moneys held under attachment by virtue of said writ in excess of $5,000 be released and discharged from the lien of said writ."

The plaintiff has not appealed from said order or any part thereof.

[1] No dispute has arisen as to the propriety of the issuance of an attachment on the first and second causes of action. It is conceded that those counts allege causes of action in harmony with subdivision 1 of section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The position of the defendant as to the third cause of action is stated generally as follows:

> "The contract which forms the basis of the third cause of action fulfills the requirements of the Code in one particular only—it is an express contract for the direct payment of money; but the requirement that the sums due thereon be certain, definite and liquidated, or capable of being made certain and definite, is lacking. The contract set forth therein is in the main executory—performance having progressed merely to the point of securing a permit for the erection of the building."

In this connection it is specifically urged that the contract as pleaded in the third cause of action leaves as matter of conjecture the cost to the plaintiff of the construction of the proposed building. It is not disputed that the measure of damages would be the difference between the cost of the building to the plaintiff and the contract price. It is apparently conceded that, if the pleading had alleged that the cost of the building to the plaintiff would have been $62,800, an affidavit under the attachment law to the effect that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $5,700 on an express contract for the direct payment of money would have been justified. Assuming that a defect in the pleading existed, it is well settled that a motion to discharge an attachment cannot serve as a demurrer, if the defect in the complaint can be cured by amendment. Hathaway v. Davis, 33 Cal. 161; Hammond v. Starr, 79 Cal. 556, 21 P. 971; Kohler v. Agassiz, 99 Cal. 9, 33 P. 741.

[2-5] Notwithstanding the apparent concession of the defendant last above referred to, and assuming that counsel did not intend to go as far in his concession as indicated, still we are of the view that the attachment was properly issued in this case. The mere fact that the third cause of action sounded in damages would not defeat the right to the attachment. It is a well-recognized rule of law in this state that an attachment will lie upon a cause of action for damages for a breach of contract where the damages are readily ascertainable by reference to the contract and the basis of the computation of damages appears to be reasonable and definite. Hale Bros. v. Milliken, 142 Cal. 134, 75 P. 653; De Leonis v. Etchepare, 120 Cal. 407, 419, 52 P. 718; Hamburger v. Halperm, 28 Cal. App. 317, 152 P. 61; 3 Cal. Jur. p. 423, and cases cited. The fact that the damages are unliquidated is not determinative. Willett & Burr v. Alpert, 181 Cal. 652, 657, 185 P. 976; Hale Bros. v. Milliken, supra, at page 140. But the contract sued on must furnish a standard by which the amount due may be clearly ascertained, and there must exist a basis upon which the damages can be determined by proof. Dunn v. Mackey, 80 Cal. 104, 108, 22 P. 64. The language of the court in Greenebaum v. Smith, 51 Cal. App. 692, 694, 197 P. 675, 676, may well be applied to the present case, where it is said:

> "This being an action for damages for the breach of an executory contract defendant contends that it cannot be held to be an action on a contract for the direct payment of money. True, this is not an action for a debt in a technical sense, nor for a certain sum of money specified in the contract, but it is nevertheless an action for the breach of a contract for the direct payment of money, and merely because the amount is uncertain, consisting of damages to be proven at the trial, is no reason why an attachment may not issue where, as here, such damages are easily ascertainable according to fixed standards supplied by the contract or the law acting upon it."

[6] In the present case the obligation of the defendant to pay money in a specific amount is fixed by the contract. The breach is shown by appropriate allegations. The difference between the contract price and the cost of the building to the plaintiff appears, in effect, in the allegations of the complaint and of the affidavit. The damages alleged appear to be the direct and immediate consequences of the repudiation of the contract by the defendant. The cost of labor and materials for the construction of the building in accordance with the plans and specifications and at the time of the breach would appear to be capable of definite ascertainment, and the pecuniary value of the contract right taken from the plaintiff thus be fixed at the trial. Under such circumstances the motion to discharge the writ was properly denied.

The order is affirmed.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO v. TILLMAN ESTATE CO. (S. F. 12617.)★

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 27, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 27, 1928.

1. Eminent domain 🔑200—Owner in condemnation action under statute had burden to show value of property (Code Civ. Proc. § 1244).

In action by city and county under Code Civ. Proc. § 1244, for condemnation of property, owner held to have burden of proof on issue as to value of property.

2. Appeal and error 🔑933(4)—General order granting new trial is not presumed based on insufficiency of evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 657).

Where order granting new trial is general, it will not be presumed on appeal that such order was based on ground of insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict, under Code Civ. Proc. § 657.

3. New trial 🔑35—Granting new trial in condemnation proceeding held not error, where regular order of proof as to value was reversed, notwithstanding instruction that defendant had burden of proof.

In condemnation proceeding, granting of plaintiff's motion for new trial held not error, where court permitted defendant at close of plaintiff's reopened case to introduce evidence of value, plaintiff already having introduced its rebuttal evidence, and by so doing reversed regular order of proof, notwithstanding court's attempt to correct what it deemed to be its error by instruction that burden of proving value was on defendant.

4. Appeal and error 🔑977(3)—Reviewing court should not interfere with granting of new trial, in absence of plain abuse of discretion.

Reviewing court ought not to interfere with order granting new trial, in condemnation proceeding, except in cases showing plain abuse of discretion.

5. Eminent domain 🔑201—Permitting evidence regarding sales of property in vicinity of that condemned and witness' ownership of property there held not error, where prices were not mentioned.

In condemnation proceeding, admission of evidence as to sales of other property in same region and of witness' ownership of property in immediate vicinity held not error, where witness did not testify with reference to prices paid for property nor to price or value set by her upon her own buildings.

RICHARDS, J. [1] This appeal is by the defendant from an order of the trial court granting a new trial in an action instituted by the plaintiff for the condemnation of certain property owned by the defendant and sought to be taken for a public use. The complaint was framed upon the model provided for in section 1244 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which does not require an averment in such complaint as to the value of the property sought to be condemned. The answer of the defendant consisted chiefly in the averment that the property sought to be condemned, and of which the defendant was the owner, was of the value of $75,000. The cause proceeded to trial upon the issues thus presented. The plaintiff tendered proof in support of the averments of its complaint, and, having done so, rested its case without offering any evidence touching the value of the property sought to be condemned. The defendant's counsel thereupon announced that the defendant also rested. A colloquy then occurred between the court and respective counsel, in the presence of the jury, upon the question as to which of the parties the affirmative issue as to the value of the property was imposed upon by law, the defendant insisting that under the Constitution the affirmative of that issue was laid upon the party seeking to condemn, and the plaintiff insisting that under the authorities the affirmative of that issue was to be borne by the owner of the property. The court consistently, repeatedly, and correctly ruled that the affirmative of that issue was upon the defendant, and insisted that the defendant should proceed with the production of its witnesses as to value, calling the attention of counsel for the defendant to cases wherein the rule in California touching that subject had been laid down. That the trial court was correct in so holding is fully supported by these authorities: California Street R. Co. v. Southern Pacific R. Co., 67 Cal. 63, 7 P. 123; Monterey County v. Cushing, 83 Cal. 509, 23 P. 700; San Diego v. Neale, 88 Cal. 50, 25 P. 977, 11 L. R. A. 604; Reed Orchard Co. v. Superior Court, etc., 19 Cal. App. 648, 128 P. 9, 18; Los Angeles High School District v. Schumann, 78 Cal. App. 353, 248 P. 737. While this colloquy was in progress the plaintiff's counsel indicated his willingness, in order to be fair with both parties, to call his witnesses, who were then present in court, in rebuttal upon the issue of value, and the trial court, in permitting plaintiff's counsel so to do, stated to counsel for the defendant:

> "You have offered no evidence, gentlemen. The burden is on you to show the value of this property. The plaintiff rested his case in chief; you offered no evidence. Now, he is calling this witness in rebuttal, unless you call evidence now. Unless you can show me to the contrary, I would hold you have submitted your case."

A further argument ensued in the presence of the jury, at the conclusion of which the trial court, while still declaring that it was "in conscience and duty bound to follow the decisions of the Supreme Court," apparently reserved its ruling as to whether the defendant would be permitted to offer evidence at the close of the plaintiff's reopened case, and in this state of the record the plaintiff proceeded with its proofs as to value, and when its witnesses had been called and testified again rested its case, whereupon the defendant began calling its witnesses as to value, to which plaintiff's counsel objected upon the ground that the defendant, having closed its case without presenting any evidence as to the value of the property sought to be condemned, was not now entitled to proffer such proof. The trial court, however, over this objection on the part of the plaintiff, permitted the defendant to proceed with the production of all of his evidence upon the issue of value; but toward the close of the defendant's evidence upon that subject the court said to the defendant's counsel that it was not satisfied with its ruling, the result of which had been a reversal of the regular order of trial in such cases, and when the testimony was closed, and after argument, proceeded to instruct the jury that—

> "In California the burden of proof as to the value of land sought to be taken by eminent domain is on the defendant."

The jury retired and presently brought in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff upon its right to condemn the property in question, but fixing, awarding, and assessing the value of such property at the sum of $50,000 as compensation to the defendant for the taking thereof for the public use. The judgment of the trial court followed the verdict of the jury, whereupon the plaintiff gave notice of intention to move for a new trial upon all the statutory grounds, upon the hearing and submission of which motion the trial court made a general order "that said motion be granted;" whereupon the defendant took and is now prosecuting this appeal.

[2-4] It is the contention of the appellant that, the order of the trial court being general, it will not be presumed that such order was based upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury. There can be no doubt of the correctness of the appellant's contention in that regard. Code Civ. Proc. § 657.

It is the further contention of the appellant that, no errors of law having been committed by the trial court during the trial of said action, and there being no other ground urged by the plaintiff in support of its motion for a new trial, the granting of the motion by the trial court was an abuse of its discretion and reversible error. In response to this contention the respondent urges two alleged errors of law justifying the trial court in granting the motion for a new trial. The first of these consisted in the alleged error of the trial court in permitting a reversal of the order of proof upon the question of the value of the property sought to be condemned. Respondent insists that the trial court compelled it, over its objection, to proceed with the calling of its witnesses as to value as a part of its main case and after the defendant had proffered no evidence upon that issue. The record does not sustain the respondent in making this particular contention, since it appears that, notwithstanding the repeated rulings of the trial court in its favor, it voluntarily proceeded to call its witnesses as to value. The error of the trial court, if any, did not occur at this stage of the trial, nor was its action in granting the plaintiff's motion for a new trial based upon any such error. The action of the trial court, however, which gave it concern, and which doubtless produced its conclusion that the motion for new trial ought to be granted, was that wherein it permitted the defendant at the close of the plaintiff's reopened case to introduce the entire body of its evidence upon the question of value, and by so doing to reverse the regular order of proof in condemnation cases upon that issue. The trial court, realizing that such had been the effect of its ruling permitting the defendant to thus present its proof, attempted to correct what it deemed to be its error by an instruction to the jury, above quoted, to the effect that the burden of proving the value of the land was on the defendant. It seems probable, however, that the trial court, upon a further consideration of this matter upon the motion for new trial, concluded that its aforesaid instruction had not entirely effaced the effect of its former error.

The question before us in this case is not primarily as to whether appreciable injury resulted from the departure, during the trial, from the well-defined rule governing the order of proof of property values in condemnation cases. Such departure having occurred, and having been realized by the trial court to have been a fundamental error, it was primarily its right and duty, with the parties, the witnesses, and the state of the case before it, to exercise its judgment and discretion in determining whether such error of procedure was sufficiently prejudicial to justify it granting a new trial. With the very large discretion with which trial courts are invested in such cases this court ought not to interfere except in cases showing a plain abuse of such discretion. The question here is rather one of principle applicable generally to condemnation cases, viz. as to whether the rule regulating the order of proof in such cases, which we must assume to be well founded, may be violated by trial courts, and whether such violation shall be sanctioned upon appeal whenever, in the individual case, the appellate tribunal may reach the conclusion, contrary to the view and ruling of the trial court, that no appreciable damage has resulted from the breach of the rule. The question thus resolves itself into one of principle applicable to all condemnation cases and requiring the observance of the aforesaid order of proof, regardless of whether or not injury to either of the parties would result from a failure or refusal on the part of the trial court to enforce the well-founded rule in that regard.

[5] Respondent makes the further contention in support of said order that the trial court was in error in permitting a witness for the defendant, who resided and had a real estate office in the vicinity of the property sought to be condemned, to give testimony in detail with regard to sales of other property in the same region, as well as to the witness' ownership of property in the immediate vicinity of that sought to be condemned. It is to be noted, however, that counsel for the defendant in no instance sought testimony from said witness with reference to prices paid for property, to the sales of which she had testified, nor to the price or value set by her upon her own holdings. The case, therefore, does not come within the decision of this court in the earlier case of C. P. R. Co. v. Pearson, 35 Cal. 262, nor of the later cases cited by the respondent which have followed that decision, but, on the other hand, comes fully within the decision of this court in the case of Estate of Ross, 171 Cal. 66, 151 P. 1138, and which latter decision was closely followed by the examination of counsel and the rulings of the court in the instant case. In holding, therefore, that the trial court committed no error in the foregoing regard, we are doing so for the purpose of its guidance in the admission of evidence as to value upon the retrial of the cause.

The order is affirmed.

We concur: Waste, C. J.; SHENK, J.; LANGDON, J.

SEAWELL, J. I dissent. No reversible error having been committed at the trial, I can see no good reason for a second trial of the cause because of an irregularity committed as to the order of proof on the value of the property sought to be condemned. It could not have prejudiced either side. The court removed every possible ground of injury—if any existed—by its instructions. There can be no room to doubt the correctness of the trial court's view, which was not observed, as to the order of proof in fixing the value of the property sought to be taken or the damages done to property by reason of its taking or severance in condemnation proceedings. This burden is upon the owner of the property sought to be taken. It is his duty to offer the proof upon the close of the plaintiff's case showing the necessity for the taking, etc. It then becomes the right of the plaintiff to rebut the evidence offered by defendant, as the owner of the property, on the issues of value and damage. The rule has never been otherwise. However, in this case no damage appears to have resulted because of a reversal of the order of proof.

ANDREWS et al. v. GLICK et al. (L. A. 8291.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 8, 1928.

1. Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑73—Court could dismiss action because partnership suing had not filed certificate showing names without hearing evidence, where proposition of law was shaped by pleadings (Civ. Code, § 2466).

In suit by partnership, in which defendant averred by way of affirmative defense that partnership had failed to file certificate showing names of partners, as required by Civ. Code, § 2466, court could dismiss action for failure to file such certificate without hearing evidence, since proposition of law was definitely shaped by pleadings, and introduction of evidence would not have assisted in solution of problem.

2. Partnership 🔑64—Partners doing business as Andrews-Cordano Plumbing Company could not maintain suit, where certificate showing partners' names was not filed (Civ. Code, § 2466).

Partners, doing business under name of Andrews-Cordano Plumbing Company, could not maintain action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, where certificate showing names of persons interested as partners was not filed, as required by Civ. Code, § 2466, since such name might designate either a corporation or a partnership, the names of the stockholders or members of which need not necessarily appear in its title, and therefore certificate should have been filed.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry A. Hollzer, Judge.

Action to foreclose a mechanic's lien by Harry W. Andrews and another, doing business under the firm name and style of the Andrews-Cordano Plumbing Company, against Fannie Glick and others. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 268 P. 481.

Irvin C. Taplin, Louis P. Russill, and A. R. Bennison, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Overton, Lyman & Plumb, and Irving H. Prince, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J. This action to foreclose a mechanics' lien terminated in the court below with the entry of a judgment of dismissal, from which the plaintiffs have appealed.

Defendant Glick in her answer admits those allegations of the complaint wherein it is set forth that the plaintiffs Harry W. Andrews and Frank Cordano have been transacting business as copartners under the name of "Andrews-Cordano Plumbing Company." However, by way of affirmative defense it is averred that said partnership had failed to file and publish the certificate required by section 2466 of the Civil Code. The interposition of this defense, coupled with a motion to dismiss for the same reason, resulted in the entry of the judgment appealed from.

[1] Plaintiffs' contention that the trial court could not, in advance of the introduction of evidence, pass upon the question of law thus presented, is wholly without merit. The introduction of evidence would not, in any manner, assist in the solution of the problem, for the proposition of law was definitely shaped by the pleadings. The object of section 2466, supra, is that public notice shall be given and a public record made of the individual members of partnerships with such definiteness and particularity that those dealing with them may at all times know who are the individuals with whom they are dealing, or to whom they are giving credit or becoming bound. Meads, etc., Co. v. Lasar, 92 Cal. 221, 226, 28 P. 935.

[2] It remains but to determine whether, within the meaning of that section, the name "Andrews-Cordano Plumbing Company" is a "fictitious name, or a designation not showing the names of the persons interested as partners." The name is not, of course, fictitious. Spreckels v. Grace Darling Hospital Ass'n, 28 Cal. App. 646, 648, 153 P. 718. It has, upon numerous occasions, been held that a name, such as "Pendleton & Williams," is neither fictitious nor one failing to designate the partners. Pendleton v. Cline, 85 Cal. 142, 144, 24 P. 659; Carlock v. Cagnacci, 88 Cal. 600, 601, 26 P. 597; McLean v. Crow, 88 Cal. 644, 647, 26 P. 596; Lamberson v. Bashore, 167 Cal. 387, 391, 139 P. 817. In other words, it is definitely settled in this state that the usual form of partnership name, consisting merely of the surnames of the partners, joined by "&" or "and," is not an assumed or fictitious name, or a designation not showing the names of the persons interested as partners. However, the name "Abrams Bros." has been held not to definitely designate the persons interested as partners. North v. Moore, 135 Cal. 621, 623, 67 P. 1037, 1038. It is there declared: "'Abrams Bros.' cannot be said to be a designation 'showing the names of the persons interested as partners.' The firm name might apply equally to a partnership composed of two or more, and might embrace all or only some of the brothers of the name of Abrams."

In our opinion, this quotation is peculiarly pertinent to the present case, for, while it so happens that the name "Andrews-Cordano Plumbing Company" designates the names of all the persons interested as partners, it might equally as well apply to a partnership composed of more than two persons. In other words, this name, in and of itself, does not necessarily inform third persons desirous of transacting business with the partnership of the exact membership thereof. This is borne out by the case of Meads, etc., Co. v. Lasar, supra, wherein it appeared that the name "Meads, Seaman & Co.," designated only two of the three members of the firm. This court, in Schwarz & Gottlieb v. Marcuse, 175 Cal. 401, 403, 165 P. 1016, disapproved the holding in Patterson v. Byers, 17 Okl. 633, 89 P. 1114, 10 Ann. Cas. 810, wherein it was declared that the name "Patterson Furniture Company" definitely disclosed the members of the partnership to be named "Patterson." In criticizing the conclusion there announced, this court stated that "evidently the learned justice who wrote that opinion overlooked the fact that commonly the title 'Patterson Furniture Company' might indicate a corporation or a copartnership in which the stockholders or members might or might not be Pattersons." So it is in the instant case. The name "Andrews-Cordano Plumbing Company" might designate either a corporation or a partnership, the names of the stockholders or members of which need not necessarily appear in its title.

We conclude, therefore, that the provisions of section 2466, supra, should have been complied with by the plaintiff partnership, and its failure in this regard is fatal to the maintenance of this suit.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 6162.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 27, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 26, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 24, 1929.

1. Master and servant ⚿417(7)—Evidence, to raise conflict precluding review of Industrial Accident Commission's finding, must present reasonable ground for difference of opinion.

Although an appellate court will not reverse a finding of the Industrial Accident Commission if there is substantial conflict in evidence, evidence, in order to raise conflict, must be such as to present fair and reasonable ground for difference of opinion.

2. Master and servant ⚿405(4)—Commission's finding that second injury was different from first injury, instead of recurrence of previous injury, held not supported by evidence.

Industrial Accident Commission's finding that second injury sustained by plasterer consisting of strain of left sacroiliac joint was different from previous injury consisting of severe strain of left lumbar muscles and sacroiliac joint of back, instead of a recurrence of previous injury, held not supported by evidence.

3. Master and servant ⚿417(7)—Commission's finding that subsequent accident is independent cause of injury cannot be sustained, where there is no reasonable theory evidenced by record on which it may be sustained.

Industrial Accident Commission's finding that subsequent accident should be regarded as independent, intervening cause of injury cannot be sustained by courts, where there is no reasonable theory evidenced by record on which it may be sustained.

4. Master and servant ⚿391—Where employé's second injury was recurrence of previous injury, award should have been against original insurance carrier.

Where employé's second injury was recurrence of previous injury and disability was natural and proximate cause of that injury, award should have been against original insurance carrier.

Original proceeding by writ of review by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company to annul an award of compensation of the Industrial Accident Commission to Umberto Menegon. Award annulled.

Edward C. Mills and Harold J. Hunter, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for defendants.

THOMPSON, J. This is an original proceeding by which it is sought through the writ of review to annul an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. On June 9, 1926, Umberto Menegon, while employed as a plasterer by Benni Damico at San Francisco, suffered an injury in the course of his employment, consisting of a broken hand, a severe strain of the left lumbar muscles and sacroiliac joint. This accident occurred as he attempted to lift a bucket of mortar while on a roof when he slipped and fell. The insurance carrier was the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation. On February 17, 1927, the Commission made its findings and award wherein it found that Menegon had "sustained a severe strain of the left lumbar muscles," and awarded him for total disability from June 9, 1926, to February 8, 1927, the sum of $705.24. Between four and seven days previous to May 24, 1927, Menegon started to work as a plasterer for P. A. Belanger, and on that day, while attempting to lift a bucket of cement handed to him by another employé, he felt a severe pain and "click" in his back which again incapacitated him from working. The petitioner here was the insurance carrier, and in a second proceeding in which the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation was joined, the Commission on April 27, 1928, found that the applicant had suffered an injury on June 9, 1926, "consisting of a severe strain of the left lumbar muscles and sacroiliac joint of his back." They also found that on May 24, 1927, the applicant sustained injury occurring in the course of his employment, "consisting of a strain of the left sacroiliac joint," and that "said second injury caused temporary total disability continuing from May 24, 1927, indefinitely," entitling applicant to $20.83 per week. Award was made against the petitioner here for this sum, and jurisdiction was reserved for the purpose of fixing permanent disability, if any, and also to fix amount of expenses for medical treatment. The Ocean Accident & Guarantee Company was in effect discharged from further liability. The petitioner claims that the injury suffered by the applicant on May 24, 1927, was a recurrence of the injury of June 9, 1926, and that all of the testimony establishes that the disability was the direct and proximate result of the injury sustained on the first date. It also asserts that if there be evidence to sustain the finding of a second injury the Commission was required under the law to apportion the liability between the insurance carrier at the time of the original injury and the carrier at the time of the aggravation. The respondent asserts that there is evidence sufficient to support the findings, and that there is no power resident in it to prorate disability between two separate injuries or to prorate in the case of aggravation of disability due to a prior injury as distinguished from aggravation of a pre-existing disease.

We are thus brought to the point where we must set down more of the testimony presented to the Commission. The applicant testified that his back "was bothering me awful bad, and I took a chance to start to work. Worked seven days and had the same sickness as before," and again, that he had suffered "severe pain ever since from that injury," referring to the first one. He also said, in response to a query of whether he was able to work the few days before the second injury, "I ain't say I am able to do the work because the pain continue with me," and again replying to a similar query:

> "I had pain right along, 2 or 3 days a week, the last week not very much, but I had pain right along."

There was testimony that between the injuries he was wearing a very heavy sacroiliac belt for the support of his back, and when asked if he was doing his regular work as a plasterer for the four days prior to the injury of May 24, he said, "Yes, I was doing my regular work, I wear the belt awful tight." Dr. Pierce, who had seen the applicant 30 or 40 times, states that in his opinion the patient had never recovered from the first injury, and that his second disability was an outgrowth of the injury suffered on June 9, 1926, amplifying with the statement:

> "If I had never seen that record, I would still make my diagnosis of sacro-iliac strain, but there is absolutely no question, as it is an unbroken chain, from his old injury to the present moment."

This witness gave his opinion to the effect that, unless there is a recovery from an injury of the character suffered by the applicant within six months, there will be no recovery without an operation. No operation was performed upon the applicant. Dr. Michael Creamer, assistant medical director of the Commission, reviewed the record, and in his report states:

> "The fact that he (the applicant) has worn a belt prescribed by Dr. McChesney of San Francisco, indicates to this department, that if he had entirely recovered, he was as yet not aware of it, since normal men do not wear a sacro-iliac support. * * * To sum up, then, this applicant is at the present time disabled as the result of an accidental injury, said injury being exactly similar to a previous injury 11 months preceding, and in our opinion, he has not completely recovered from the first one."

This same doctor stated 27 days later as follows:

> "We are compelled to state positively that it is our opinion that there is a physical relation between the occurrence of June 9, 1926, and May 24, 1927, and a review of the history impresses us that this condition is a recurrence of the earlier injury."

Mr. Rodeny F. Atsatt, to whom the question was referred as a medical referee, includes in his report two very significant statements. The first, with regard to disability, is:

> "Total disability with reference to work in which patient was engaged when injured, as he would be subjected to frequently recurring attacks."

And the second reads:

> "The injury on May 24, 1927, was a recurrence of the more serious of the original injuries, namely, the sacro-iliac sprain."

So far the evidence points all in one direction. We now come to the report which the respondent claims supports its finding. Dr. Thomas M. Foley in his report first says:

> "Mr. Menegon states that on June 9, 1926, he received an injury to his back, and that he had continuous pain and tenderness in his low back ever since that time." (Italics ours.)

—and then renders his opinion, a part of which is as follows:

> "This is undoubtedly a strain of the sacro-iliac joint on the left side. It is obviously a different injury from the one that he had in June, 1926, and which has been described in the letter of Dr. Campiche, inasmuch as he had been fairly comfortable with pain only at times until the moment of this slip in the sacro-iliac joint." (Italics ours.)

We call attention to the fact that the promise for the opinion is that the applicant had been fairly comfortable, with pain only at times, while in his statement of the history he records the complaint of Menegon that he had continuous pain and tenderness from the time of the first injury. The report of Dr. Campiche referred to was made on January 6, 1927, and he diagnosed the trouble at that time as a "tear of the lumbar muscles." The report also contains this statement:

> "At times the man says that pressure does not hurt him at all but as soon as he attempts to bend or to lift something the pain is such that he has to give up his work after 10 or 15 minutes. When he lies flat on his back the flection of the left hip also produces some pain in the lumbar region."

It will be observed that this report was seven months, less three days, after the first injury, and that the applicant had not recovered, but was still suffering. It is also fair to assume that when Dr. Foley says, referring to the first injury, "which has been described in the letter of Dr. Campiche," he had in mind the diagnosis thereof as a "tear of the lumbar muscles" to further justify his opinion that the second injury was obviously different. This first diagnosis, as well as the finding of the Commission in the first hearing, is patently contrary to fact and contrary to the fact found by the Commission in the second hearing.

[1-3] Our thought upon this state of the record may well be expressed in the words of the court in Re Coburn, 11 Cal. App. 604, 105 P. 924, as follows:

> "There is nothing to show that appellant is incapable of taking care of himself. There is but the mere opinion of a few witnesses as to appellant being incompetent to take care of his property, and these opinions are worthless because not based upon any facts or reasons."

In the same opinion it is also recorded:

> "We are fully aware that an appellate court will not reverse a finding if there is a substantial conflict in the evidence; but the evidence, in order to raise a conflict, must be such as to present a fair and reasonable ground for a difference of opinion. The finding or verdict must have meritorious support in the evidence. A few general statements without substantial reasons is not sufficient to raise a conflict. (Smith v. Belshaw, 89 Cal. 427, 26 Pac. 834; Field v. Shorb, 99 Cal. 662, 34 Pac. 504.)"

A reading of that case will demonstrate that there was much more reason to say that the evidence was sufficient than there is in the present instance. The rule with respect to what does not constitute conflict has been phrased in different ways. In Houghton v. Loma Prieta Lumber Co., 152 Cal. 574, 93 P. 377, it is put in these words:

> "A finding against the great weight and preponderance of the evidence can be maintained on the doctrine of 'conflict' only where the alleged conflict rests upon evidence, either direct or circumstantial, which so materially contradicts the testimony on the other side, or is so radically inconsistent with it, as to leave room in a fair and reasonable mind to find the fact either way."

In White v. Greenwood, 52 Cal. App. 737, 199 P. 1095, it was stated this way:

> "While a finding will not be disturbed on appeal if there is a substantial conflict in the evidence from which it springs, 'the evidence, in order to raise a conflict, must be such as to present a fair and reasonable ground for a difference of opinion.'"

See, also, Felsenthal v. Warring, 40 Cal. App. 119, 180 P. 67.

[4] We have no hesitancy in saying that the opinion here is so unsatisfactory in itself, and so at variance with the whole current of the testimony, as to raise no conflict, and therefore entirely insufficient to give the respondent power to render the finding complained of. We are not unaware of the rule announced in Head Drilling Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 177 Cal. 194, 170 P. 157, that "Whether the subsequent incident or accident is such, or should be regarded as an independent, intervening cause is a question of fact for the commission, to be decided in view of all the circumstances, and its conclusion must be sustained by the courts whenever there is any reasonable theory evidenced by the record on which the conclusion can be upheld," but we are of the opinion that there is no reasonable theory evidenced by the record in this case upon which it may be sustained. With the single exception of this unsatisfactory expression of opinion the entire testimony establishes the fact that the incident of May 24, 1927, was a recurrence of the injury of June 9, 1926, and that the disability was the natural and proximate result of that injury, bringing it within the case of Head Drilling Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra, under which the award should have been against the original insurance carrier.

In view of the conclusion to which we have come, it is unnecessary to discuss the question made concerning the power of the Commission to apportion the liability between the two carriers.

Award annulled.

PONTECORVO v. CLARK. (Civ. 3582.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 26, 1928.

1. Theaters and shows 🔑6—Where defective condition of roller coaster was sole negligence relied on for death of passenger, res ipsa loquitur doctrine applied.

Where sole negligence relied on in complaint in action for death of 13 year old girl, resulting from fall from roller coaster train, was that roller coaster was defectively constructed, without alleging particular respects in which contrivance was defectively constructed, and that such particular defectiveness was proximate cause of accident, doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applied.

2. Theaters and shows 🔑6—Whether defective condition of roller coaster or passenger's contributory negligence was proximate cause of death of 13 year old passenger falling from coaster held for jury.

In action for death of 13 year old girl resulting from fall from roller coaster train, whether death proximately resulted from defendant's negligence, due to defective condition of roller coaster, or to decedent's contributory negligence in failing to exercise care which circumstances required, held, under the evidence, for jury to determine.

3. Negligence 🔑85(2)—Child must exercise same degree of care ordinarily exercised by children of his age.

Though the same act which would be negligence in an adult may not be such if done by a child, the child is nevertheless required to exercise the same degree of care that would be expected of children of his age, or which children of his age ordinarily exercise.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1001(1)—Jury's verdict, sustained by sufficient evidence, is binding on appellate court.

Verdict of jury, sustained by evidence, is binding on District Court of Appeal.

5. Theaters and shows 🔑6—Evidence held not to show negligence of roller coaster owner as matter of law, in failing to provide attendants or safety appliances to prevent passengers falling out (Civ. Code, §§ 2100, 2101).

In action for death of 13 year old girl, resulting from fall from roller coaster train, evidence held not to show defendant's negligence as matter of law in failing to provide cars with straps or other safety appliances to hold passengers to their seats while going over dips or bumps, or to furnish attendants to ride in cars and protect passengers from being thrown out, under Civ. Code, §§ 2100, 2101, requiring common carriers to use utmost care and diligence to provide safe vehicles, even if such statutes were applicable.

6. Evidence 🔑14—It is common knowledge that it is not customary or necessary to assign attendants to cars of roller coaster to prevent passengers from falling out.

It is common knowledge, of which courts will take notice, that in the operation of roller coasters it is not the custom or necessary to assign attendants to the cars for the purpose of preventing passengers from falling from cars while train is in motion.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1057(2)—Exclusion of photographs showing that roller coaster was not completed at time of accident held not prejudicial to plaintiff, where not denied by defendant.

In action for death of 13 year old girl, resulting from fall out of roller coaster train, exclusion of photographs offered by plaintiff to show that at time of accident roller coaster was not completed, and was therefore unsafe for use, held not prejudicial to plaintiff, where plaintiff's testimony to same effect was in effect admitted.

8. Trial 🔑63(2)—Generally rebuttal testimony is receivable only where new matters have been developed by evidence of adverse party, if case in chief has been concluded, but trial court has discretion to permit such testimony.

General rule is that rebuttal or surrebuttal testimony, strictly speaking, is receivable only where new matters have been developed by the evidence of one of the parties after his case in chief has been made and concluded, though it is within trial court's discretion to allow a party on rebuttal or surrebuttal to introduce evidence with respect to relevant and material matters as to which his witnesses have testified in chief.

9. Trial 🔑62(3)—Exclusion of testimony as to number of times roller coaster train had made circuit at time of accident, as not being proper rebuttal, testimony held not abuse of discretion.

In action for death of 13 year old girl, resulting from fall from roller coaster train, refusal to permit plaintiff's testimony in rebuttal as to how many times train had made circuit of tramway at time of accident, on ground that it was not proper rebuttal testimony, because question had been fully gone into by plaintiff in his original case, held not abuse of discretion.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1048(6)—Error in excluding cross-examination of builder of roller coaster as to whether major repairs were necessary after accident held not prejudicial to plaintiff, in view of other testimony.

In action for death of 13 year old girl, resulting from fall from roller coaster train, refusal to permit cross-examination of witness who constructed roller coaster for defendant as to whether he made any major repairs after accident, though error, held not prejudicial, where witness had several times stated on direct and cross-examination that no major repairs were necessary, and that device was complete, except in minor particulars not affecting its safety of operation.

11. Carriers 🔑321(3)—Instruction that common carrier must exercise "highest" degree of care for safety of passengers held not erroneous, under statute requiring carriers to use "utmost" care (Civ. Code, § 2100).

Instruction that it was incumbent on common carrier to exercise the highest degree of care and caution for safety of passengers held not erroneous, because of use of words "highest degree," because Civ. Code, § 2100, requires carrier to use "utmost care"; adjective "utmost" meaning the greatest or highest degree, quantity, or number, and the noun being the most that can be, the greatest power, degree, or effort.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Utmost Care; Second and Third Series, Highest Degree of Care.]

12. Trial 🔑296(3)—Instruction that roller coaster operator was not insurer of passengers' safety held not erroneous, in view of other instructions (Civ. Code, § 2100).

Instruction that defendant was not the insurer of the safety of passenger on its roller coaster train when accident occurred, when read with other instruction requiring defendant to use highest degree of care to protect safety of its passengers, held not erroneous, even if Civ. Code, § 2100, relating to care required of common carriers, applied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Hector Pontecorvo against John N. Clark. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Torchia & De Lorenza, and Walter H. Sprague, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joe Crider, Jr., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for the death of his minor daughter, Clelia Pontecorvo, alleged to have been directly caused by the negligence of the defendant. The issues of fact were tried by a jury, and a verdict arrived at and returned in favor of the defendant. Judgment was entered accordingly. A motion for a new trial was made by the plaintiff and denied. This appeal is by the plaintiff from the judgment.

The death of the minor child named in the complaint occurred in Lincoln Park, Los Angeles, on the 20th day of November, 1924, between the hours of 8 and 9 o'clock p. m. The defendant, John N. Clark, was, on said day, and at the place mentioned, the owner of and operating, for amusement purposes, a mechanical contrivance or device commonly known as a "Scenic Roller Coaster Railway." This device is what may briefly be described as a tramroad, with toboggan chutes, on and over which a small train of cars is, with considerable velocity, propelled. The train, leaving a level track, ascends rapidly to the apex of what is variously described by the witnesses as "the hill," "the crown," and "the hump" (to be referred to hereinafter as the "peak"), which is at an elevation of some 15 or 20, or perhaps more, feet from the point of beginning. Reaching the top of the first peak, the train then proceeds with great swiftness, as by gravity, down a steep incline to a level surface of a few feet in length, and again ascends a peak greater in elevation than the first, and, as at the first peak, and with like velocity, rounds what was described by the witnesses as a "sharp curve" on a downward slope, or with an acute "dip," and thence upwards to a third peak, and so proceeds downward and upwards, if there be other peaks, until its return to the point from which it started.

The "roller coaster," as the contrivance is commonly called, had been in process of construction for a period embracing several months preceding and down to the 20th of November, 1924, at which time it was by the defendant and his employees, who constructed it, deemed completed and ready for use or operation for business, and on that date it was for the first time opened to and offered for use by the public. The train running over the tramway consisted of three cars, in each of which six passengers could ride with convenience and comfort. On the day and at the time thereof above mentioned, the deceased, then a few months past the age of 13 years, and a girl companion named Genevieve Splitlog, who was a few months the junior of the former, entered the front car and took the front seat in that car for a trip around the tramway, each having previously purchased and received from the defendant, or one of his employees, a ticket entitling her to ride thereon. The other seats of the same car were occupied, and the other cars contained a number of passengers. As the car in which the deceased was riding reached the top of the second peak and was making the curve at that point, the deceased fell or was thrown to the ground and almost instantly killed.

The complaint alleges:

> "That at the time aforesaid the machinery, tracks, and/or cars of the defendants' Scenic Railway were negligently and imperfectly constructed, inadequate, defective and unsafe. That said imperfection, defectiveness, inadequacy and unsafeness could have been by said defendants discovered and known by the use and exercise by them of ordinary care and diligence, and were at the time aforesaid known to said defendants, but the same were unknown to the said deceased. That at the time aforesaid, and while the deceased herein was a passenger on the Scenic Roller Coaster Railway car, and by reason of the negligent operation of the same, and the imperfection, defectiveness, inadequacy and unsafeness of the defendants' machinery, cars and/or Scenic Railway, and further by reason of the fault, carelessness and negligence of the defendants in the operation and construction thereof, the deceased, Clelia Pontecorvo, was precipitated, cast, and thrown from the car and was bruised, mashed, crushed and killed, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of fifty thousand dollars ($50,000), no part of which has been paid, and the whole thereof is unpaid."

The answer consists of specific denials of the material averments of the complaint, and then alleges that the deceased was herself guilty of negligence which proximately caused or contributed to her injuries and consequent death.

The plaintiff on this appeal contends: (1) That the evidence does not support the verdict; (2) that error was committed by the trial court in rulings allowing and disallowing certain evidence; (3) that error was likewise committed in the giving and in refusing to give certain instructions. These points will be considered in the order in which they are thus set forth.

[1] It will be observed from the complaint that the negligence solely relied upon by the plaintiff is the alleged faulty or defective construction of the roller coaster. It is true that it is also alleged that the device was negligently operated, but there is no evidence that it was negligently operated, except in so far as it might be said that it was so operated because of the alleged defective construction thereof. In other words, there is no evidence showing that the operation of the contrivance was not in the usual or regular manner of operating such a mechanical device, where such device is not so defectively constructed as to subject, solely by reason thereof, persons riding in its cars to greater risk or peril than is usual to or inherent in such mechanical contraptions.

The court instructed the jury that the rule of res ipsa loquitur applied to the case, and that, therefore, the plaintiff having made a prima facie case by proof of the happening of the accident in or by which the deceased was hurt, and as a consequence killed, the burden was thereupon cast upon the defendant to show that it was not his negligence which was the proximate cause of the accident, or, more accurately expressing the proposition, to introduce evidence sufficient to overthrow the presumption that it was his negligence which was the direct cause of the accident and its deplorable consequences.

The complaint does not explain specifically how or in what particular manner the accident happened. The use of a number of adjectives therein as descriptive of the cause of the accident amounts to no more than a general allegation of negligence. Reduced to their real purport, the allegations as to the cause of the accident are merely tantamount (and nothing more) to the general statement that the device was defectively constructed, and therefore unsafe for use. To take this case out of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, the particular respects in which the contrivance was defectively constructed, and for that reason in no condition to be used with safety, and that such particular defectiveness was the proximate cause of the accident, should have been explained and alleged in the complaint or shown by the plaintiff's evidence. Connor v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Ry. Co., 189 Cal. 1, 5, 207 P. 378 (26 A. L. R. 1462); Marovich v. Cent. Calif. Trac. Co., 191 Cal. 295, 305, 216 P. 595. And the evidence presented by the plaintiff is not by any means satisfactory as to the specific cause which directly caused the mishap.

[2] It is not necessary to present herein the testimony of all the witnesses introduced by the plaintiff to support the presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant. There were nine of such witnesses, of whom some were riding on the train when the accident happened, and others witnessing it from a hill on which they were then standing and watching the train as it was making its circuit; the hill being approximately 150 feet from where the coaster was maintained. The testimony of all these latter witnesses was substantially the same, and in a more or less degree corroborated the testimony of those who were riding on the train at the time the deceased fell or was hurled therefrom to the ground. It is, hence, sufficient to reproduce herein, in an abbreviated form, the testimony of two of the witnesses riding on the train when the accident occurred as probably involving a more accurate description of the action of the train as it moved over the tracks than would the testimony of those witnesses not on the train.

The witness William Wheeler, a young man, testified that he was a passenger on the coaster at the time of the accident, occupying, with a "boy friend," the second seat in the front car and sitting immediately back of the deceased and Miss Splitlog. He stated that, as the passengers were entering the cars, an attendant cautioned them to "hold on tight and stay in their seats," referring to the time that the coaster was in operation. He described the movement of the train, particularly the action of the car in which he, his companion, the deceased, and Miss Splitlog were riding, as follows:

> "It [the train] started up the incline, got up to the top, around the turn. We went down the first dip. We come to the top of the second dip [or peak], and the incline was steep there and there was a sharp turn. * * * When it [the train] comes up it throws you back and then there is a sharp turn and then you go right over that. * * * Everybody in the car, when they got to the top of the dip (referring to the second peak, where the deceased was thrown or fell from the car) went forward. * * * Right at the top [of the second peak] it seems like when the first car gets started down, the third car is not quite up the incline yet. The third car seems to hold the first car back."

He stated that there was "a very bad jerk" of the train as it reached and was rounding the curve at the second peak, and that it was there that the child was thrown or fell from the car. He further testified that the deceased was sitting when precipitated from the car. At one time he stated that he could not and did not see her hands, or where she had them, and at another declared that she was holding onto the iron bar or rail maintained immediately in front of both seats in each of the cars for the purpose of enabling the passengers to hold themselves in their seats against the peril necessarily incident to the swaying and jerking movement of the train as it rounded the curves at the top of the peaks or higher points of the tramroad. He testified that the deceased was thrown head foremost from the car to the ground.

Genevieve Splitlog, the companion of the deceased on the occasion in question, and approximately of the same age of the latter, testified that she and the deceased had ridden in the coaster on the evening of November 20th, on a trip immediately preceding the trip on which the deceased was thrown or fell from the car; that on the first trip they occupied the last of the three cars constituting the train; that on the first trip she did not notice the sharp or severe jerking movement of the car in which they were riding, at the curve rounding upward and downward the second peak or hill, that she experienced or noted in the action of the car on their second trip; that the jerking and swaying movement of the car on the second trip caused her (witness) to be raised from her feet about 7 or 8 inches, and that it was then that the deceased "fell out." She testified that "we were barely able to get our hands around" the iron rail in front of them; that they were compelled to "bend over to hold onto the rail," and that their feet "could hardly touch the bottom of the floor"; that "we just put the balls of our feet on the floor, but our heels could not touch." Referring to the height of the iron railing in front of the seats of the cars, she stated that it would, when she was standing, reach as far as her hips; that, as she and the deceased were about the same height, the railing would probably reach no farther than the latter's hips. The witness stated that at the time she was thrown from the car the deceased was not standing, and that she was holding to the iron bar. She further testified that she had on previous occasions ridden on roller coasters, between which and the one concerned herein she had noticed no difference in their general construction and mechanism, or in the manner of their operation; that, so far as she knew, no part of the machinery became impaired on the trip, and that the iron rail and the seats of the car were not injured or damaged. She stated that there was a sign maintained at and near the coaster which read, "Do not stand up," and that before or as they were getting on the train "the gentleman who started the car told" the witness and the deceased "to hang on tight and keep in your seats." she testified, as did all the witnesses, that the three cars constituting the train contained passengers on the trip on which the deceased was thrown to the ground, and that all the passengers other than the deceased remained in their seats and were safely returned to the point from which the train started.

To the above it should be added that all the plaintiff's witnesses, both those riding on the train and those watching it from outside, stated that, at the second hill, where the deceased left the car, the curve or angle was sharper or more acute than were the curves or angles at any other of the higher points on the track, and that at that curve the jerking or lurching movement of the train was more positive and noticeable than at any of the other curves.

The testimony introduced by the defendant is, in substance, well and accurately set forth in the brief of the defendant, and as thus presented it may here be given:

"A. F. Pfahler, a witness called on behalf of defendant, testified that he was a police officer on the 20th day of November, 1924, the date of the accident, and that he made an investigation the morning following the accident, to wit, on the 21st; that he investigated the track; that he climbed up over all the structure on the track and examined it; that he had pointed out to him the point where the accident happened, and that he went up there; that he did not find anything broken; that he examined the track, but did not find any portion of it broken; that he examined the track from the bottom of the second dip clear up to the top, and that he did not find any irregularity in the track; and that he made a regular report to the police department. On cross-examination he stated to Mr. Sprague that he rode up over the track the day he made his investigation.

"E. W. Thomason, a witness called on behalf of defendant, testified that he was a police officer on the Los Angeles police force on the date of the accident; that he made an investigation the day following the accident. 'The Court: * * * What examination did you make? A. We went all over the structure. The Court: What examination did you make at or near this point that this accident is said to have occurred? What did you do? A. We climbed over the structure and looked it over from top to bottom. By Mr. Crider: Did you look over the track? A. Yes, sir. Q. In looking over the track, did you find any broken place? A. No, sir. Q. Did you find any plates broken at all? A. No, sir. The Court: Did you find any buckled plates? A. No, sir. Q. By Mr. Crider: In looking over that No. 2 plate, did you find any angle in that any place on it? A. I don't know just what is meant by that angle. The Court: Is there a curve there? A. There is a curve, yes. The Court: Without reference to the degree of the curve, was it just one big curve? A. It just seemed to be one big curve. Q. Did you examine the car? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did you examine about it? A. All of it, wheels, bottom, top. Q. Did you find anything broken on it? A. No, sir. Q. Did you examine all wheels? A. Yes, sir.' On redirect examination this witness testified that they walked all over the track, that they looked underneath all the way around, and that they looked at the bottom as well as the top, to see if there were any breaks anywhere. 'The Court: But you didn't look at the structure, the underpinning? A. Yes; to see if the braces were all in shape, nothing broken. Q. By Mr. Sprague: What day was that? A. The day after the accident happened.'

"W. S. Hudson, a witness called on behalf of defendant, testified that he was a police officer at the date of the accident, employed by the city of Los Angeles; that he made an investigation of this accident and that he arrived at the scene of the accident the same evening and shortly thereafter; that he made an investigation of the structure and track at the point where the accident occurred; that he went all over the top and looked for any defect in workmanship, but that he did not find any, there being no breaks or bent plates. 'Q. Did you see what was on that dip? Did you find any angle there of any kind? Just describe how that was. A. Well, it was an arch. The Court: Was it a regular curve? A. It was a regular curve; yes, sir—an arch. The Court: Was there any irregularity in the curve? A. No, sir. Q. By Mr. Crider: Did you go clear up on top? A. I did the next day. Q. Did you find anything wrong? A. No, sir. Q. Did you look at the track? A. Yes, sir. Q. All along? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you look at the car wheels? A. I did. Q. Did you find any break or defect there? A. No, sir.'

"Fred Morf, witness called on behalf of defendant, testified that he was employed by the defendant Clark at the time of the accident; that on the day of the accident, and prior thereto, he rode on the train at least 15 or 20 times; that he did not notice anything wrong in the way the car rode; that he did not notice anything different with reference to place No. 2, there being nothing different there than at the other places he went over. This witness further testified that the track and course were tested in the morning; that they were first tested by loading the cars with weights made of iron which were sent around to see if the structure were safe in every way; that they sent the train loaded with weights around four or five times; that he had helped in the construction of other roller coasters, having worked on about 15 different ones; that the roller coaster was finished in the morning, and that they did their testing in the morning and afternoon.

"Allie F. Groff, a witness called on behalf of defendant, testified that she rode on the coaster the day that the accident happened in the afternoon, probably 10 or 12 times; that she did not notice anything unusual in the way of motion, or of that kind in the car; that she had ridden on coasters before, and did not notice any irregularities of any kind as she rode around; that she personally knew that they had sent cars loaded with weights over the track in the morning.

"Antone Balagno, a witness called on behalf of the defendant, testified that he was a carpenter employed in the construction of the railway; that he was there the day the accident happened; that he rode over the coaster earlier in the day about 12 times; that he did not notice anything unusual in the way it ran; that it did not run any different at No. 2 place than it did at any other elevation; that, on the earlier trips he made in the afternoon, a full train of about 18 made the trip.

"John N. Clark, defendant, testified in his own behalf that the cars used had been used before and thoroughly tested out, and also had been used on a different scenic railway, located at Venice, Cal.; that the cars were thoroughly inspected before they were put on the track for use, having been thoroughly gone over and oiled; that before the railway was opened for use it was absolutely finished except to put a small handrail on one side, that is, along the side of the walk where the track walker could walk to inspect the track; that he had ridden on the coaster himself before it was open to the public; that after the track was open to the public, and before the train was run on which plaintiff's daughter was riding, approximately 350 had been taken over the dip. Clark stated that there was not 'anything unusual about the way it [the coaster] rode when he rode on it'; that there was 'not any difference at hump No. 2 than at any of the others.'

"Charles Paige, a witness called in behalf of the defendant, testified that he was employed in the capacity of a builder of this particular coaster, that the coaster was entirely completed before it was put into use, except the placing of some lights and the handrail hereinbefore referred to. 'Q. By Mr. Sprague: You mean to say that when this ride was finished that night that nothing else was to be done? A. I said there were a few minor details. Q. What were those few minor details? A. The lamps were only hooked up temporarily; the handrail —a few pieces of handrail along, and the emergency brake.'"

But little reflection, upon reading the testimony given by defendant's witnesses, and of which the foregoing embraces a synoptical statement, is necessary to force the conclusion that this court cannot declare, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff's prima facie case, even as bolstered, to a certain extent, by the testimony of his witnesses, was not overcome by the defendant's proofs. The whole question was one for the jury. An elaborate analysis herein of the testimony is not required to show that we must abide by the result arrived at by the jury. We may, however, emphasize a few of the facts, which, it is to be presumed, the jury gave special attention to and found. Among these is the fact that, so far as the record advises us, the coaster was constructed exactly as all such devices are constructed and under the direct general supervision of the defendant, who had been engaged for many years in the business of operating such machines. No witness for the plaintiff testified to the contrary. Furthermore, the coaster was thoroughly tested on the day of the accident, and before it was opened to use by the public, first, by loading the cars with iron and other heavy materials; and, second, by certain of the defendant's employees, who assisted in the construction of the machine, who, on the day of the accident, rode in the cars and made some 10 or 12 trips on the train, before the public was permitted to use it, and that they found it to work as well and safely as is usual to such devices.

Again, important is the fact that several persons, shortly after the accident—one the same evening and the others the following day—subjected the coaster to a scrutinizing inspection, "from top to bottom," as one of the witnesses declared, and found it perfectly intact in all its parts; no damage or defect in the machinery having been discovered. And it is a circumstance of no little significance that, out of the 18 passengers on the train at the time of the accident, the deceased was the only one thrown from the car. It must also be kept in mind that those of the defendant's witnesses who rode on the coaster before the public was permitted to use it testified, as did the defendant, that the movement of the train when passing over and around the several peaks was uniform—that is to say, that the jerking and swaying movement of the coaster at the second peak and dip was no more acute and sudden than it was at the other peaks and dips, and that such movement was not at any of the higher points on the tramway more severe or keen than is usual to all such devices. In fact, Miss Splitlog, who, as seen, testified that the jerking movement of the car at the first peak was not as sudden and abrupt as at the second peak, stated that, on the first trip she and the deceased made, the jerking movement of the train at the latter peak and dip was not more severe and sudden or acute than it was at the first peak and dip.

[3] From the foregoing review of the evidence, it must be clear that it was for the jury to determine whether the death of the little girl was proximately caused by and through the culpable negligence of the defendant, or whether the deceased, in that she failed to exercise the amount of care to preserve her own personal safety which the circumstances and conditions by which she voluntarily surrounded herself imperatively required of her, was herself guilty of negligence which proximately caused or contributed to the accident and its distressful consequences. But it is said, or at least intimated, that the fact that the deceased was a mere child imposed upon the defendant a greater amount of the degree of care than is required of an operator of such a device in the case of an adult. While it is true that the same act which would be negligence in an adult may not be such if done by a child, still it is also true that:

> "A child is required to exercise the same degree of care that would be expected from children of his age, or which children of his age ordinarily exercise. State v. Baltimore, etc., R. R. Co., 24 Md. 84, 87 Am. Dec. 600; Collins v. South Boston R. R. Co., 142 Mass. 301 [7 N. E. 856], 56 Am. Rep. 675. * * * Children, as well as adults, should use the prudence and discretion which persons of their years ordinarily have, and they cannot be permitted with impunity to indulge in conduct which they know, or ought to know, to be careless. 'The law imposes upon minors the duty of giving such attention to their surroundings and care to avoid danger as may fairly and reasonably be expected from persons of their age and capacity.' Merryman v. Chicago, etc., R. R. Co., 85 Iowa, 635 [52 N. W. 545]. In the present case the capacity and intelligence of the child are not controverted, and he must be presumed to have had all the qualities ordinarily belonging to a person of his age." Studer v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 400, 404, 405, 53 P. 942, 943 (66 Am. St. Rep. 39).

See, also, Bolar v. Maxwell Hardware Co. (Cal. Sup.) 271 P. 97, and Moeller v. Packard (Cal. App.) 261 P. 315.

In the instant case, the minor was past the age of 13 years. She had previously and on the evening of her death ridden on the same coaster and at other times on similar devices. That she was a girl of normal intelligence, and of more than usual ambition of children of her years to develop their intellectual powers, is shown by the testimony of her father, the plaintiff herein. He testified that the deceased, before he moved to California, attended the public schools at Niagara Falls; that, on locating in California, some three or four years prior to the trial, she not only attended a public school at Los Angeles, but received instruction in the costumer's art at an art school in said city, and, further, received lessons in the costumer's art through a correspondence school; that at the time of her death she had made such progress in her art studies that she was able efficiently and skillfully to make models for costumes suitable for use by histrions in moving pictures, as well as those engaged in the real dramatic art itself. These models, testified the plaintiff, who was a tailor by occupation, were used by him to make costumes for the purpose mentioned, and without them, he said, he could not have carried on his business as a tailor, specializing, as he then was, in such costume making. A photograph of the deceased, taken a short time before her unfortunate death, is presented in the transcript, and, in so far as a photograph of a person can reflect mental character and physical condition, the picture indicates a singularly prominent degree of intelligence and sound and vigorous physical health and strength. But, regardless of this latter consideration, it is perfectly clear from her father's testimony that she was intelligent beyond the average of minors of her age.

[4] We have now pursued a sufficient discussion of the evidentiary branch of the case. The verdict, upon the evidence, is binding upon this court.

[5] It is claimed, however, that it must be held as a matter of law that the defendant was guilty of negligence which was the direct cause of the accident, "especially in the case of children," in that he failed to provide the cars "with straps or other safety appliances to hold the passengers to their seats while going over the dips and 'bumps,' or to furnish attendants to ride in the cars and protect the passengers from being thrown out of the same." This, it is contended, was a duty resting upon the defendant by virtue of the terms of sections 2100 and 2101 of the Civil Code. Those sections promulgate rules relative to the duty of common carriers, it being claimed by the plaintiff that the defendant, as the operator of such a device, was and is a common carrier within the contemplation of the Code rules (Civ. Code, §§ 2100 and 2101), establishing the degree of care and diligence required of such carriers for the safe carriage of their passengers. See Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 574, 22 P. 266, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175; Champagne v. A. Hamburger & Sons, 169 Cal. 683, 690, 147 P. 954. At the trial the defendant's counsel conceded that in personal injury cases such devices were to be treated as such carriers, and the trial court instructed the jury upon that theory. We will therefore treat such devices in the consideration and decision of this appeal in accord with that theory, without, however, intending to hold, or deciding, that they are common carriers within the Code rules mentioned, it not being necessary herein to pass upon that question, since in either aspect of the proposition the final result arrived at herein must, according to our view, be the same.

Section 2100 of the Civil Code reads:

> "A carrier of persons for reward must use the utmost care and diligence for their safe carriage, must provide everything necessary for that purpose, and must exercise to that end a reasonable degree of skill."

Section 2101 reads:

> "A carrier of persons for reward is bound to provide vehicles safe and fit for the purposes to which they are put, and is not excused for default in this respect by any degree of care."

There is no evidence that the cars were not equipped with all the appliances or means for protecting passengers which are usually or ordinarily provided for or necessary to be employed in the operation of such conveyances or vehicles. The iron bar or rail in each car and in front of the passengers was specially designed to enable passengers to hold themselves in their seats against the "jerks" and "bumps" naturally characteristic of such a contrivance when in motion, and, so far as this record discloses, was all-sufficient for such purpose. If it be answered that the fact that the deceased was thrown from the train is evidence of an absence of sufficient safeguards against accidents to the passengers, the reply is that the deceased was the only passenger hurled to the ground, and that 17 others, including several young people, particularly her seat companion, approximately of her own age, remained in their seats and were returned safely to the starting point of the train.

[6] The same observations apply to the suggestion that it was the duty of the defendant to provide the cars with attendants while the train was in operation, to prevent the passengers from falling therefrom. As to this, it may further be said that the method of operating a "scenic railway," as such devices as the one in question are commonly called, is a matter of common knowledge, to which the courts are not required to close their eyes. "We, as a court, are not more ignorant than the general public. What is generally known we must know." Pointer v. Mountain Ry. Const. Co., 269 Mo. 104, 132, 189 S. W. 805, 813 (L. R. A. 1917B, 1091). From this common knowledge, we can say that it is not the custom or necessary to assign attendants to the cars of a device such as the one involved herein, for the purpose of preventing passengers from falling from the cars while the train is in motion.

[7] The next assignment involves the complaint that the court refused to allow in evidence certain photographs of the coaster, some of which were taken the day following the date of the accident and others at some subsequent time. The theory upon which the photographs were offered was, as stated in the brief of plaintiff, that they would show that at the time of the accident the device was not completed, and was, therefore, unsafe for use. Special emphasis is laid upon those of the rejected photographs showing men at work about the coaster the day following the accident; the claim being that they constituted competent evidence to substantiate the contention by plaintiff that the machine was not fully prepared for use at the time it was first opened to use by the public. There was no denial of the testimony introduced by the plaintiff, but, in effect, an admission of the truth thereof that, on or about the device, men were at work on the day following that of the accident. Hence no prejudice can be claimed against the ruling rejecting the photographs, even if it be assumed that it involved error. The other rejected photographs showed the character of the general mechanical construction of the device. This is true of other photographs of the machine which were received in evidence. They were a photographic reproduction of the device from different points of view, and, manifestly, could not show any defects in the machinery, if any there were. They were serviceable in the trial of the case only in so far as by means thereof the particular part of the device where it was claimed that there were defects or broken parts might be pointed out and located.

[8, 9] The plaintiff called a witness in rebuttal and asked how many times the train had made the circuit of the tramway "at the time of the accident." Objection by defendant that that question did not call for testimony properly rebuttal was sustained. That question was fully gone into by the plaintiff in his original case. It has been often held, and with obvious legal propriety, that it is improper to allow witnesses to reiterate the testimony previously given by them in the original case under the guise of rebuttal. See People v. Van Ewan, 111 Cal. 144, 149, 43 P. 520; People v. Peccole (Cal. App.) 268 P. 473, 479. And the general rule may be stated to be that rebuttal or surrebuttal testimony, strictly speaking, is receivable only where new matters have been developed by the evidence of one of the parties after his case in chief has been made and concluded, although it is within the discretion of the trial court to allow a party, on "rebuttal or surrebuttal," to introduce evidence with respect to relevant and material matters as to which his witnesses have testified in chief. In the instant case, however, as we have in effect stated, the evidence offered as "in rebuttal" was cumulative of relevant evidence to the same point received in plaintiff's case in chief, and it cannot, therefore, be held that the court, in disallowing it, transcended the limits of a sound discretion.

[10] The defendant and the latter's witness Paige, the builder of the coaster, testified that, before the device was opened for use by the public, it was completed, except "in a few minor details," viz.: The lights were not permanently attached to the machine, and the handrail around or along the board walk, on which an attendant might walk, if he so desired, or if at any time, for any reason, it was found necessary, was not completed. Paige, on cross-examination, was asked:

> "Now, you say this roller coaster was finished, Mr. Paige? A. I do, except in a few details. Q. Just a few small details? A. Yes. Q. No major repairs were necessary to be made? A. No, sir. Q. And you didn't make any major repairs after this accident took place?"

To this last question objection was interposed, on the grounds that "it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial." The question constituted cross-examination, and the witness should have been permitted to answer it, but no prejudice followed from disallowing it, since the record shows that, on both direct and cross-examination, the witness in effect stated a number of times that, save in a few particulars, in no degree or manner affecting the matter of safety in operating the train, the device was finished and in proper condition for use by the public. Besides, the witness' answer to counsel for plaintiff that "no major repairs were necessary to be made," was the equivalent, practically, of the statement that he did not make any "major repairs" after the accident. And thus a sufficient foundation was laid for the impeachment of the witness on that subject, if plaintiff was prepared to pursue that line of attack upon the witness and his testimony.

There are several other assignments involving attacks upon certain rulings upon evidence. An examination of those assignments has convinced us that they are without sufficient merit to entitle them to special notice herein.

[11] Both the plaintiff and the defendant proposed a large number of instructions covering every phase of the case as it was made by the pleadings and proof. The court rejected all the instructions so proposed, and in lieu thereof sua sponte charged the jury fully and correctly upon every principle of law pertinent to the issues framed by the pleadings and introduced by the evidence which was declared in the rejected set of instructions proposed by the parties themselves. There are, however, embraced in the court's charge, two instructions which plaintiff insists misstate the rules of law thereby sought to be announced. The first of these is based upon section 2100 of the Civil Code, and states, among other things, that a railway such as the one herein involved, being "a common carrier of passengers," within the meaning of the Code section just named, it is "incumbent upon such carrier to exercise the highest degree of care and caution for the safety of its passengers," etc. The specific criticism of said instruction is that the "highest degree of care" which the instruction declares that it is incumbent upon a common carrier to exercise for the safety of its passengers does not square with the rule as it is stated in section 2100 upon that subject, which, as is to be noted, expresses the degree of care in such cases as the "utmost" care. There can be conceived no greater care than the "highest" care. Nothing can go beyond the highest. The adjective "utmost" can describe nothing higher or greater than the highest or the greatest. The adjective "highest" is the superlative of the adjective "high." And our dictionaries say that the adjective "utmost" means "the greatest or highest degree, quantity, or number." The noun is defined: "The most that can be; the greatest power, degree, or effort." It is well said in the cases that:

> "The expression 'highest degree of care' is no stronger than the statutory requirement 'utmost care.' The instruction in this regard was not error." Osgood v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 137 Cal. 280, 70 P. 169, 92 Am. St. Rep. 171; McCurrie v. S. P. Co., 122 Cal. 558, 55 P. 324.

The converse of the proposition stated in the instruction (and the instruction so implies) is, necessarily, that for the slightest neglect against which "human care and foresight might have guarded," if such neglect was the proximate cause of the death of the deceased, the defendant would be in law responsible. Champagne v. A. Hamburger & Sons, 169 Cal. 683, 690, 147 P. 954.

[12] The other instruction complained of reads:

> "The defendant was not an insurer of the safety of the deceased at the time the accident in question occurred."

The case just named is cited as holding that the instruction involves an incorrect statement of the rule. The instruction in that case properly enough stated that common carriers were not "insurers of the absolute safety" of their passengers. The word "absolute" was, as seen, omitted from the instruction here, and that omission constitutes substantially the only difference between the two instructions, if, indeed, such omission in a juridical concept constitutes a material difference. In the Champagne v. Hamburger & Sons Case substantially the instruction hereinabove first considered and the instruction now under review were given as one instruction. The two legal propositions stated in the instruction there are here stated separately or in two distinct instructions; but, obviously, the two instructions should be viewed or considered together, or in connection with each other, and if, as so viewed, they may rationally be so construed as that they fairly and intelligently state the true rule as to the degree of responsibility which common carriers must assume in safeguarding their passengers against accident or injury, then, of course, there is no real ground for complaint. Reading the two instructions in this case together, they fairly and with sufficient clarity state the principles of law to which they are addressed in the following form, which is substantially in the form in which they are separately given in this case:

> "While common carriers are not insurers of the safety of their passengers, they are bound to exercise the highest degree of care and caution for the safety of their passengers, and to do all that human foresight and vigilance can reasonably do, consistent with the mode of conveyance and the practical operation of its rule, to prevent accident to their passengers while riding on their cars."

The difference between the statement that common carriers are charged with the highest care to protect or preserve the safety of their passengers and the statement that such carriers are not insurers of the absolute safety of their passengers, is merely verbal, and involves the statement of practically the same rule of law as applicable to common carriers in an affirmative and a negative form. The slightest neglect cannot be the highest care, so, when it is said that common carriers are charged with the highest care to protect the safety of their passengers, it necessarily means that they are insurers of such safety as against the slightest neglect. We therefore think that the two instructions referred to, read together, with sufficient clearness explain the duty common carriers owe to their passengers in the matter of safeguarding them against accident or injury as such duty is set forth in section 2100 of the Civil Code.

The judgment is affirmed.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 26, 1928. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 24, 1929.

1. Corporations 🔑92—Recovery cannot be had on renewal note, based on stock subscription agreement, where prescribed amount of purchase price was not paid in cash (Corporate Securities Act, § 12).

Recovery cannot be had on renewal notes, based on subscription agreement for purchase of stock in plaintiff corporation, where twenty-five per cent. of purchase price was not paid in cash, as prescribed by commissioner of corporations under Corporate Securities Act, § 12 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3814, § 12), since renewal note given in lieu of previous note based on illegal contract is unenforceable in hands of parties participating in acts which render original note invalid.

2. Corporations 🔑92—In action on note based on stock subscription agreement, evidence showed cash payment of required percentage of purchase price, rendering instruction on illegality under Corporate Securities Act erroneous (Corporate Securities Act, § 12).

In action on notes, based on subscription agreement for purchase price of plaintiff's stock, evidence held to show that twenty-five per cent. of purchase price of stock was paid in cash, as required by Corporate Securities Act, § 12 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3814, § 12), so that court erred in giving instructions bearing on legality of cause of action, in so far as Corporate Securities Act was concerned.

3. Trial 🔑330(2)—Where one of defenses submitted was contrary to evidence, general verdict will not support judgment.

Where one defense submitted to jury was not supported by evidence, and was directly contrary to evidence, judgment cannot stand, based on general verdict for defendant, since it is impossible to determine on which issue jury rendered verdict.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action by Imperial Life Stock & Mortgage Company against William Tracy. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

Fredericks & Hanna, of Los Angeles, and C. V. Anderson, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Dorsey & Campbell and Emmons & Aldrich, all of Bakersfield, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This action was brought to enforce payment of five promissory notes, set out in plaintiff's complaint in five separate causes of action. The defendant had judgment, and the plaintiff appeals.

The first cause of action is based upon a promissory note in the sum of $7,500, executed by the defendant on May 20, 1922. The second cause of action is on a promissory note in the sum of $1,875, executed by the defendant on May 20, 1922. The third cause of action is based upon a note executed by the defendant in a like sum of $1,875, dated May 20, 1922. The fourth cause of action is based upon a promissory note executed by the defendant in the sum of $7,500, dated May 20, 1921. And the fifth cause of action is based upon a promissory note executed by the defendant in the sum of $3,750, on May 20, 1921. These notes were all executed for and on account of original subscription agreements of the defendant to purchase shares in the capital stock of the plaintiff corporation. These subscriptions are dated as follows: One for 250 shares of the capital stock of said company dated February 5, 1920; one for 250 shares of the capital stock of said company, dated November 16, 1920; one for 500 shares of the capital stock of said company, dated January 27, 1921; one for 1,000 shares of the capital stock of said company dated March 16, 1921; and one for 1,000 shares of the capital stock of said company, dated April 7, 1921. The note based upon the subscription agreement for 1,000 shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff corporation, dated April 7, 1921, appears in the complaint in the form of a renewal note, for the same sum set forth in the first cause of action.

By way of defense to the plaintiff's action, the defendant set forth in his answer that the notes were obtained by fraudulent representations, and also that the subscription agreements upon which the original notes were given were void under the Corporate Securities Act, and that the notes sued upon are simply renewals of the original void obligations. The subscription agreements were all in similar form, and, among other items, contained the following:

> "I hereby subscribe for, and agree to purchase ——— shares of the capital stock of the Imperial Live Stock & Mortgage Company, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, and agree to pay therefor $10.00 per share, payable as follows: Not less than one-fourth cash accompanying this obligation, and the balance thereof as evidenced by a promissory note of even date herewith bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum."

The permit issued by the commissioner of corporations permitting the plaintiff corporation to take subscriptions for shares of its capital stock, specified that not less than 25 per cent. of the par value of the stock should be paid for in cash, and that the remainder, or 75 per cent. of the amount agreed to be paid, might be evidenced by a promissory note or promissory notes bearing 6 per cent. interest.

In so far as the agreements to purchase shares of the capital stock of the appellant corporation are concerned, upon which the renewal note set forth as the second, third, fourth, and fifth causes of action in the plaintiff's complaint are based, the record shows beyond controversy that no part of the 25 per cent. of the par value of the shares of the capital stock subscribed for by the defendant was paid in cash. In each instance, so far as the agreements to purchase shares of the capital stock which lead to the giving of the renewal notes set forth in said causes of action are concerned, what are called in the transcript "myself notes" only were given; that is, the defendant, when subscribing for shares of the capital stock, instead of paying 25 per cent. in cash, drew a note payable to himself for 25 per cent. of the par value of the shares of stock subscribed for, and delivered the same to the plaintiff, and then, at the same time, and as a part of the same transaction, executed a promissory note payable at a definite time, some months after the date of the execution of the note, for 75 per cent. of the par value of the stock subscribed for. The record shows that prior to the 20th day of May, 1921, these "myself notes" had all been taken up by the defendant by the payment in cash of the 25 per cent. of the value of the shares of stock theretofore subscribed for by the defendant; that on said 20th day of May, 1921, renewal notes were given in lieu of the former notes, representing 75 per cent. of the purchase price of the shares of stock mentioned in the subscription agreements; that at said time the shares of capital stock subscribed for were issued and assigned to certain persons as trustees for the benefit of the plaintiff, to be held as security or until the 75 per cent. notes were fully paid, trust certificates representing the shares of stock called for in each subscription being delivered to the defendant, evidencing the number of shares assigned by him, and to be held in trust for the benefit of the corporation.

The court instructed the jury to find in favor of the defendant as to the second, third, fourth, and fifth causes of action alleged in plaintiff's complaint. With this summary we may proceed to consider the appellant's contentions, which are as follows:

(1) That the court erred in directing the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant on the second, third, fourth, and fifth causes of action.

(2) That the issue of fraud should not have been submitted as a defense to the first cause of action set forth in the plaintiff's complaint.

(3) That the defense of illegality, based on the use of "myself notes," should not have been submitted as a defense to the first cause of action.

[1] As heretofore stated, all the notes sued on by the plaintiff in the second, third, fourth, and fifth causes of action set forth are renewal notes, based upon subscription agreements for the purchase of shares of stock, under a permit from the commissioner of corporations, providing that at least 25 per cent. of the purchase price should be paid in cash, whereas in truth and in fact no cash was paid, and only "myself notes" were given for the 25 per cent. of the purchase price, which notes were subsequently taken up by the defendant.

Section 12 of the Corporate Securities Act, usually referred to as the "Blue Sky Law," reads as follows:

> "Every security issued by any company, without a permit of the commissioner authorizing the same then in effect, shall be void, and every security issued by any company, with the authorization of the commissioner but not conforming in its provisions to the provisions, if any, which it is required by the permit of the commissioner to contain, shall be void." Deering's General Laws 1923, part 1, p. 1414.

The receipts issued by the appellant corporation at the time of taking subscriptions to purchase shares in its capital stock were in the following form, one of which will suffice:

> "November 16, 1920. Received of William Tracy, of Buttonwillow, California, the sum of $2,500.00, cash, $625.00, note $1,875.00, payable to Imperial Live Stock & Mortgage Company as payment for 250 shares of the capital stock of the Imperial Live Stock & Mortgage Company, as set forth in this subscription contract, numbered the same as the receipt and bearing even date herewith.
> "Imperial Live Stock & Mortgage Company,
> "L. V. Moron, Special Agent."

No mention being made in the receipts that the 25 per cent. of the subscribed cost of the shares of stock was in fact evidenced by "myself notes," and not really paid in cash at the date of the subscription. Upon this state of facts the appellant contends, upon the authority of Moore v. Moffatt, 188 Cal. 1, 204 P. 220, that the renewal notes, though based upon void contracts, became valid obligations upon the date of renewal, the issuance of the certificates, and the assigning of them by the defendant to trustees for the benefit of the corporation, under the theory that the agreement was a continuing offer on the part of the corporation for the sale of its stock, and was accepted in a valid manner at the date of the issuance thereof, ratified by the defendant as evidenced by his having taken up and paid the "myself notes," and the then giving by him of notes evidencing the remaining 75 per cent. of the value of the respective purchases.

In the case of Moore v. Moffatt, supra, the action was brought by a trustee in bankruptcy to recover the difference between the sums paid on a subscription agreement for stock in a corporation, and the par value of the stock. In that case it appears that the amount agreed to be paid had all been paid. The defense to the action was based upon the fact that at the time the money was paid, the corporation had no valid permit to sell shares of its capital stock. The court, in discussing the issues involved in that case, used the following language:

> "Conceding, for the purposes of discussion and decision, as is contended in support of the judgment, that the subscription agreement was in its inception void and incapable of acceptance by the corporation because executed, in contravention of the provisions of the Investment Company's Act (Stats. 1913, p. 715), prior to the procurement of a permit from the corporation commissioner authorizing a sale of the corporation's stock, and therefore could not have been legally made the basis of an action against the defendants upon the theory that they were stockholders in the corporation, still we have the admitted fact in the plaintiff's case that no stock of the corporation was in fact issued in response to any agreement of the parties until after an admittedly regular and valid permit had been granted by the corporation commissioner. This being so, the subscription agreement, even though it may have been void and incapable of acceptance in the first instance, should, in the light of the subsequent conduct of the parties to the transaction, be considered and construed as a continuing offer to subscribe for the stock in question, pending the procurement of a permit from the corporation commissioner, which ultimately became the embodiment and expression of a new agreement to purchase the stock entered into at a time when the only legal obstacle in the way of a valid agreement had been overcome. The agreement, so considered, and having been in fact ultimately accepted by the corporation after the required permit had been procured, * * * the validity of its making and acceptance must be measured and tested by its character as revealed by the circumstances and conduct of the parties with relation thereto at the time of its ultimate acceptance rather than by the circumstances attending its mere physical making in the first instance."

The court in that case then goes on to hold that the acts of the parties were tantamount to an adoption by them of the terms and conditions of the subscription agreement as of the date of its ultimate acceptance, and that the defendants were liable for the unpaid portion of the capital stock, and reversed the judgment of nonsuit entered by the trial court. If the circumstances of the instant case were identical with the case of Moore v. Moffatt, supra, the contentions of the appellant would have to be accepted as decisive, and the ruling of the trial court reversed. As we regard the transaction, however, a different principle is involved. In the Moffatt Case the trustee was not suing upon a tainted contract affecting its validity. In the case at bar there can be no doubt that the original 75 per cent. notes, of which the notes represented in causes of action set forth in plaintiff's complaint numbered 2, 3, 4, and 5 are renewals, were invalid.

In the case of Domenigoni v. Imperial Live Stock & Mortgage Co., 189 Cal. 467, 209 P. 36, in an action to cancel certain promissory notes given to represent 75 per cent. of the purchase price of shares of the capital stock of the corporation which is the appellant in the present action, where "myself notes" were given for 25 per cent. instead of cash, just as in the case at bar, the court held as follows:

> "The entire transaction was an attempt to circumvent the law. The notes and agreements were each of them made in violation thereof and are therefore against the policy of the law, * * * and void."

No relief, however, was given for the following reason, as was there said speaking of the plaintiff:

> "He was a party to them and is equally guilty with the defendant. In such a case the court will give no relief even if the point is not raised by either party."

The contract being void, the promissory notes were held void and each party was left in the condition in which the court found him. The receipt given by the defendant, the appellant here, in the Domenigoni Case was identical in language with the receipts given to the defendant in the instant case.

In the case of Union Collection Co. v. Buckman, 150 Cal. 159, 88 P. 708, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 568, 119 Am. St. Rep. 164, 11 Ann. Cases, 609, a case having to do with a renewal note given in place of a prior note based upon an illegal contract, it was held as follows (we quote from the syllabus):

> "Any renewal notes given in place of the original notes based upon an illegal consideration are affected with the same illegality. Merely repeating a promise based on an illegal consideration cannot give it validity."

It is further said in the opinion in that case, quoting from a former opinion of Kreamer v. Earl, 91 Cal. 112, 27 P. 735:

> "'It is not for the sake of the party who is benefited by the intervention, but for the sake of the law itself,' that a court refuses to allow the law and the machinery of the courts to be made use of for the enforcement of illegal contracts, and leaves the parties precisely where it finds them."

Quoting, also, from the case of Hill v. Kidd, 43 Cal. 615:

> "It is equally well settled that no action in affirmance of an illegal contract can be maintained."

A long list of citations supporting the rules of law just set forth may be found in 11 Ann. Cas. on page 612, following the opinion in the Buckman Case. The authorities there set forth are so numerous as to prevent repetition here, but all hold that a renewal note, given in lieu of a previous note based upon an illegal contract, partakes of the same tainted character, and is unenforceable when in the hands of the parties participating in the fraud, or in the acts which render the original note invalid. In 19 California Jurisprudence, 1006, we find the following statement supported by authorities:

> "A renewal note given in place of the original one based upon an illegal consideration, is affected with the same illegality; merely repeating a promise based on an illegal consideration cannot give it validity."

It is but trite to say that:

> "Commercial paper cannot be based on any consideration which is in violation of an express statutory provision." 8 Cal. Jur. 243.

Again:

> "If the instrument or contract is declared void by statute, it cannot be enforced; in some states, even by a bona fide holder." 8 Cal. Jur. 768.

The latter statement is not involved here, the original parties only being before the court.

In the case of Reno v. American Ice Machine Co., 72 Cal. App. 409, 237 P. 784, in an action based upon a void contract for the purchase of stock, an attempt is made to distinguish between actions where the original parties are involved, and actions where a representative of one of the parties appears, as was the case in Moore v. Moffatt, supra, where a trustee in bankruptcy was one of the parties, and in so doing, referred to the case of Moore v. Moffatt in the following language:

> "That was not an action between the parties to avoid contract, but an action by a trustee in bankruptcy of a corporation to recover the unpaid subscription price of stock for the benefit of creditors. That situation presents an exception to the rule above announced, which rule is suspended in the interests of innocent third persons who have relied upon the contract."

Although this statement is relied upon by respondent and vigorously assailed by the appellant, we do not feel called upon to either approve or disapprove the language there used, save and except to state that in the Moffatt Case the circumstances are readily distinguishable from the circumstances characterizing the transaction in the cause now before us. The contract, which really was a contract created by law to pay the unpaid portion of capital stock issued to, and accepted by the defendants in the case of Moore v. Moffatt, only, was involved, whereas in the instant case the attempt is made to give vitality and validity to tainted and void contracts by renewals thereof.

The issues presented in this cause relate to matters of public policy. If no other persons were involved, and the principle reached no farther than the respective parties to this cause, we might consider seriously the contention of the appellant that the renewal notes, instead of being considered on the same basis, should be treated as a new subscription for the shares of stock in the plaintiff corporation, and valid and enforceable obligations. To do so, however, would be to open the door to all the illegal practices condemned by the Corporate Securities Act. If a scheme or a plan to avoid the provisions of that act, and of the requirements inserted in the permit issued to the corporation by the corporation commissioner, relating to its sale of stock, can be accomplished by the subterfuge of the issuance and taking of "myself notes" for 25 per cent. of the value of the stock and ordinary notes for 75 per cent., then and in that case the requirement for the payment of a certain portion of the subscription in cash, in order that the corporation may have assets to meet its obligations, would simply be to render nugatory, not only the requirements of the corporation commissioner, but also the act itself. Public policy, which led to the enactment of the Corporate Securities Act, forbids the approval of any such transactions, and we think the trial court properly excluded from the jury consideration of the second, third, fourth, and fifth causes of action tendered by the plaintiff's complaint, by instructing the jury to find for the defendant.

[2] The record shows that the court submitted to the jury the issues tendered by plaintiff's first cause of action and the defendant's answer thereto which set up two defenses as follows: The illegality of the subscription for the shares of stock for which, in part payment, the note sued on in the first cause of action appears as a renewal note, dated April 7, 1921; and also the further defense that the defendant was induced to subscribe for the shares of stock for payment of which, in part, said note was given, by the fraudulent representation of the plaintiff's agents. Appellant contends that neither one of these issues should have been submitted.

If the first contention of the appellant be well taken, it will be unnecessary to enter into a discussion of whether the evidence sustains the defense of fraud, or whether it shows a waiver thereof in the event that the testimony establishes the fraudulent representations as contended for by the respondent. The verdict of the jury on the first cause of action is in the words following:

> "We, the jury, find for the defendant on the first cause of action set out in plaintiff's complaint."

By finding only a general verdict, of course, it was impossible for the trial court, and is impossible for an appellate court, to determine whether the jury concluded that the defense of illegality had been made out, or whether the jury returned a verdict by reason of the alleged fraudulent representations of the plaintiff's agents at the time the defendant subscribed for the stock partly covered by the note set forth in the first cause of action.

In relation to the first cause of action the court, among other things, instructed the jury as follows:

> "You are instructed that if you find from a preponderance of the testimony that the note sued upon in plaintiff's first cause of action for $7,500.00, is a renewal of a note executed by William Tracy on April 7, 1921, and at that time he made and executed an agreement to purchase 1,000 shares of stock of the Imperial Live Stock & Mortgage Company, a corporation, and at the time of entering into such agreement executed in addition to said note for $7,500.00 a note payable to himself for $2,500.00 and that the said note for $7,500.00 together with said note for $2,500.00 was for the purchase of shares of stock mentioned in said subscription agreement and that said notes constituted the entire purchase price of said stock mentioned in said agreement, the notes issued in connection therewith are void, and you must find for the defendant on said cause of action number one of plaintiff's complaint."
> "You are instructed that if you believe from a preponderance of the testimony that the defendant gave to the plaintiff notes for the entire transaction in entering into the contract set out in plaintiff's first cause of action, then you must find for the defendant."
> "If you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant, at the time of the executing of the original note, renewal of which is set out in the first cause of action of plaintiff's complaint, entered into the subscription agreement set out in the first cause of action of plaintiff's complaint, the said defendant William Tracy executed and delivered to the plaintiff, Imperial Live Stock & Mortgage Company, a corporation, notes for the entire amount of the subscription mentioned therein, you must find for the defendant on such cause of action."

The giving of this instruction is assigned by appellant as prejudicial error, and in support thereof it insists that the testimony, instead of showing a "myself note" having been given by the defendant for 25 per cent. of the value of the stock subscribed for by him on the 7th day of April, 1921, establishes without any substantial conflict that the defendant paid for the same in cash. If this is true, appellant's contention is well taken. In order to understand the testimony which we are about to set forth, it is necessary to state that on the 16th day of March, 1921, the defendant signed an agreement for the purchase of 1,000 shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff corporation; that at the time of signing such agreement he executed two notes, one a "myself note" for $2,500 and one for $7,500. This $7,500 note appears in the plaintiff's complaint as the basis of the fourth cause of action, and which was excluded from consideration of the jury by instructing the jury to find for the defendant. The "myself note" given on the 16th day of March, 1921, was paid by the defendant on the 31st day of March, 1921. Thereafter there was only one transaction between the plaintiff and the defendant now represented in the first cause of action. This statement is necessary because the testimony of the defendant does not clearly distinguish between the two transactions. We now quote the testimony of the plaintiff as to the transaction of April 7, 1921:

> "Cross-examination: Q. Now, Mr. Tracy, in reference to the subscription of April 7, 1921, what makes you think you gave a 'myself note' for $2,500.00 instead of $2,500.00 cash at that time? A. It is my remembrance that I gave a note each time.
> "Q. Don't you remember, Mr. Tracy, that the gentlemen came to your place and you went to the Security Trust Company Bank in Bakersfield and drew out of that bank $2,450.00 April 7, 1921? A. I don't.
> "Q. Have you the 'myself note' that you gave April 7, 1921? A. Oh, I paid it. I know I paid all those notes.
> "Q. When you paid it, did you receive the note back from the bank? A. I can't remember.
> "Q. Have you that note? A. No.
> "Q. How did you pay it? A. (No answer.)
> "Q. Did you pay it with a check or with cash? A. I think I paid that with a check; I didn't have that much cash.
> "Q. On what bank did you draw the check? A. I think I drew it on the Security Trust Bank.
> "Q. In Bakersfield? A. Yes.
> "Q. If your account at the Security Trust Company Bank in Bakersfield showed a withdrawal of $2,450.00 April 7, 1921, wouldn't that refresh your memory, so you might change your opinion as to the facts of that transaction? A. I don't know it.
> "Q. You had on deposit April 7, 1921, a considerable amount of money, did you not? A. I don't know just what I had; I had an account. I don't know what amount I had at that time.
> "Q. Now on March 16th, when you purchased the 1,000 shares of stock, you gave the 'myself note' for $2,500.00 that is in evidence as 'Defendant's Exhibit 3.' You remember that note, Mr. Tracy? A. Yes.

"Q. And you notice that note is paid March 31, 1921; stamped on the face of it, 'Paid Security Trust Company March 31, 1921'? A. Yes.

"Q. Did you pay it on that date? A. Well, I couldn't say offhand; it would indicate that I did.

"Q. What is your best recollection as to whether you paid the note on that date? A. I don't remember.

"Q. You remember you did pay that note at the bank? A. No; I don't remember. I know I paid all the notes at the bank, but I can't remember that particular note."

The defendant further testified that he did not have the canceled checks with which he paid the 25 per cent. of the subscription taken on March 16, 1921, nor did he have the canceled check for payment made on the subscription dated April 7, 1921. Upon cross-examination the defendant further testified as follows:

"Q. Well, now, I will ask you if it is not a fact that April 7, 1921, you drew a check in favor of Imperial Live Stock & Mortgage Company for $2,450.00? A. I don't remember.

"Mr. Hanna: I will ask you if, on one of the statements you received, Mr. Tracy, you saw entries such as are listed here, from March 24, 1921, to April 12, 1921, for instance, you will notice here listed March 25, a $16,000.00 deposit; do you remember making that deposit in the bank? A. I couldn't say what date; I remember the deposit.

"Q. March 25 there was a check for $8,142.32. Do you remember that check? A. No; I don't know.

"Q. Do you remember you paid out about half of the $16,000.00 immediately after depositing it, on the same day? A. No; I don't remember.

"Q. You don't remember that? A. No.

"Q. Do you remember a check March 31, 1921, for $2,450.00? A. No.

"Q. Do you remember a check, April 7, 1921, $2,450.00? A. No, sir.

"Q. You don't remember those checks, whom they were made payable to? A. No; that is too long ago. I don't remember what they were, now.

"Q. Do you remember receiving, June 15, 1920, $10,000.00 and depositing it in your account? A. No.

"Q. Do you remember paying out, June 15, 1920, $8,445.06? A. No.

"Q. Do you remember paying out, October 4, 1920, $3,000.00? A. No.

"Q. Or $1,208.00 the same day? A. No.

"Q. Do you remember receiving, October 4, 1920, $5,140.07, and depositing it in your account? A. No.

"Q. Do you remember paying out, December 6, 1920, $1,120.50? A. No, sir.

"Q. Do you remember receiving and depositing in your bank account, December 9, 1920, $7,200.00? A. No."

The record further shows that previous to the trial the defendant's deposition was taken, wherein he testified as to a "myself note" executed on April 7, 1921, as follows:

"Q. Did you execute a 'myself note' at that time, also? A. I think I did.

"Q. Are you sure you did? A. Well, I don't know that I can say I am sure of it; that certainly is my impression. I gave a 'myself note' in all those sales."

The record shows that no "myself note" was produced for the transaction of April 7, 1921. As against this statement of the defendant that he "did not know," "did not remember," and "thought he did," the record shows as follows: That on April 7, 1921, the date on which the subscription was signed by the defendant for the shares of stock involved in the first cause of action, there was charged against the account of the defendant on the books of the Security Trust Company Bank at Bakersfield, the sum of $2,450; that on the same date a draft or cashier's check was issued by the bank payable to the plaintiff, in the sum of $2,450. The record further shows that the plaintiff had no other business transaction at said bank in Bakersfield at that date; that the plaintiff received this draft or cashier's check, together with $50 in cash, as the initial payment of Tracy's subscription of April 7, 1921, and that on April 11, 1921, the plaintiff deposited this check or draft drawn by the Security Trust Company of Bakersfield for $2,450, and $50 in cash, and credited the same to the defendant's account. The testimony of the cashier of the plaintiff shows that the plaintiff received from the defendant the check or cashier's draft for $2,450, dated April 7, 1921, together with $50 in cash, and that the same was entered as a credit on the defendant's account, as herein stated, and that on the 11th day of April, 1921, the check or draft for $2,450 and $50 in cash was deposited with the National Bank of Los Angeles. The exhibit in the transcript shows the draft was drawn by the Security Trust Company of Bakersfield in favor of the Imperial Live Stock & Mortgage Company, the plaintiff in this action, on the Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank of Los Angeles, for $2,450, and bears date of April 7, 1921.

The record further shows that the books of the plaintiff exhibit the fact that there was no other transaction involving the sum of money here referred to, had by the plaintiff with any other of its customers, and that the only one with whom it had any such transaction was the defendant Tracy. The record further shows a transcript of the defendant's account with the Security Trust Company of Bakersfield, which account of the defendant with the bank shows that on March 31, 1921, the defendant withdrew from the Security Trust Company the sum of $2,450, which corresponds with the defendant's testimony that he paid the "myself note" given at the time he subscribed for 1,000 shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff on the 16th day of March, 1921. The "myself note" given on the 16th day of March, 1921, was introduced in evidence as defendant's exhibit No. 3, and shows upon its face that it was paid March 31, 1921. And then, following this, the account of the defendant with the Security Trust Company shows that on April 7, 1921, he drew a check for $2,450; that in accordance with this check the testimony shows that the cashier made out a check in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $2,450, dated April 7, 1921. This check, together with $50, the testimony shows was transmitted to the plaintiff, and was by it deposited as hereinbefore stated, and the defendant credited with the payment of $2,500. This testimony stands in the record absolutely uncontradicted. All there is opposed to it is the statements of the defendant, to use his own language, "I don't remember." The probative value of the testimony of the defendant, that he does not remember, does not rise to the dignity or degree of weight ordinarily characterized as "scintilla" evidence.

[3] We think it is clear from the foregoing that the court erred in giving to the jury instructions bearing upon the legality of the first cause of action in so far as the Corporate Securities Act is concerned. As the verdict is general, it is impossible to determine, as heretofore stated, upon which of the two issues the jury rendered its verdict in favor of the defendant, and as one of the defenses submitted to the jury is not supported by the evidence, and is directly contrary to the evidence, as we have shown, the judgment cannot stand, based upon such a verdict. "Where it is impossible to tell whether the verdict was based on an erroneous instruction, the judgment will be reversed." Likewise, "where a cause is submitted to a jury by a principal instruction authorizing a recovery on an erroneous theory of the law, plaintiff on securing a verdict could not have it sustained on appeal and have the error declared harmless, because there was a theory which, if submitted, would have sustained a similar verdict." 4 Corp. Jur. p. 1043, and cases there cited. To the same effect are the cases of O'Meara v. Swortfiguer, 191 Cal. 12, 214 P. 975; Thompson v. L. A. Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 P. 709; see, also, Wiseman v. McNulty, 25 Cal. 230; Lewis v. Hayes, 165 Cal. 527, 132 P. 1024, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 148. These cases are all to the effect that, where two defenses are interposed and a general verdict is rendered, if the instructions are erroneous as to one defense, the cause must be reversed.

In view of the fact that the judgment must be reversed for the reasons herein stated, it becomes unnecessary to pass upon the contention of the respondent that the defense of fraud was made out, and likewise unnecessary to pass upon the correctness of the position taken by the plaintiff that if fraud existed it was waived by the defendant, as the testimony in relation to these matters may not be the same upon another trial.

In so far as the judgment appealed from relates to the first cause of action, it is hereby reversed. Otherwise, as to all other matters, the judgment is affirmed, neither party to recover costs.

CITY OF OAKLAND v. LYCKBERG.

(Civ. 6362.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 20, 1928.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑186(4)—Policeman is a "public officer" as regards right to recover salary while disabled.

Duly appointed, qualified, and acting policeman of city, which is a duly created, acting agency of the state, is a "public officer" as regards right to recover salary while disabled.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Officer.]

2. Municipal corporations 🔑186(4)—City policeman, being public officer, was entitled to full salary from city while disabled.

Policeman of city of Oakland, being a public officer whose salary was fixed by virtue of a statute authorizing same to be fixed, was entitled to his salary while disabled as result of injuries, since salary was an incident to title to office and not to the position and performance of duties of office.

3. Master and servant 🔑389—City, paying policeman full salary while disabled, could recover full amount paid from person injuring policeman (Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act, § 26).

Where policeman was injured by defendant's automobile and thereafter city paid policeman full amount of his salary during time he was disabled and did not report for work, city could recover full amount paid from person injuring policeman, under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, 1923, p. 1711) § 26.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action to recover money for medical services and salary, by the City of Oakland, against Theodore D. Lyckberg. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Judgment modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Preston Higgins, City Atty., C. Stanley Wood, Asst. City Atty., and Homer W. Buckley, Deputy City Atty., all of Oakland, for appellant.

Louis V. Crowley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Willis L. Grafton, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, amici curiæ in support of appellant.

STURTEVANT, J. On the 18th day of February, 1926, Nels G. Rosen was a duly appointed, qualified, and acting police officer of the city of Oakland; on that date at about 4:30 p. m. he was injured by being knocked down by an automobile driven by the defendant; thereafter the plaintiff paid $172.50 for medical and surgical treatment, hospital and nurse bills, drugs, X-rays, and surgical appliances, and it also paid Rosen $607.37, being the full amount of his salary during the time that he was disabled and did not report for work; thereafter it commenced this action to recover the moneys so expended; the defendant appeared and answered; the parties stipulated as to the facts; and the case was tried before the trial court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, in which it found that the plaintiff had made the expenditures above enumerated and, as conclusions of law, it ordered repaid to the plaintiff the above-mentioned item of $172.50, but on the second item only $394.79. The plaintiff has appealed and has brought up the judgment roll.

[1-3] The sole question before this court is whether the plaintiff was entitled to be reimbursed $607.37, the amount of salary paid to Officer Rosen while he was disabled and unable to work. The defendant asserts that the judgment was for the total amount which the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, p. 1711) authorized, and that the judgment should be affirmed. It is assumed that the statute cited is the only statute involved. In making this assumption we think the defendant falls into error. Nels G. Rosen was, at the time of the accident, a duly appointed, qualified, and acting policeman of the city of Oakland. At that time the city of Oakland was a duly created and acting agency of a sovereign state, the state of California. Nels G. Rosen was therefore a public officer. Noble v. City of Palo Alto (Cal. App.) 264 P. 529; Patton v. Board of Health, etc., 127 Cal. 388, 393, 59 P. 702, 78 Am. St. Rep. 66. The salary of the officer was fixed by virtue of a statute authorizing the same to be fixed and that salary was an incident to the title to the office and not to the position and performance of the duties of the office. People ex rel. Dorsey v. Smyth, 28 Cal. 21, 25; Chubbuck v. Wilson, 151 Cal. 162, 165, 90 P. 524, 12 Ann. Cas. 888. It follows that a public officer having the legal title to his office is entitled to the salary whether he performs the duties thereof or does not. It also follows that, by virtue of existing laws, the city of Oakland is obliged to pay its policemen whether they are confined to their beds by reason of physical injuries or are at work. The salary paid to the officer during the time he was off duty would have been a proper item of damage in a tort action. Civ. Code, § 3333. The act cited by the defendant contains nothing contrary and was not intended to contain anything to the contrary. It was enacted for the purpose of protecting persons, including, among others, police officers. The statute, however, was not enacted to change the rights of a sovereign agency as against the wrongs of third persons. It is not controverted but what the trial court made its estimates by following the provisions of the act cited by the defendant. The question before us is, Do the provisions of that statute fix the amount which the plaintiff may claim in this action? In the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act the particular passage which is pertinent is section 26. Omitting irrelevant parts, it is there provided:

> "* * * Any employer having paid, or having become obligated to pay, compensation, may likewise bring an action against such other person to recover said damages. * * * If the suit be prosecuted by the employer alone evidence of any expenditures which the employer has paid or become obligated to pay by reason of said injury or death shall be admissible, and such expenditures shall be deemed a part of the damages, including a reasonable attorney's fee to be fixed by the court; and if in such suit the employer shall recover more than the amount he has paid or become obligated to pay as compensation he shall pay the excess to the injured employee or other person entitled. * * *"

The defendant argues that "compensation" has a limited meaning and cites section 3, subd. 3, which is as follows:

> "The term 'compensation' means compensation under this act and includes every benefit or payment conferred by sections six to thirty-one, inclusive, of this act upon an injured employee, or in the event of his death, upon his dependents, without regard to negligence."

Conceding the fact, the argument leads nowhere, because, whatever the meaning of the word, it includes the factors enumerated in section 26, and the scope of section 26 has been the subject of several decisions. The case of Western States, etc., Co. v. Bayside L. Co., 182 Cal. 140, 187 P. 735, is quite helpful. All of the facts do not appear in the opinion. An examination of the record discloses that a pile of lumber owned by the defendant toppled over and killed J. J. Sullivan, who was employed by the plaintiff. Thereafter the plaintiff obligated itself to pay the widow of the deceased $4,500. The widow collected insurance in the sum of $3,000. Thereafter the plaintiff sued the defendant to recover damages in the sum of $50,000. The jury brought in a verdict for the sum of $20,000 and the defendant appealed. On page 148 of 182 Cal. (187 P. 738) the court said:

> "There is nothing in the point that the measure of damages is that fixed in the Workmen's Compensation Act for compensation for injuries to be paid by the employer to the dependents of the employee. This action was brought against a third person causing such death, to recover the full amount of damages suffered by the family, and plaintiff is required to pay to the family the difference, if any, over and above the amount theretofore paid to her."

So in this case this plaintiff could have sued for a much larger sum than it did sue for. In the case of Sacramento v. Central California T. Co., 78 Cal. App. 215, 248 P. 307, the court was considering an action brought by the city of Sacramento to recover moneys paid out for injuries sustained by some of its firemen when the crew was hit by an interurban car. On page 219 of 78 Cal. App. (248 P. 308) the court used this language:

> "If, as a matter of law, the respondent paid or had become obligated to pay such compensation, the damages sustained by the respondent were necessarily the amount so paid or incurred by the terms of the act."

On a petition to have the cause transferred to the Supreme Court that court denied the petition and, on page 222 of 78 Cal. App. (248 P. 309), it used the following language:

> "The petition for a hearing in this court is denied. Such denial, however, should not be taken as an approval of what is said in the opinion indicating that the measure of damages in such cases is the amount fixed by the Workmen's Compensation Act for injuries to be paid by the employer to the employee or his dependents. (See Western States, etc., Co. v. Bayside L. Co., 182 Cal. 140, 187 P. 735). * * *"

It follows that the trial court erred in failing to award to the plaintiff the full amount of salary theretofore paid by the plaintiff to Nels G. Rosen.

The last sentence of the judgment rendered by the trial court is modified by striking out "$567.29" and inserting instead "$778.87." As so modified, the judgment is affirmed. The plaintiff will recover its costs on appeal.

PEOPLE v. RAMIREZ. (Cr. 1733.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 26, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑569—Evidence of purchase of marihuana from defendant with marked money furnished by officers did not show entrapment justifying reversal (State Poison Act, § 8, as amended by St. 1927, p. 105, § 1).

In prosecution for violation of the State Poison Act (St. 1907, p. 124), § 8, as amended by St. 1927, p. 105, § 1 (Deering's Gen. Laws Consol. Supp. 1927, Act 5994, § 8), evidence that prosecuting witness informed officers that she suspected defendant of selling marihuana, that officers arranged to have her obtain plant and pay defendant with marked money, and that prosecuting witness purchased plant from defendant without any element of persuasion outside of ordinary elements of purchase and sale between willing purchaser and willing seller, showed defendant was not induced to make unlawful sale and did not make case of entrapment such as would justify reversal of judgment.

2. Criminal law 🔑830—Requested instruction which was erroneous held properly refused.

Refusal of requested instruction which was itself erroneous held proper.

3. Criminal law 🔑757(3)—Requested instruction that testimony of officers using complaining witness to entrap defendant was entitled to little weight would have invaded province of jury.

Requested instruction, after stating that case was one of entrapment, that testimony of officers who used complaining witness to entrap defendant into committing crime was entitled to very little, if any, weight whatsoever, would have been invasion by court of proper functions of jury whose duty it was to weigh evidence and find facts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Jose Ramirez was convicted of violation of the State Poison Act, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John F. Groene, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. By information duly filed, the defendant was convicted of the crime of violation of the State Poison Act, a felony, committed as follows:

> "That the said Jose Ramirez on or about the 26th day of July, 1928, at and in the County of Los Angeles, State of California, did wilfully, unlawfully and feloniously sell, furnish and give away flowering tops and leaves of Indian Hemp containing more than four grains of Indian Hemp to the avoirdupois ounce, in violation of an Act entitled, 'An Act to regulate the Sale and Use of Poisons in the State of California, and providing a penalty for the violation thereof.'"

[1] Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The so-called State Poison Act is a statute enacted in the year 1907 and amended at subsequent legislative sessions. The particular act alleged to have been committed by the defendant is forbidden by section 8 of that statute as amended in the year 1927. Stats. 1907, p. 124; Stats. 1927, p. 106. The statute is also contained, as Act 5994, in Deering's General Laws, 1923 Edition. See Deering's Consolidated Supplement of 1927, p. 1724, for said section 8, as now in force. Section 8 reads in part as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any person * * * to sell, furnish, or give away * * * flowering tops and leaves * * * of * * * Indian Hemp * * *" excepting upon the written order and prescription of a physician, etc. The fact that defendant made a sale of the prohibited article as charged in the information, was established by the evidence. The article in question is known by the common name of marihuana. The principal ground of appeal is that the evidence of the prosecution itself shows "that a trap was being laid by the colored woman Alice Joiner and the officers of the law to induce and persuade him to commit a crime"; and that, where the commission of acts constituting such crime is solely the result of such inducement and persuasion, a conviction will not be sustained. Numerous authorities on this question are cited in the brief for appellant. It appears, however, that the rule invoked by appellant has been carefully considered and the limitations under which it will be applied have been stated in recent decisions of our own state. In People v. Heusers, 58 Cal. App. 103, 207 P. 908, the court said:

> "It is urged that the defendant was entrapped into the commission of the offense. The defendant was in no wise induced to make the unlawful sale except by the mere request for the liquor and payment of the price thereof. This court has decided adversely to appellant's contention in People v. Barkdoll, 36 Cal. App. 25, 171 P. 440, and People v. Tomasovich, 56 Cal. App. 520, 206 P. 119."

In the Heusers Case the defendant was convicted of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor in no-license territory. Certain detectives, acting at the request of the sheriff and district attorney of Glenn county, sought to purchase liquor from the defendant, who agreed to and at an appointed place did deliver the liquor.

An examination of the evidence in the case at bar shows a similarity to the Heusers Case on the essential point that the defendant was not induced to make the unlawful sale, except by the mere request for the marihuana and the payment of the price thereof. It appears that the witness Joiner had become acquainted with circumstances which led her to believe that defendant had been selling marihuana, and thereupon she informed the officers of her suspicion, and they made arrangements with her under which she obtained marihuana from the defendant and paid him marked money therefor. This money was furnished by the officers. She went to the place where she expected to find defendant and did find him there, sitting in his car. She addressed him thus:

> "I asked him if he knew where I could get some marihuana and he asked me how many did I want. I asked him how much they were and he said 50 cents apiece, and I said, 'Well, I can't get but two because I haven't but a dollar.'"

Thereupon defendant went away for a few minutes. On his return, the woman asked him "if he had it," and he said, "Yes." They then walked down the street a short distance to a place where he gave her the marihuana and she gave him the dollar bill. The authorities seem to be clear that under these circumstances the case is not one of entrapment such as would justify a reversal of the judgment. There was no element of persuasion outside of the ordinary elements of purchase and sale between a willing purchaser and a willing vendor, where the offer is made by the purchaser and accepted by the vendor.

[2, 3] Appellant claims that the court erred in its refusal to give the jury a requested instruction on the subject of entrapment. As the instruction itself is erroneous, the refusal was correct. In the offered instruction the court was requested (after stating that "this is a case known as entrapment," etc.) to instruct the jury that—

> "The testimony of the officers who used and had said complaining witness to entrap defendant into committing said crime is entitled to very little, if any, weight whatsoever."

Such instruction would have been an invasion by the court upon the proper functions of the jury, whose duty it was to weigh the evidence and find the facts.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BROOKS v. NELSON et al. (Civ. 3564.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 26, 1928.

1. Judgment 🔑153(2)—"Six months" for application from relief from default begins with clerk's entry thereof (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

The six months within which defendants personally served with summons must, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, apply for relief from default taken against them, begins with the clerk's entry of default, and not from the entry of judgment by the court.

2. Judgment 🔑153(1)—To set aside default judgment, where application is too late to set aside default, would be idle act (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Where application under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, to set aside default and default judgment is too late as regards the default, it would be an idle act to set aside the judgment; as, the default being in force, defendant could take no further steps affecting plaintiff's right of action, and it would be the court's duty immediately to render another judgment of like effect.

3. Appeal and error 🔑957(1)—Order on motion to set aside default will not be disturbed on appeal unless it clearly appears trial court abused its discretion.

Granting or denying motion to set aside default is so largely a matter of discretion with the trial court that, unless it is clearly made to appear that there has been an abuse of this discretion, appellate court will decline to set aside trial court's order.

4. Judgment 🔑143(2)—Defendant seeking relief from default must show good cause for delay and meritorious defense (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Before court can be called on to exercise a discretion to relieve a defendant from a default under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, defendant must show a reasonable statutory excuse for not appearing in time, and a meritorious defense.

5. Pleading 🔑121(1)—Denial merely for lack of sufficient information on which to base a belief is insufficient (Code Civ. Proc. § 437).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 437, providing that, if defendant has no information or belief sufficient to enable him to answer an allegation, he may so state, and place his denial on that ground, denial must be predicated on lack of information and belief, and denial merely for lack of sufficient information on which to base a belief is insufficient.

6. Pleading 🔑121(3)—Matters within or presumptively within defendant's knowledge, or ascertainable from public records, may not be denied for lack of information and belief.

Defendant may not deny, for lack of information and belief, matters as to which he has knowledge or which are presumptively within his knowledge, or which may be ascertained from inspection of a public record.

7. Pleading 🔑121(1)—Answer denying, for lack of information and belief, fact which defendant ought to know, should state investigation and inability to learn fact.

Relative to right of defendant to make a denial for lack of information and belief, if when served with complaint he was actually ignorant of a fact which he ought to know, it was his duty to make investigation before answering, and, if he made investigation and for some unusual reason was unable to learn the fact, he should so state in his answer.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1036(1)—Any defect in designation of party plaintiff as executor of payee of note sued held harmless to defendants; plaintiff being the father and guardian of distributee of estate and owner of note.

Where plaintiff, who, in action on note executed to K., sued as executor of K., was father and guardian of the distributee of the estate and owner of the note, any defect in designation of party plaintiff was harmless to defendants.

9. Judgment 🔑153(1)—Right to have default set aside is not extended by length of time subsequent to entry of default that judgment is entered.

That default judgment was not entered till long after entry of the default does not extend rights of defendants to have default set aside.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry A. Hollzer and William D. Dehy, Judges.

Action by Guy Brooks, as executor of W. J. Knapp, deceased, against Belle Ott Nelson and husband. From an adverse judgment and order, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Henry P. Goodwin and Burton B. Crane, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. R. Wilder and Barker & Keithly, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendants from an order of the trial court refusing to vacate a default judgment and also an appeal from the judgment.

On October 29, 1919, the defendants, for value received, made, executed, and delivered to one W. J. Knapp their promissory note for the sum of $25,000, due one year after date, with interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, and secured by an assignment of whatever interest defendant had "as heir at law or legatee in the estate of Adam Ott, deceased." The note was not paid, and on October 29, 1924, the plaintiff, as executor of the last will and testament of W. J. Knapp, deceased, commenced this action in the superior court of Los Angeles county to collect all sums due under and by virtue of said note. The summons was issued and personally served upon both defendants in Los Angeles county on November 6, 1924. Neither of the defendants appeared in the action within the time allowed by law, and their default was regularly entered by the clerk on the 29th of November, 1924. On February 5, 1925, the defendants made a motion to vacate the default. This motion was denied by the court on February 11, 1925. The record before us does not contain the grounds upon which this motion was made, or what showing, if any, was made in support thereof. The transcript merely shows a copy of the minute order of February 11, 1925, denying the motion.

On June 19, 1925, judgment by default was rendered by the court, and the same was duly entered on June 24, 1925. On July 14, 1925, defendants made a motion, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to vacate and set aside the judgment, but no further motion was made to vacate the default entered on November 29, 1924. On August 8, 1925, this motion was denied.

This appeal is from the judgment, and also from the order of August 8, 1925.

[1] Respondent contends that, when the order of August 8, 1925, was made, denying defendants' motion to vacate the judgment, the trial court had no jurisdiction to vacate either the default or the judgment. We think this contention must be sustained. It must be remembered that the default of defendants was entered by the clerk on November 29, 1924, and the motion to vacate the judgment was not filed until July 14, 1925. Therefore, the default of defendants had been entered for a period of seven months and fifteen days when the motion to vacate the judgment was made.

The application was made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that an application for relief from a judgment, order, or other proceedings taken against the applicant through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, must be made "within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after such judgment, order, or proceedings was taken." In construing this provision of the Code, where personal service was had upon the defendant, as was the case here, both the Supreme Court and this court have held that the clerk's entry of a default, and not the entry of the judgment by the court, fixes the beginning of the six months within which the application must be made. Title Insurance Co. v. King Land Co., 162 Cal. 44, 120 P. 1066; McLain v. Llewellyn Iron Works, 56 Cal. App. 58, 204 P. 869; Mader v. Christie, 52 Cal. App. 138, 198 P. 45; Hinds v. Superior Court, 65 Cal. App. 223, 223 P. 422. Therefore, if the motion made on July 14, 1925, be considered a motion to vacate the default, as well as the judgment, it is clear that it was made too late.

[2] The setting aside and vacating the judgment alone, which was all the relief sought in said motion, would have been an idle act, because the default, entered on November 29, 1924, would have stood undisturbed. The default cut off defendants from making any further opposition or objection to the relief which plaintiff's complaint shows he is entitled to demand.

A defendant against whom a default has been entered is out of court, and is not entitled to take any further steps in the cause affecting plaintiff's right of action; he cannot thereafter, until such default is set aside in a proper proceeding, file pleadings or move for a new trial or demand notice of subsequent proceedings. Title Insurance Co. v. King Land Co., supra; Christerson v. French, 180 Cal. 523, 182 P. 27; Lunnun v. Morris, 7 Cal. App. 710, 95 P. 907; Green v. Rogers, 18 Cal. App. 572, 123 P. 974. If the judgment were vacated, it would be the duty of the court immediately to render another judgment of like effect, and the defendants, still being in default, could not be heard in opposition thereto. Title Insurance Co. v. King Land Co., supra.

However, if it be considered that the application of July 14, 1925, was the first application made, and that it was timely made under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, and included a motion to vacate the default as well as the judgment, still we think the court's order denying relief to defendants was correct.

[3, 4] The granting or denying of a motion of this character is so largely a matter of discretion with the trial court that, unless it is clearly made to appear that there has been an abuse of this discretion, this court will decline to set aside the trial court's order. Nicoll v. Weldon, 130 Cal. 666, 63 P. 63; Staley v. O'Day, 22 Cal. App. 149, 133 P. 620; Jones v. Southern Pacific Co., 71 Cal. App. 773, 236 P. 336; Jergins v. Schenck, 162 Cal. 747, 124 P. 426; Savage v. Smith, 170 Cal. 472, 150 P. 353; Waite v. Southern Pacific Co., 192 Cal. 467, 221 P. 204; Brasher v. White, 53 Cal. App. 545, 200 P. 657; Toon v. Pickwick Stages, 66 Cal. App. 450, 226 P. 628; Rahn v. Peterson, 63 Cal. App. 199, 218 P. 464; Park v. Hillman, 67 Cal. App. 92, 224 P. 100; Sofuye v. Pieters-Wheeler Seed Co., 62 Cal. App. 198, 216 P. 990. But before the court can be called upon to exercise a discretion to relieve a defendant from a default under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, at least two things must be made to appear, to wit: (1) The defendant must present to the court a reasonable excuse, based upon one of the statutory grounds of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, why he did not appear within the time provided by law; (2) that, if permitted to appear, he has a meritorious defense to plaintiff's cause of action upon the merits—or, in other words, the party in default must show both good cause for the delay and a meritorious defense before he can call upon a court for relief. Neither of these essential elements was shown to the trial court in this case. An examination of the record, including the affidavits and the proposed answer, shows that the only matters upon which defendants rely in support of either phase of this twofold showing are: (1) The denial in the proposed answer for lack of "sufficient knowledge or information upon which to base a belief" of the nonpayment of the note, upon the theory that possibly the executor of the Ott will may have made payments on the note without defendants' knowledge; (2) the entry of the decree of distribution in the Knapp estate two days before the commencement of this action, distributing the note in question to the ward and minor son of plaintiff, coupled with the averment in defendants' affidavits to the effect that they did not know of the entry of the decree of distribution in the Knapp estate until after their default had been entered.

[5] Section 437 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not permit such a traverse of a positive allegation in a verified complaint. Under this section, the only time when such an allegation may be denied, other than positively, is when a defendant has no "information or belief upon the subject sufficient to enable him to answer," in which case he may so state in his answer and base his denial upon that ground. It is clear that the denial in the proposed answer is insufficient. The answer does not state that defendants have "no belief" upon the subject of payment.

In the case of Turner v. Watkins, 36 Cal. App. 503, 172 P. 620, the court said:

> "It will be observed that the denials in the answer in this action were predicated upon a lack of information only and not upon a lack of information and belief. A denial in that form is insufficient, for section 437 permits a denial only upon the want of both information and belief and not upon a want of information alone."

[6, 7] Furthermore, a defendant may not deny, for lack of information and belief, matters as to which he has knowledge or which are presumptively within his knowledge. The rule is also well established that, when the existence of an alleged fact may be ascertained from an inspection of a public record, its existence cannot be put in issue by a denial based solely upon information and belief. Wm. Wilson Co. v. Trainor, 27 Cal. App. 43, 148 P. 954; Art Metal Const. Co. v. Anderson Co., 182 Cal. 33, 186 P. 776. In this case it is not even stated whether or not any moneys ever became due to either of the defendants from the Ott estate, and, if so, whether or not they have tried to ascertain if any payments were made by the executor on the obligation in question. The proof shows that defendants never, until the time of the filing of the proposed answer, questioned the balance claimed to be due on the note. Defendants knew of the filing of the action as early as November 6, 1924, when summons was served upon them, and they were then apprised of the exact amount of the demand; they knew of the entry of the default, according to the affidavit of Belle Ott Nelson, as early as February 1, 1925, yet five months after that time, and on July 14, 1925, they verified the proposed answer containing this evasive and frivolous denial. If there was money available for payment, and the remotest possibility that any such payment had been made, they had ample time within which to investigate and acquaint themselves with the facts. If they made such an investigation and for some unusual reason they were unable to learn the facts, they should have so stated in their answer.

In Zany v. Rawhide Gold Mining Co., 15 Cal. App. 373, 114 P. 1026, the court used this language, which is particularly appropriate in the case at bar:

> "The assumption that defendant had no positive knowledge as to all these matters is opposed to common observation and experience. If a defendant does know the facts, and lacks the courage or the candor to declare them, he can not expect any consideration from a court of justice. If, when he is served with the complaint, he is actually ignorant of any material fact which he ought to know, it is his duty to become informed before he files his answer. Mendocino County v. Peters, 2 Cal. App. 28, 82 P. 1122."

It is readily apparent that defendants have no defense whatever to plaintiff's cause of action, and have made no showing of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, as contemplated by section 473, Code of Civil Procedure.

[8] The plaintiff is the father and also the guardian of Guy Haarer Brooks, the distributee of the Knapp estate, and the owner of the note in question, and, if there was any defect in the designation of the party plaintiff, it was certainly harmless as far as defendants were concerned.

If the entire matter be considered as within the discretion of the trial court, we are of the opinion that the court's discretion was properly exercised in denying relief to defendants.

[9] The appellants lay great stress upon the fact that the judgment was not entered until June 19, 1925, when the default was entered November 29, 1924. This delay in no way prejudiced the rights of the plaintiff, and conferred no rights upon the defendants, whose default had been regularly entered and had not been vacated. Christerson v. French, supra.

Other contentions made by defendants are without merit, and do not require discussion. We think that there is no merit whatever in the appeal.

The order and judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PLATT v. OKAMOTO. (Civ. No. 5541.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 5, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1008(1)—Whether evidence conclusively showed plaintiff was contributorily negligent held for trial court from all evidence before it.

In action for damages to plaintiff's automobile caused by collision with defendant's truck, question whether testimony conclusively showed plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence held for trial court to determine from all evidence in case before it.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)—Defendant introducing no evidence of plaintiff's contributory negligence could not complain of trial court's failure to find on issue when finding, if made, would have been adverse.

Where defendant sued for injuries resulting from collision between plaintiff's automobile with defendant's truck did not introduce any evidence to show contributory negligence by plaintiff, and there was not sufficient evidence in record before Court of Appeal to show such contributory negligence, defendant could not complain on appeal that trial court failed to render finding against him on such issue, when it is apparent that such finding, if made, would have been against defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge pro tem.

Action by Lawrence T. Platt against C. Okamoto. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Randall & Bartlett and A. P. G. Steffes, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Voltaire Perkins, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. The appellant asked for a reversal of a judgment rendered for damages to the automobile of plaintiff, caused by a collision with the rear end of the truck of the appellant, on three grounds:

First. That the evidence was insufficient to show that any negligence on the part of the defendant was the proximate cause of the accident in question, but that, on the contrary, the testimony of plaintiff, by which he is bound, conclusively proved that there was no causal relation between the negligence of defendant and the collision.

Second. That the testimony of plaintiff and his own witness conclusively showed that the former was guilty of contributory negligence, which was the proximate cause of the accident in question.

Third. That the court erred in omitting to make a finding of fact upon the question of contributory negligence.

As to the first proposition, there was sufficient evidence in the record to justify the judgment of the trial court.

[1] As to the second, we cannot find wherein the testimony of the plaintiff and his own witness conclusively showed the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. That was a question for the trial court to determine from all of the evidence in the case before it.

[2] As to the third proposition, there was not sufficient evidence in the record for the court to make a finding that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence which proximately contributed to the injury. No evidence was introduced by the appellant to show such contributory negligence, and there is not sufficient evidence in the record before this court to show such contributory negligence, and therefore the appellant cannot be heard here to complain that the trial court failed to render a finding against him upon such issue, when it is apparent that such finding, if made, would have been against the appellant. Spinks v. Clark, 147 Cal. 439, 82 P. 45; Arnaz v. Forbes, 51 Cal. App. 665, at 666, 197 P. 364; Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, at 451, 26 P. 504.

Upon examination of the entire record, we cannot say that the failure to find upon such an issue has resulted in any miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

NORMAN v. DE BOTILLER. (Civ. No. 5420.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 6, 1928.

1. Bills and notes 🔑517—Defendant's denial to signing note sued on created conflict constituting sufficient answer to contention that evidence did not justify finding for defendant.

Where defendant sued on note testified that she did not sign notes, conflict in evidence was presented constituting sufficient answer to plaintiff's contention that evidence was insufficient to justify findings for defendant.

2. New trial 🔑99—New trial held properly denied, where new evidence was cumulative and plaintiff did not exercise diligence in discovering new evidence nor present affidavit of new witness.

In action on notes defended on ground that notes were not signed by defendant, order denying plaintiff's motion for new trial, for new evidence of letters signed by defendant which would establish defendant's signatures to notes, held properly denied, and could not be disturbed on appeal, where it appeared that plaintiff did not exercise diligence in discovering new evidence, that no affidavit was presented by any person by whom facts constituting new evidence were proposed to be established, and that evidence was merely cumulative.

3. Appeal and error 🔑977(1)—New trial 🔑6—Grant or refusal of new trial is within court's discretion, not reversible unless abused.

Grant or refusal of new trial is within trial court's discretion, not to be disturbed unless abused.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by Mary Norman against Ynes B. De Botiller. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George W. Wright, of Los Angeles (Hugh Foster, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Edw. F. Wehrle, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. Action brought by distributee of an estate on two promissory notes alleged to have been executed by defendant. The answer denied the allegations of the complaint, particularly with reference to the execution by defendant of either of the notes in question. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals.

[1] On the trial defendant testified that she did not sign either of the notes, thereby presenting a conflict in the evidence—which fact under the well-known rule relating to appeals, constitutes a sufficient answer to appellant's contention that the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings and the judgment.

Appellant also urges the point that the trial court erred in denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The said motion was based upon alleged facts contained within affidavits made respectively by plaintiff and a witness who was present and testified at the trial of the action. By such affidavits it was made to appear that if a new trial were granted, by the use of certain letters purporting to have been signed by defendant, plaintiff would be able to establish the signature of defendant to the notes upon which the action was brought. However, no affidavit was presented to the court by any witness by whom such fact was proposed to be established. Other than the bare statement that after the trial of the action the so-called "new evidence" had come to the knowledge of plaintiff, "which ordinary prudence, care and diligence could not have discovered prior to the trial of the action," neither of the affidavits contained any showing of diligence to produce such evidence at the time the trial occurred.

The counter affidavit of defendant showed that, in addition to the denials of the allegations of the plaintiff, contained in the answer of defendant, plaintiff had actual notice in ample time prior to the trial that defendant denied that she signed either of the promissory notes in question; also, that in all probability the evidence by which plaintiff expected to establish the fact that the signature to the notes was that of defendant was just as available to plaintiff before the trial occurred as it was after that event.

[2, 3] Without reference to other apparently good reasons therefor, it satisfactorily appearing that plaintiff did not exercise due care and diligence in discovering the "new evidence" to which attention has been directed; that no affidavit was presented by any person by whom the facts constituting such "new evidence" were proposed to be established; that at most such "new evidence" would have been cumulative in character and effect; that, considering the grounds of the motion, the decision thereof rested within the sound discretion of the court; and that no abuse of discretion of the court is shown—it follows that the order denying such motion cannot be disturbed on appeal.

BROWN v. SWEET. (Civ. 4825.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 22, 1928.

1. Pleading 🔑18—Material matters in pleadings must be distinctly stated in ordinary and concise language.

It is a general rule of pleading that material matters must be distinctly stated in ordinary and concise language, and may not be left to inference.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑341(2)—Defendant's proof that he conveyed undivided shares in land, under answer alleging that he had conveyed "other and different lands," held inadmissible as constituting "material variance;" "land;" "title in fee" (Code Civ. Proc. § 471).

In action to recover money had and received, based on defendant's failure to convey real estate as agreed, defendant under answer alleging that he had conveyed "other and different lands" was not entitled to prove that he had conveyed to plaintiff an undivided interest or shares in land, since such proof amounted to a material variance, under Code Civ. Proc. § 471; "land" being distinguished from an estate or undivided interest therein; "title in fee" carrying with it absolute dominion and disposal of property.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Material Variance; Second Series, Title in Fee; First, Second and Third Series, Land.]

3. Judgment 🔑251(2)—Defendant's recovery, as well as plaintiff's, is dependent on case made by his pleadings.

Defendant's recovery, as well as plaintiff's, must be on case made by his pleadings and not on the case which may be developed by the proofs.

4. Pleading 🔑127(2)—Answer admitting that defendant agreed to convey, and did convey, certain real property, admitted allegation of complaint that defendant agreed to convey particular 10-acre tract.

Where complaint alleged that defendant agreed to convey 10 acres of land, answer which admitted agreement to convey certain real property, and that property had been conveyed, did not deny that defendant had agreed to convey the 10 acres mentioned in the complaint, and allegation of complaint was therefore admitted.

5. Vendor and purchaser 🔑341(3)—Defendant, sued for failure to convey land, failed to prove conveyance of land as alleged, where land conveyed was not described and deed covering undivided interest was introduced without evidence of plaintiff's acceptance (Code Civ. Proc. § 471).

In action to recover money received by defendant under promise to convey lands, in which defendant admitted agreement to convey, but alleged that he had conveyed all the lands covered by the agreement, held, that there was a failure of proof on defendant's part, under Code Civ. Proc. § 471, where the land covered by the agreement was not described and there was no evidence of plaintiff's agreement to accept an undivided interest in lands which was described in deed introduced by defendant.

6. Trial 🔑396(7)—Finding, contrary to admission of defendant's answer, that defendant never agreed to convey property, held error.

In action to recover moneys received by defendant under his agreement to convey real estate, in which defendant in his answer admitted the agreement which plaintiff claimed had been broken, court's finding that there was no agreement between the parties for the conveyance of the property in question held error.

7. Evidence 🔑23(2)—Court takes judicial notice of location of land conveyed with reference to town in which it was to be located under agreement.

Court takes judicial notice of location of land described by township and range, with reference to town in which land conveyed was to be situated under agreement.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1010(2)—Findings in favor of party as to whom there has been total failure of proof must be disregarded (Code Civ. Proc. § 471).

Where there has been total failure of proof within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 471, findings in favor of party whose proof failed must be disregarded.

9. Vendor and purchaser 🔑341(3)—In action to recover moneys paid under promise to convey, deeds in defendant's possession at time of trial, received by plaintiff after commencement of suit, were inadmissible for want of delivery and acceptance.

In purchaser's action to recover moneys received by vendor under promise to convey, deeds introduced in evidence by defendant covering undivided interest in land were inadmissible for want of delivery, or acceptance, where they were in possession of defendant at the time of the trial, and where defendant sent them to plaintiff only after commencement of suit.

10. Specific performance 🔑29(2)—Contract to convey certain town lots not described with reference to location by testimony was void for uncertainty, as regards specific performance.

Contract to convey town lots concerning location of which testimony was indefinite was void for uncertainty, as regards any right of plaintiff to specific performance.

11. Vendor and purchaser 🔑148, 152—Purchaser could reject deeds on ground that they covered different property from that contemplated, and that they were tendered after action had been instituted.

Where deeds were given purchaser covering land other than that which was agreed to be conveyed, purchaser was entitled to refuse acceptance on ground that deeds did not comply with the agreement and also on ground that they were tendered after action had been instituted.

12. Deeds 🔑59(1)—Mere recordation of deed by grantor does not constitute "delivery" (Civ. Code, § 1059).

Mere recordation of deed by grantor does not constitute "delivery"; grantee's assent and acceptance being essential, under Civ. Code, § 1059.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second and Third Series, Deliver; Delivery.]

13. Deeds 🔑54, 64—Deed is void where there is no delivery or acceptance (Civ. Code, § 1059).

Where there is no delivery and acceptance, deed is void, under Civ. Code, § 1059.

14. Deeds 🔑56(7)—Deeds sent grantee covering different property were void for want of delivery and acceptance, where grantee returned them, notwithstanding their recordation at instance of grantor (Civ. Code, § 1059).

Deeds covering different property from that agreed on which were tendered after institution of grantee's action were void for want of delivery and acceptance, under Civ. Code, § 1059, where deeds were returned to grantor, notwithstanding fact that deeds had been recorded at instance of grantor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by Annie Brown against Homer E. Sweet. Judgment for defendant, and from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Lander W. Butterfield, of Pasadena, for appellant.

Turnbull, Heffron & Kelley, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KEETCH, Justice pro tem. In this case the plaintiff and appellant sought to recover the sum of $1,215, money had and received by the defendant, following his alleged failure to convey certain real estate. The trial court gave judgment for the defendant, and the appeal is from the judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial.

It is first urged by appellant that the evidence admitted over his objection was so different in its general scope and meaning from the admissions and allegations of the answer as to amount to a failure of proof within the meaning of section 471, Code of Civil Procedure.

The complaint alleges: (1) That on or about the 24th day of July, 1921, defendant had received from the plaintiff the sum of $550, for which he agreed to convey 60 acres of land, situated in the Antelope Valley, Los Angeles county; (2) that on or about the 22d day of December, 1922, the defendant received the sum of $350, for which he agreed to convey to George Brown, the son of plaintiff, 10 acres of land in the Antelope Valley; (3) that on or about the 18th day of January, 1923, the defendant received a Ford automobile of the value of $300, for which the latter agreed to convey to plaintiff six lots in the town of Lancaster, in the Antelope Valley, and to pay plaintiff the sum of $50 in cash. The complaint further alleges a total failure and refusal to convey the property. The answer admits the receipt of the $550, alleged in the first cause of action, but alleges that at the request of plaintiff defendant conveyed "other and different lands" to her in lieu of the 60 acres; that he received only $220, instead of the $350, as alleged in the second cause of action, and that "he conveyed all the land agreed to be conveyed"; and that as to the third cause of action he admits the receipt of the Ford automobile of the value of $300, but alleges the payment of the $50 in cash to the plaintiff and the conveyance to the plaintiff "of six lots in the town of Lancaster." (Italics ours.)

Appellant, for the purposes of the appeal, waives the question as to the difference between the $350 paid, as alleged in her complaint, and the $220 alleged to have been received by the defendant. She also admits the payment of the $50 cash to her, the plaintiff. It is asserted, therefore, that the only issue under the pleadings when the case went to trial was whether or not the defendant had conveyed the land as alleged by him.

It appears from the evidence of Mrs. Brown that she was a nurse by profession and first met the defendant while nursing a relative of his. She became friendly with him and his family and as the result of his representations to her was induced to pay him the various admitted sums of money for the property in question. These transactions covered a period of more than three years, beginning in 1919. She never saw the property. "He was to show it to me often, but he never did," she testified. As to the character of the land, Mrs. Brown stated it was farming land "then," but that the defendant told her "there would be oil in it in a short time; they were expecting to get oil in it." In reference to taking "other land," as alleged in defendant's answer, in lieu of the 60 acres, she testified that she was to get fifteen lots. She said: "He [defendant] showed me a paper where there was an oil stack on it, and a man standing on it, and he said the land was to be right there and that was sure to be oil, sure." At the request of the defendant, Mrs. Brown said she sold "forty lots" among her friends, for which she was to get a commission. In connection with the transfer of the automobile the plaintiff testified:

> "He wanted to give me land for the whole, but you see I needed some money as he had got it all from me.
> "Q. Did he give you any land for it? A. What he told me was, he had ten acres in Lancaster that belonged to himself, and that he would give me six acres. I says: 'I need the money; you have to give me some money.' He says, 'I will give you this six acres of land and $50.'
> "Q. That was for the automobile? A. For the automobile; and he says, 'I am going to put down a well on that land and there will be nothing but you and I on half shares.'"

The plaintiff testified that she frequently requested the defendant to give her a deed to the property, but that she received only promises. In a letter received in evidence the defendant, under date of January 9, 1920, wrote to the plaintiff:

> "I am going to get your deed this month or just as soon as I can get papers made out, which will be right away. I am in hopes oil will be struck then you will be rich—here's hoping—if you can send me $50 for a short time it will be appreciated."

In January, 1923, at the time she transferred the automobile to defendant, Mrs. Brown said she again asked him for deeds to the property and he said he would send them. Regarding that conversation, she testified:

> "He wanted the receipts back for all the money that I had paid as he could not give me the deeds until I would give him the receipts. * * * I says, 'Why?' He says: 'I have to show them you have the land paid before I can get the deeds.'"

Plaintiff had no further communication or dealings with the defendant except through her attorneys. Throughout the direct testimony of the plaintiff, and as far as is evidenced by the pleadings, the property to be conveyed was referred to as "land," "acres," or "lots," but upon cross-examination of plaintiff counsel for defendant revealed for the first time his contention that by the allegation in the answer that plaintiff agreed to take "certain other lands" was meant "an undivided interest" in other lands. Counsel for the plaintiff objected to the introduction of any such evidence upon the ground that it was not within the issues as framed by the pleadings. It was urged that the answer, while asserting the agreement to take certain other lands in lieu of the 60 acres, expressly admitted the obligation to convey ten lots under the second cause of action and six lots in exchange for the automobile. The court overruled the objection and admitted the evidence. Both parties to this appeal set out at some length the testimony of the plaintiff covering this point, and certain categorical questions and answers thereto give support to respondent's contention that an "undivided interest" was the basis of the agreement, while on the other hand, when taken on redirect examination, the plaintiff reiterated the statement that she was to receive fifteen "lots." Counsel for Mrs. Brown insists that her testimony, taken as a whole, indicates that she was confused over the term "undivided interest," and that the evidence was insufficient, aside from its inadmissibility. As to its insufficiency, however, we can only regard it as a conflict of testimony, which is peculiarly within the province of the trial court to decide and cannot be reviewed here. The fact that the court admitted this testimony and apparently based its findings upon it is the point presented by appellant that it was not within the issues as framed by the pleadings, and that "respondent's evidence was so different in its general scope and meaning from the allegations of his defense as to amount to a failure of proof within the meaning of section 471 of the Code of Civil Procedure." That section reads as follows:

> "What not deemed to be a variance. Where, however, the allegation of the claim or defense to which the proof is directed, is unproved, not in some particular or particulars only, but in its general scope and meaning, it is not to be deemed a case of variance, within the last two sections [469 and 470], but a failure of proof." (Italics ours.)

Upon the first cause of action the court found that the original agreement between the parties for the 60 acres had been canceled and in lieu thereof "the defendant Homer E. Sweet should and would convey to Annie Brown a 15/400 interest in and to said 40-acre tract of prospective oil land," and agreed with the defendant that said conveyance should be made at such time as Homer E. Sweet was in a position to obtain title to the said 40-acre tract. The court also found that prior to the commencement of the action the defendant made, executed, and delivered to the plaintiff a deed covering the 15/400 interest in said tract of land, and that the consideration for the $550 had been fully paid for by the conveyance of the property.

No testimony was given nor is any description of the land referred to in the finding of the court to be discovered anywhere in the record, except in the deed referred to as having been delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff and about which we shall have more to say later.

[1, 2] It is urged by appellant that respondent's sole defense to the first cause of action stated in the complaint was that he had conveyed "other and different lands" to plaintiff (referring to the substitution of other land for the 60 acres), whereas the proof offered by defendant went to show a conveyance of "an undivided interest," or shares in land. This calls for a definition of what is ordinarily meant by the word "land."

It may be regarded as elementary that the word "land" may and does include an estate or interest in the land. Indeed, as stated in Fish v. Fowlie, 58 Cal. 373, it "embraces all titles, legal or equitable, perfect or imperfect (Leese v. Clark, 20 Cal. 387), including such rights as lie in contract—those which are executory as well as those which are executed." But it has various meanings in the law as applied to the subject-matter involved, and for this reason the use of the word should be interpreted in the light of its ordinary meaning as so employed. This is particularly true, it seems to us, in the matter of pleading, when the matters at issue are required to be set forth in "ordinary and concise language." It is a general rule that material matters must be distinctly stated, and may not be left to inference to be drawn from doubtful or obscure language. 21 Cal. Jur. 42, citing Campbell v. Jones, 38 Cal. 507; Moore v. Besse, 30 Cal. 570, and Stringer v. Davis, 30 Cal. 318. In the case of Wood v. Anderson et al., 199 Cal. 440, 249 P. 862, the court said:

> "Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the appellant, as we must do on an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit, we are nevertheless confronted by the well-established rule that a contract, particularly one for the conveyance of real property, will not be enforced by a court of equity unless it contains all the material terms and also expresses each in a sufficiently definite manner [citing authorities]." (Italics ours.)

In view of this the question arises: Did the pleadings in the instant case, taken as a whole, indicate to the plaintiff the defense which she would be required to meet as one of the material issues, namely, an undivided interest in certain lands instead of the whole interest, as represented by the allegations of the complaint in terms of "lots," "acres," and "land"? We do not think so.

Title in fee to a lot, acre, or parcel of land carries with it the absolute dominion over it and the disposal of it. It is obvious that an undivided interest or limited estate in the land is a very different thing. "The land is one thing," says Plowden, "and the estate in the land is another thing, for an estate in the land is a time in the land, or land for a time." In the case of Hillyard v. Banchor, 85 Kan. 516, 118 P. 67, the court said:

> "The word 'interest' when applied to property has a variable meaning to be determined in any case by the context, intention and circumstances. It may be used as synonymous with 'estate' or 'title' or it may be used to denote something less than an estate or title."

The meaning of this word as used in an insurance policy was determined in Garner v.

Milwaukee Mechanics' Insurance Co., 73 Kan. 127, 84 P. 717, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 654, 117 Am. St. Rep. 460, 9 Ann. Cas. 459. A clause in the policy provided for forfeiture in case of change (with some exceptions) in "the interest, title or possession" of the property insured. It was said:

> "The word 'interest' as used in the policy is not synonymous with title. It means some right different from title. It cannot mean a greater estate than title, since 'title' as there used was intended to mean the entire estate. It must therefore have been used with the meaning generally attached to it, when used in contradistinction to title—as 'any right, in the nature of property, less than title.'"

In McDonald v. Bayard Sav. Bank, 123 Iowa, 413, 98 N. W. 1025, it is said:

> "'An interest' in land is the legal concern of a person in the thing or property, or in the right to some of the benefits or uses from which the property is inseparable."

Applying these definitions to the instant case, it would seem that the plaintiff, having pleaded that she bargained for the whole of a lot or parcel of land, and defendant's only answer thereto being that the agreement was to convey "certain other lands," counsel for plaintiff was entitled to assume, as he did, that according to the ordinary meaning of the language as thus used the only issue presented was as to certain other "lots," "acres," or "land," and the whole thereof, and not a part or undivided interest therein or something less than title to the whole. In other words, the pleadings presented one thing as an issue for trial and the defendant tendered proof of another thing.

[3] In Gillin v. Hopkins, 28 Cal. App. 582, 153 P. 725, where the defendant was sued for a specific amount of money and it appeared from the proof that he was to receive certain shares of stock by way of commission or the value of them, the court said:

> "The differences between the contract as alleged in the complaint and the proofs adduced by plaintiffs are so pronounced as to bring the case within the rule announced in section 471 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

Nor can the admissions of the plaintiff avail the defendant when such admissions are outside the pleadings as framed between the parties. As was said in Hicks v. Murray, 43 Cal. 515, 522:

> "It has so often been determined that unless the facts essential to the support of the case be alleged upon the record, evidence upon such omitted facts cannot be heard or considered, that a citation of authority upon the point is unnecessary. Evidence of facts, or stipulations as to the facts of a case, cannot make the case broader than it appears by allegation, nor can a party by mere force of facts admitted or proven become entitled to relief to which he would not have been entitled had his case been resisted only by general demurrer interposed to the pleadings upon which he relies."

If it were a fact that the plaintiff here agreed to accept an undivided interest instead of an absolute ownership in 60 acres, a plain allegation to that effect in the answer would have presented a plain issue and a valid defense. In McCord v. Martin, 47 Cal. App. 717, 723, 191 P. 89, 91, it was said that—

> "It is well settled by a long line of decisions in this state that 'the plaintiff must recover, if at all, upon the case made by the pleadings, and not upon a case which may be developed by the proofs'"—citing Kredo v. Phelps, 145 Cal. 526, 78 P. 1044.

We do not understand the rule to be any different when applied to a defendant.

[4, 5] In reference to the second cause of action the court finds that the defendant had received the sum of $220 "as part of the purchase price of 20/100 part, to wit, an undivided one-fifth interest in the Northwest quarter of the Southwest quarter of the Southwest quarter of Sect. Eighteen, Township Eight North, Range Eleven West, S. B. M., County of Los Angeles, State of California." It also finds that the sum of $220, "together with the price of the automobile, less $50 cash," was the consideration for the one-fifth interest, and that the defendant executed and delivered a deed to the plaintiff, "but through an error the real description of the property was not correctly inserted in the deed, and that a new deed has now been executed by the defendant." (Our italics.) The complaint as to this cause of action alleges that "the defendant agreed to convey to plaintiff's son, George Brown, ten acres of land in the said Antelope Valley." The defendant answered as follows:

> "This defendant admits that for the sum of $220 he was to convey and agreed to convey to the plaintiff certain real property, which property has been by him conveyed to the plaintiff. The defendant denies that he has refused to convey the land, or any land to the plaintiff, and alleges that all of the land agreed to be conveyed by the defendant to the plaintiff has been by him so conveyed." (Italics ours.)

This is not a specific denial, or any denial, that he, the defendant, had agreed to convey 10 acres of land, and failure to deny admits the allegation. Furthermore, we do not find any evidence whatever of any agreement on the part of Mrs. Brown or her son to purchase or accept "a 20/100 part, to wit, an undivided one-fifth interest in" the land, as set forth in the finding of the court. Neither in the pleadings nor in the testimony admitted is there to be found any legal description of whatever property might have been the subject of the agreements between the parties, except as stated in the deeds in the possession of defendant himself and offered by him at the trial. Incidentally we may also say that we can find no evidence whatever in the record to justify the finding that the automobile was a part of the consideration for the alleged interest. The automobile transaction is covered by the third cause of action, and the plaintiff testified that she was to receive 6 acres of land for it. As far as we can ascertain from the record, the only basis for the finding of the court as to any of the undivided interests specifically mentioned in the findings comes from the deeds referred to and received in evidence over objection. The pleading was as to 10 acres, in this cause of action. It would seem unnecessary to say that the deed, even assuming it admissible for any purpose, would not of itself be evidence of the agreement between the parties. As we see it, therefore, there was an entire failure of proof as contended for by the plaintiff under section 471, Code of Civil Procedure, and the finding was, as plaintiff contends, inconsistent with the admissions of the answer and the defense alleged.

[6, 7] In the third cause of action the plaintiff alleged that the defendant received from plaintiff "one Ford automobile of the value of $300 for which the defendant agreed to convey to plaintiff six lots of land in the town of Lancaster, County of Los Angeles," etc. In answer to this the defendant alleged that "he received of and from the plaintiff the Ford automobile referred to in plaintiff's complaint, for which he agreed to convey six lots in the town of Lancaster * * * and said lands have been conveyed to the plaintiff." In the face of these pleadings—after finding that the value of the automobile, namely, was part of the consideration for the alleged conveyance of the one-fifth interest described in the second cause of action, for which, as stated, we find no evidence in support—the court further finds:

> "That there was no agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant by which the defendant agreed to convey to plaintiff said lots of land in the town of Lancaster, to wit, six lots of land, or any other agreement other than as herein found."

Again we find the record entirely silent in support of any such conclusion. But even assuming there was something in the testimony of the parties to give support to that finding, it would be entirely contrary to and outside of the pleadings. If the conclusions we have reached in reference to the other causes of action are open to question, there can be none here. The agreement to convey six lots in the town of Lancaster is specifically pleaded, and the answer specifically admits the agreement to convey six lots in the town of Lancaster, and, furthermore, that he had so conveyed. There was here no allegation of any other agreement in the pleadings as was suggested in the other causes of action. That the court found something entirely foreign to and outside the pleadings is here beyond question. "It was error for the court to find in favor of defendant" referred to "upon an allegation of the complaint which he did not deny." Tracy v. Craig, 55 Cal. 91. The only issue raised was whether or not the defendant had conveyed the six lots in the town of Lancaster, and the only evidence we find touching that issue—assuming for the moment its admissibility—is found in another deed offered by the defendant and received in evidence. This deed purports to convey to the plaintiff the following described property:

> "The twenty one-hundredths (20/100 part, share, interest or quarter of the Northwest quarter 1/4 of the Southwest (1/4) of the Southwest Quarter, Twn. Eight (8) North Range 11, West, S. B. M. All in said County of Los Angeles," etc.

It becomes apparent that this description was lacking in an important particular, namely, the number of the section, and the court allowed it to be amended to read "section 18." In this particular it is pointed out by appellant that this court may take judicial cognizance of the fact that the land so described is not in the town of Lancaster. Faekler v. Wright, 86 Cal. 210, 24 P. 996. We take judicial notice, therefore, after consultation of maps, that the description as corrected places the land about three miles south and east of the town of Lancaster.

[8] We have found it necessary to go into these matters at some length because of the record before us. We are of the opinion that the contention of appellant that there has been a total failure of proof within the general scope and meaning of section 471 must be sustained. It follows, therefore, that the findings must be disregarded. Hicks v. Murray, supra; Ortega v. Cordero, 88 Cal. 224, 26 P. 80; Burnett v. Stearns, 33 Cal. 469; Gregory v. Nelson, 41 Cal. 279. In the case of Schirmer v. Drexler, 134 Cal. 134, 66 P. 180, cited by appellant, the court said:

> "The decree attempts to enforce the specific performance of a contract which is not only not set up in the complaint, but to which no reference is made anywhere in the pleadings. * * * Here the issues as made by the pleadings sustain no degree of kinship whatever to the findings and decree, and are, besides, in direct conflict with the allegations of the complaint. * * * If this kind of a judgment can be upheld on this kind of a record, then written pleadings are no longer necessary, and may well be dispensed with altogether."

[9] Aside from the inadmissibility of the evidence under the pleadings, appellant contends that there was neither a delivery to nor an acceptance by the plaintiff of the deeds already referred to and which, as far as the record shows, afford the only evidence of the legal descriptions of the undivided interests set out by the court in its findings. That they were not accepted is evidenced by the fact that at the time of the trial they were in the possession of the defendant and offered by him. According to the testimony of Mrs. Brown, already referred to, it was in January, 1923, when she last requested the defendant to send her the deeds, but that he failed to do so, and suit for the return of the money was filed May 23, 1923. There is some testimony given by the defendant on cross-examination, in answer to the question why he did not deliver the deed as promised, that "there were installments or monthly payments being made [presumably by him] which had to be completed before the deed could be executed," and that Mrs. Brown so understood it. Even assuming there is a conflict of evidence on this point as to the time of delivery, the fact remains that there was no acceptance by the plaintiff, the reasons for which would sufficiently appear from all the facts and circumstances to which we have called attention. It appears from the record that one of the deeds was recorded May 18, 1923, or five days before the filing of the action, and that the other was filed for record on June 1, 1923. These deeds were received by Mrs. Brown either through the mail or through her attorneys after they were recorded. Mr. Butterfield, counsel for Mrs. Brown, took the witness stand and testified that one of the deeds was brought to him in August or September following the filing of suit, and that the other, recorded on the same day the answer was filed, June 1, was received through the mails from the recorder's office several weeks after the answer had been filed.

[10] We already have had occasion to point out that one of the deeds when presented in court was found to be defective in the legal description of the property, and the court ruled that another deed with the correct description should be delivered to plaintiff. We have also noted that there is no evidence of the character, quantity, or location of the land ascertainable from the pleadings or from the testimony of the parties, outside of the deeds themselves. The testimony of Mrs. Brown as to the location of the land she was to receive is decidedly hazy, with the exception of that with reference to the six lots, which she definitely stated were described to her as being in the town of Lancaster. The deed offered by the defendant to cover this transaction apparently gives the description of a piece of property which, as we have pointed out, is not within three miles of Lancaster. Upon this state of facts it is evident that there are none of the essential elements of definiteness and certainty as to the subject matter upon which a contract could be based, and it is therefore void for uncertainty. In Wood v. Anderson, supra, the court said:

> "Viewing the evidence in this light the alleged contract falls far short of that degree of certainty which is essential to justify a court of equity in decreeing its specific performance. It is indefinite as to the land to be conveyed, the time, place and conditions of payment of the purchase price, and, in fact, as to the amount of the purchase price itself. The question is not one of conflict between the testimony of the appellant and that of the respondent, but it is one of such uncertainty and indefiniteness in appellant's testimony concerning the terms and conditions of the alleged contract as would require the court to indulge in mere conjecture and speculation in order to arrive at the intent of the parties."

This language is peculiarly applicable to the instant case.

[11-14] If the contentions of the plaintiff are correct, she was justified in refusing to accept the deeds, first, upon the ground that they conveyed to her something entirely different from what she had agreed to take, and, second, that they were tendered after the action had been instituted. In Wilcox v. Lattin, 93 Cal. 595, 29 P. 228, it was held that—

> "The tender of a deed by the defendant to the plaintiffs subsequent to the commencement of the action, even if such deed had been sufficient to transfer the title, did not revive the contract."

Again, the mere recordation of the deed by the defendant and respondent was not a delivery. In a case in the Supreme Court of the United States (Parmelee v. Simpson, 5 Wall. 81, 86, 18 L. Ed. 542), where it was held that the placing of a deed on record, the grantee being ignorant of its execution and not having authorized or given his assent to the record, did not operate as a delivery so as to give the grantee precedence over a mortgage executed between registration and a formal subsequent delivery, Mr. Justice Davis said:

> "The placing of the deed on record was Bovey's own act, and done without the assent of Simpson. Under this state of facts there was manifestly no delivery. The execution and registration of a deed, and delivery of it to the register for that purpose, does not vest the title in the grantee." Devlin, Deeds, vol. 1, § 291, p. 497.

Nor does the recording of a deed to such person constitute delivery without acceptance. In Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 547, 4 P. 473, 8 P. 46, 56 Am. Rep. 726, it was held that the delivery of a deed to a stranger for the benefit of the grantee is deemed to be a constructive delivery only when his assent thereto or facts which authorize a presumption of such assent are shown. On page 557 (4 P. 479) the court said:

> "The statute (Civ. Code, § 1059) does not recognize a delivery as perfected until an assent is proved either by act or by presumption. And when reliance is placed on a presumptive assent, how can such presumptive assent be found to the delivery of a paper, until all the facts are known to the grantee?"

In the instant case the deeds were returned to the defendant upon the advice of plaintiff's counsel. In Rasmussen v. Stanfield, 49 S. D. 120, 206 N. W. 475, the grantee named in the deed was advised by his attorney not to accept it. The deed was returned to the grantor. It was held that there had been no delivery and no acceptance. "A deed must be delivered before it becomes valid, and the court should hold, as matter of law, that there was no deed, when facts show no delivery. * * * Acceptance is necessary to the validity of a deed." Brandenburg et al. v. Botner et al., 221 Ky. 7, 297 S. W. 702.

Other grounds of appeal are presented by appellant, but in view of the conclusions we have reached it is not necessary to discuss them here. The motion for a new trial should have been granted.

Judgment reversed.

PETROLEUM MIDWAY CO., Limited, v. MOYNIER et al.★

MOYNIER et ux. v. MOYNIER et al.

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 17, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank Jan. 14, 1929.

1. Mines and minerals 🔑79(7)—Evidence sustained finding that separate lot owners, executing oil lease, were each entitled only to royalties from oil produced on his own lots.

Evidence held to sustain finding that owners in severalty of particular lots in tract, who together executed oil lease thereon, were each entitled only to royalties from his own lots under original lease, silent as to distribution of royalties, as modified by extension agreement limiting owners to royalties from wells on their own lots and supplemental agreement which superseded and canceled previous extension and amendments.

2. Evidence 🔑450(4)—Parol evidence held admissible to explain distribution of royalties under oil lease executed by several lot owners, as modified by extension and supplemental agreements (Civ. Code, § 1431; Code Civ. Proc. § 1860).

Oil lease covering entire tract, executed by owners in severalty of lots, and silent as to distribution of royalties among the owners, which was modified by extension agreements limiting owner of each lot to royalties from wells produced thereon, and permitting sale of part of leased premises, and by subsequent supplemental agreement superseding and canceling previous extensions and amendments, held so uncertain as to disposition of royalties as to render admissible parol evidence to show parties' intention as to participation therein, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1860, though lease as originally drawn might be strictly joint lease, under Civ. Code, § 1431.

3. Contracts 🔑169—Contract should be construed with respect to situation of parties at time it was made.

Contract should be construed in light of surrounding circumstances and with respect to situation of parties at time contract was entered into.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1050(1)—Admission of parol evidence to show intention of parties under original lease was not prejudicial, where such intention was demonstrated by subsequent modifications thereof.

Where original oil lease was modified by subsequent agreement of parties, so that lessors, as owners of separate lots, were entitled only to royalties from wells on their respective lots, admission of parol evidence to show that such was the intention of the parties under the original lease, if error, was not prejudicial.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Interpleader action by the Petroleum Midway Company, Limited, against Marius Moynier and others, in which certain defendants filed a cross-complaint. From an adverse judgment, certain other defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Milton M. Cohen and Jerome H. Kann, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. Wiseman Macdonald, of Los Angeles, for cross-complainants respondents.

Morgrage, Stanley & O'Brien, of Los Angeles, for plaintiff respondent.

CURTIS, J. This proceeding was instituted to require the respondents Marius and Adrienne Moynier, husband and wife, and appellants Emile and Marie Moynier, husband and wife, and Abel and Jerondine Moynier, husband and wife, to interplead as to their respective rights in certain royalties received from the operation of oil wells drilled upon lands belonging to said respondent Marius Moynier. Both the appellants and respondents appeared in said action, and by proper and appropriate pleadings set forth their respective claims to said royalties. Respondents contended that they were the owners of and entitled to receive all of said royalties from plaintiff, while the appellants contended that said royalties belonged to both appellants and respondents in the proportion of one-third to respondents, one-third to appellants Abel Moynier and his wife, Jerondine Moynier, and one-third to Emile Moynier and his wife, Marie Moynier.

The respondent Marius Moynier and the appellants Abel and Emile Moynier are brothers, and were the owners in common of a certain tract of land containing something over 100 acres of land. While such owners they subdivided said land, under the name of the Moynier tract, into 10 lots, and by conveyances executed among themselves they became the owners in severalty of the lots in said tract as follows: Marius became the owner of lots 2, 9, and 10, containing 34.73 acres; Emile became the owner of lots 1, 5, and 6, containing 34.73 acres; and Abel became the owner of lots 3, 4, 7, and 8, containing 34.73. While they were the owners in severalty of the respective lots in said tract, as just set forth, they, with their respective wives, entered into a lease of the whole of said property with A. M. Parsons on the 9th day of May, 1921. Said lease is what is known as an "oil lease," and by the terms thereof said Parsons was given the right to drill and prospect for oil and other mineral products upon said tract, in consideration whereof Parsons agreed to pay to the lessors the sum of $2 per acre per month until drilling operations thereon were begun, and upon the discovery and production of oil from said land a royalty of one-sixth of the oil produced thereon. By the terms of this lease Parsons was to commence the actual work of constructing and erecting a drilling rig upon said land within one year from the time title to the land upon which the first oil well was to be drilled had been satisfactorily shown to be in said lessors. It was provided in this lease that "all rent and royalties hereunder shall be made to the credit of lessors at the office of Sentous Realty Company in the city of Los Angeles, California, and such payments shall constitute full compliance with the terms hereof, and relieve the lessee of obligation to see to distribution of such rent and royalties." The time within which work should be commenced under said lease was on May 19, 1922, by a written agreement, executed by all of the parties thereto, extended, and in said agreement of extension it was agreed that lots 5 and 7, which had been sold by their respective owners since the execution of the original lease, should be excluded from the operation of the lease. It was further provided in this extension agreement that the clause of the original lease allowing a well to be drilled on the division line of any two lots in said tract should be abrogated, and that each well should be drilled wholly on one lot, and the owner of that lot should be the only participant in the royalty from such well. A second agreement, extending further the time in which said lessee was to begin work under said lease, was executed by all of the parties thereto on March 31, 1923. In this second extension agreement it was agreed that the monthly rental should be $500 per month, instead of $2 per acre per month, and it was further provided therein that the lessors were authorized to sell any portion of the leased land, except for oil development, and in case of any such sale or sales the land so sold should be excluded from the terms of the lease.

On April 24, 1924, the appellants and respondents entered into a supplemental agreement, the terms of which were substantially the same as those contained in the agreement granting the second extension as hereinbefore set out, except that the supplemental agreement contained a paragraph, numbered 4 therein, which was not contained in the second extension agreement. This paragraph reads as follows: "Except as above, the said lease shall remain unchanged, and all previous extensions and amendments of said lease are superseded and canceled hereby."

On the 11th day of June, 1924, the appellants and respondents joined in a letter to the Associated Oil Company, which company had become the owner of said lease. In this letter said parties directed that the payment of said monthly rental should be made direct to the respective owners of said lots, as follows: To Marius Moynier, $247.18; to Abel Moynier, $120.82; and to Emile Moynier, $132. Said letter closed with the statement that, "except as herein modified, all the terms, covenants and conditions of said lease and said supplemental agreement shall remain in full force and effect."

Said lease was thereafter assigned to the plaintiff herein, and the royalties which are made the subject of this controversy are those arising from oil produced by plaintiff from wells drilled in pursuance of said lease upon lot 9 of said Moynier tract, the owner of which is Marius Moynier, one of the respondents herein. The trial court held that respondent Marius Moynier was the owner of said lots 2, 9, and 10 of said tract, and that appellants had no interest in said lots; that respondents were entitled to receive all royalties to be paid to the lessors under said original lease, in so far as said lease applied to or affected said lots 2, 9, and 10; and that appellants were not entitled to any of said royalties and had no interest therein. From the judgment awarding said royalties to respondents, the appellants have appealed.

[1] It is appellants' contention that the lease of the premises involved herein is a joint undertaking, and that the rights of the parties to said lease are joint, and not several, and therefore that each of the lessors is the owner and entitled to receive an equal part or portion of all royalties which may accrue under said lease. On the other hand, it is the contention of respondents that, as the several lots which were the subject of said lease were owned in severalty by the respective lessors, each owner was to receive exclusively all royalties from his own lands. The trial court held that the lease, as finally modified by the parties thereto, was uncertain, in that it did not specify the amounts or proportions in which the royalties were to be distributed and paid to the several lessors, and over the objections of appellants admitted parol evidence to show the intention of the parties in respect to the distribution and payment of said royalties.

Without going into any extended review of the evidence thus admitted by the court, we are satisfied that, if said evidence was properly admitted, it shows beyond question that it was the intention of the parties to said lease, at least after the execution of the first extension agreement already referred to, that each owner of lots embraced within said lease should be entitled to receive all of the royalties from his particular lot or lots. In the original lease the only provision regarding the payment of the royalty was that directing that all rent and royalties were to be paid to the credit of the lessors at the office of the Sentous Realty Company, and such payment should constitute full compliance with the terms of said lease. In the first extension agreement, which was dated May 19, 1922, the provision in the original agreement providing that a well might be drilled on the division line dividing the property of two of the owners was changed as follows: "Each well shall be drilled wholly on one lot and the owner of that lot shall be the only participant in the royalty from such well, be it oil, gas or both, and the balance of lots included in this extension shall receive ground rental monthly in advance at the rate of two ($2.00) dollars per acre per month until drilling shall start thereon." In the second extension agreement, which was dated March 31, 1923, this rental was increased to $500 per month, but the above-quoted provision contained in the first extension agreement was in no way changed or altered. In the agreement of date April 24, 1924, as already noted, the terms of the second extension agreement were substantially restated, with a new paragraph added, designated as number four, which provided that, "except as above, the said lease shall remain unchanged and all previous extensions and amendments of said lease are superseded and canceled hereby."

It is by virtue of this paragraph 4 of the agreement of April 24, 1924, that appellants claim that the first extension agreement, of date May 19, 1922, and particularly that portion thereof which we have quoted above, and which provides that each well shall be drilled wholly on one lot, and the owner of said lot shall be the only participant in the royalty from such well, was canceled and superseded by the agreement of April 24, 1924. This provision that the owner of the lot upon which a well is drilled shall be entitled to all royalties on oil produced by said well, as we have already seen, while set out in full in the first extension agreement, was not mentioned or referred to in the second extension agreement. Appellants therefore claim that the first extension agreement and all its terms and provisions were abrogated and canceled by the agreement of April 24, 1924. Appellants also contend that their position in this regard is further fortified by the letter of June 11, 1924, above referred to, which was signed by the appellants and respondents and directed to the Associated Oil Company, and which, after referring to the original lease and the agreement of April 24, 1924, directed the proportions in which said monthly rental of $500 should be paid to the three owners of said lots, and closed with the following statement: "Except as herein modified, all the terms, covenants and conditions of said lease and said supplemental agreement shall remain in full force and effect."

It appears, from the testimony of those who prepared the supplemental agreement of April 24, 1924, that at the time of its preparation the Associated Oil Company was contemplating the purchase of the Moynier lease, and the supplemental agreement was drawn, and the Moyniers asked to sign the same, simply for the purpose of protecting the company, in case it purchased the lease, against any unrecorded agreement, or any agreement of which the company had no notice or knowledge, and which might affect its rights under the lease. The division of the royalties between the lessors was not discussed at the time of the preparation and execution of the supplemental agreement, and it was not drawn for the purpose of canceling or abrogating any agreement between the lessors as to the division of the royalties. The letter of June 11, 1924, was prepared and signed under much the same conditions and circumstances, and without any intention of disturbing the agreement between the lessors as to the payment of the royalties under the lease.

We might at this time explain a little more in detail the letter of June 11, 1924, and particularly that portion thereof which directs the payment of the monthly rental of $500 to the Moyniers in the following proportions: To Marius Moynier, $247.18; to Abel Moynier, $120.82; and to Emile Moynier, $132. At the time the Moynier tract was subdivided into lots, and these lots conveyed in severalty to the three brothers, and at the date of the lease in question, each of these brothers was the owner of 34.73 acres of land in said tract. After the execution of said lease, and before the first extension thereof on May 19, 1922, Emile Moynier had sold lot 5, containing 16.19 acres, which left him only 18.54 acres, and Abel Moynier had sold lot 7, containing 17.76 acres, which left him only 16.97 acres. Lots 5 and 7, therefore, long prior to the execution of the supplemental agreement and the signing of the letter of June 11, 1924, had been entirely eliminated from the lease. The revenue stamps attached to the deeds conveying these lots indicate that Emile Moynier received $16,000 for lot 5, and that Abel Moynier received $18,000 for lot 7, and that they each retained these respective amounts of money so received as their own individual property. Therefore, when the supplemental agreement of April 24, 1924, was executed, and the letter of June 11, 1924, was signed, the lots subject to the lease were owned as follows: Lots 2, 9, and 10, containing 34.73 acres, by Marius Moynier; lots 3, 4, and 8, containing 16.97 acres, by Abel Moynier; and lots 1 and 6, containing 18.54 acres, by Emile Moynier. The monthly rental of $500, by the letter of June 11, 1924, was made payable to the owners of said lots in proportion to their respective ownership in the lands leased, so that by the agreement between the three owners and their wives, as set forth in said letter, Marius Moynier received a monthly rental for his lands in the sum of $247.18, Abel Moynier for his lands the sum of $120.82, and Emile Moynier for his lands the sum of $132.

The agreement, as embodied in the letter of June 11, 1924, clearly indicated that the original lease of the lands, if it were ever intended by the parties thereto that it should be a joint lease, in which the lessors should share equally in the rent and royalties thereunder, had become modified, at least to the extent of the rent, so that the owners of the leased land participated in said rent, not equally and jointly, but unequally and in the proportion in which the lands which each lessor owned in severalty bore to the whole amount of the land embraced in the lease at the date of the letter of June 11, 1924. Nothing was said in this letter as to the disposition of the royalties which might accrue to the parties under the lease, but in the first extension agreement, being the agreement of date May 19, 1922, it was expressly provided that each well should be drilled wholly on one lot, and the owner of said lot should be the only participant in oil from such well. The testimony of those who prepared the supplemental agreement of April 24, 1924, under which appellants claim that all prior extensions and amendments to the original lease, including the first extension agreement, were canceled, although not without conflict, was sufficient to support the finding of the court that appellants and respondents had entered into an agreement whereby it was agreed that respondents should receive all the royalties from said lot 9. There was other evidence in support of this finding in addition to that which we have already referred to, but we deem a detailed reference thereto to be unnecessary. It is sufficient to hold that there was substantial evidence before the trial court in support of the finding just mentioned to justify said finding.

[2] This brings us to the consideration of the question as to whether the agreement between the parties was so uncertain upon the question of the payment of the royalties as to warrant the introduction of parol evidence to show how said royalties were to be participated in by the appellants and respondents. The original lease was silent as to the extent and as to the manner the lessors under the lease were to share in the royalties which might accrue to them thereunder. It did provide, however, that the lessee should continue drilling, in case oil was secured in paying quantities, until a total of ten wells were drilled; that lessee shall have the privilege of drilling one well on each respective property owned by the lessors, but that, if a well were drilled on the division line of two of the owners, it should be considered a community well, and should constitute a fulfillment of the drilling obligation on both such parcels. The lease as originally drawn might be construed as a strictly joint lease. Civ. Code, § 1431; Higgins v. California P. & A. Co., 109 Cal. 304, 41 P. 1087. But in the first extension agreement the original lease was so modified as to provide that "each well shall be drilled wholly on one lot, and the owner of that lot shall be the only participant in the royalty from such well." Just why this change was made in the terms of the original lease is not shown in the record. It does appear, however, that at that time Emile Moynier had sold lot 5 and Abel Moynier had sold lot 7, and thus reduced their ownership in the lands under the lease substantially to one-half of that which they each originally owned. The terms of the lease in this regard remained the same until the supplemental agreement of April 24, 1924, was executed. This was followed in a short time by the letter of June 11, 1924, wherein the appellants and respondents agreed among themselves that the rental should be divided between them in proportion to their ownership in the lands leased. No agreement, however, was made at this time regarding the royalty.

Should the parties under the supplemental agreement to go back to the original lease, under the terms of which, as contended by appellants, the royalties were to be divided equally between the three owners, or were they to continue under the lease as modified by the first extension agreement, or were they to participate in the royalties in the same proportion in which they had agreed to share the rent? The answer to this question must rest upon the proper construction of the various agreements entered into by the parties. In the first place, it will be noted that the original lease had been expressly modified in two material respects, aside from that contained in the first extension agreement, which appellants contend was superseded and canceled by the supplemental agreement. Since its execution the appellants, Emile and Abel Moynier, had each sold one of his lots covered by the lease, thereby reducing the amount of leased land which each of them owned to about one-half of that still owned by Marius Moynier. These lots so sold had been, by all of the parties to the lease, released from all of the terms thereof. Under these conditions, were Emile and Abel still to share equally in all royalties received under the lease with Marius, who owned almost as much of the leased land as Emile and Abel together owned?

The other modification of the lease was made by the second extension agreement, and confirmed by the supplemental agreement of April 24, 1924. As confirmed by the latter agreement it gave to the owners of the leased land the right to sell any portion of the leased land, except for oil development, prior to the completion of a certain test well, which was known as the Casserini test well, and which was then being drilled in the near vicinity of the leased lands of the parties hereto, or prior to the commencement of drilling operations upon any of the leased lands. The supplemental agreement further provided: "If any land covered by this lease is so sold, then this lease, as to the portion so sold, shall become canceled and void, and a quitclaim shall be given the lessor, releasing same from the operation of this lease, and the balance of the land shall still remain under the lease until sold or the Casserini test well be completed as above mentioned." Under this provision of the lease as it stood after the execution of the supplemental agreement, the appellants could have sold any or all of the remaining portions of the leased land then belonging to them, and upon such sale the land so sold would, under the terms of the modified agreement, have been released from the terms of said lease, and the balance of the land would have still remained subject to the terms of the lease. Had the appellants exercised this right, and sold all their said lands, would they still be entitled, under the terms of the lease, to participate in the royalties which might thereafter have accrued under the lease equally with respondent, who would have owned all of the land then covered by the lease?

The lease nowhere, either in its original or modified form or forms, furnished any answer to either of these two questions, without we accept appellants' contention that by the terms of the original lease the royalties were to be divided equally between the three Moyniers, and that in that respect the terms of the lease had never been changed, and therefore the appellants, notwithstanding the sale by them of all their lands covered by the lease, would still be entitled to participate in the royalties under the terms of the original lease, which they contend gave to each of the three owners of the land originally leased an equal share in the royalties. Such reasoning would lead to the most absurd results, and it is inconceivable that the parties to said agreement ever intended that any of them should share equally or at all in the royalties after having disposed of all his lands covered by the lease.

[3] The lease, as modified by the supplemental agreement of April 24, 1924, is clearly uncertain as to the disposition of the royalties to accrue thereunder. This uncertainty was caused entirely by the provisions of said supplemental agreement. Prior to its execution the terms of the agreement between the parties expressly provided that the owner of the lot upon which a well was drilled "shall be the only participant in the royalty from such well." Parol evidence was therefore admissible to explain this uncertainty, at least to the extent of showing the circumstances under which this supplemental agreement was made and entered into by the parties thereto. Code Civ. Proc. § 1860. "A court is not only to take a contract by all its corners, but is to be placed in the seats of the parties when it is made. In other words, a contract is to be construed in the light and with the knowledge of surrounding circumstances." 6 Cal. Jur. p. 294. "The contract should, of course, be construed with respect to the situation in which the parties were at the time it was made." Burrows v. Petroleum Dev. Co., 181 Cal. 253, 256, 184 P. 5, 7.

The action of the court in admitting parol evidence to explain the circumstances under which the supplemental agreement of April 24, 1924, was executed, was not erroneous. We have already considered this evidence, and held that such evidence, considered with all the other evidence in the case, was sufficient to support the findings of the court in respondents' favor.

[4] The court also admitted parol evidence to show that it was the intention of the parties under the original lease that the owner of the lot upon which a well was drilled should be the only one to participate in the royalty from said well. Appellants claim that the admission of such evidence was error. If so, the error was not prejudicial to any rights of the appellants, as the evidence which we have above referred to and reviewed shows without question that the original lease was modified by the subsequent agreements of the parties, so that it finally provided, if it did not do so in its original form, that each owner of a lot upon which a well was drilled should be entitled to all the royalty from said well.

For the reasons herein expressed the judgment is affirmed.

UNIVERSAL MILK CO. v. WOOD.

(Sac. 4108.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 19, 1928.

1. Quieting title 🔑14—Lessor, suing lessee to quiet title after giving notice of default required by lease, could recover possession without three-day notice (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 380, 1161, 1162; Civ. Code, §§ 791, 793).

Lessor, in suit against lessee to quiet title to property, after giving notice of default provided by lease as condition to forfeiture, held entitled to recover possession of property, under Code Civ. Proc. § 380, and Civ. Code, § 793, without necessity of giving three-day notice required in case of unlawful detainer proceedings, under Civ. Code, § 791, and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1161, 1162.

2. Quieting title 🔑43—Lessor's suit to quiet title, in which lessee cross-complained in ejectment and lessor answered alleging default and re-entry, raised issue of lessor's right of possession (Code Civ. Proc. § 380; Civ. Code, § 793).

Lessor's suit to quiet title, in which lessee cross-complained in action in ejectment, and plaintiff answered, asserting defendant's default and that plaintiff had given written notice thereof as required by lease, and repossessed premises in accordance with lease, raised issue of plaintiff's right to possession of the premises, equivalent to action for possession of property under Code Civ. Proc. § 380, and Civ. Code, § 793; right to recover possession existing independently of unlawful detainer proceedings and three-day notice under Civ. Code, § 791.

3. Equity 🔑65(2)—Re-entry after lessee's default and apparent abandonment did not preclude lessor's quieting title, under doctrine of unclean hands.

Lessor held not precluded from having title quieted to property as against lessee who defaulted, under doctrine of unclean hands, where lessor re-entered the property, on finding it practically unoccupied, under belief that lessee had abandoned it and did not object to re-entry.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; F. H. Lamberson, Judge.

Action by the Universal Milk Company against Dale E. Wood, in which defendant asserted a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Feemster & Cleary, of Visalia, for appellant.

Goodfellow, Eells & Orrick, R. W. Palmer, M. T. Neff, Eells & Orrick, and Orrick, Palmer & Dahlquist, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. Plaintiff corporation sued defendant to quiet title to certain real property upon which is situated a plant to manufacture the by-products of milk. Ownership, possession, and right of possession were alleged, to which the defendant replied by admitting ownership and possession but denying the right of possession in plaintiff and setting up a written indenture of lease between the parties as the basis of his claim to the right of possession. Defendant also cross-complained in an action in ejectment, again setting up said lease and alleging that plaintiff wrongfully ejected him from the premises on the 28th day of December, 1925, and praying for restoration of the premises to him, together with damages at the rate of $500 per month for the time said premises had been withheld from him. Plaintiff answered said cross-complaint, admitting that it resumed possession of said property on the said date; denying that it forcibly or unlawfully ejected cross-complainant; denying the claim for damages; and alleging that on the 13th day of November, 1925, cross-complainant was in default with respect to the obligations undertaken to be performed under said lease in the sum of $155.50, this item relating to earthquake insurance on said plant as provided in said lease, that on said day said cross-defendant gave cross-complainant written notice of said default and made demand for the payment of said amount, that same was not paid or any part thereof and thereafter and on the 22d day of December, 1925, notice was given the cross-complainant of the cancellation and termination of said lease, and thereafter and on the 28th day of December, 1925, cross-defendant repossessed said premises in accordance with the terms of said lease; and praying that cross-complainant take nothing by the action. Cross-defendant, also as a part of its said answer, alleged a counterclaim against said cross-complainant for the sum of $182.34, which amount included said item of $155.50 above referred to, and for the further sum of $659.75 on account of taxes which said cross-complainant had agreed to pay by the terms of said lease, making a total claim of $842.09. The prayer of cross-defendant was that cross-complainant take nothing by the answer and that it have judgment upon its counterclaim for the said sum of $842.09.

The court below, after a trial of the action, made its findings of fact, conclusions of law, and gave its judgment, all of which were in favor of plaintiff, both as to its title and right of possession and as to said counterclaim. The court found, among other things, that on the 13th day of November, 1925, cross-complainant was in default as to said item of $155.50; that written notice was on that day given of said default; that thereafter, said default continuing, plaintiff did on the 22d day of December, 1925, give written notice of the cancellation and termination of said lease; that thereafter, and on the 28th day of December, 1925, plaintiff repossessed said property in accordance with the consent of defendant and cross-complainant, and after said resumption of possession on said day, plaintiff occupied and still occupies said premises and the whole thereof. The court made a special finding to the effect that said re-entry was by consent, and as a result defendant suffered no damages, and that said re-entry was not made with malicious intent. From said judgment defendant has appealed. The complaint was filed on June 26, 1926, and the cross-complaint on September 27, 1926.

The appeal is determined by a proper construction of certain provisions of said lease of July 30, 1925, the material portions of which provided that the term of lease was to be for a period of ten years beginning August 1, 1925, and ending July 31, 1935; that the rental for the first year was to be only payment by the lessee of what are called "carrying charges," this term including all taxes, insurance, water rates, repairs on buildings and machinery, improvements and all upkeep of the properties; that, as rental for the second year, said carrying charges were to be paid and in addition the sum of $2,400, and for the succeeding years, other amounts of money were to be paid in addition to said carrying charges. Said lease then contained the following provision: "Time is hereby made of the essence and if default should be made with regard to any of the covenants, terms, conditions or agreements provided to be kept, performed and observed by the Lessee, then and from thenceforth it shall be lawful for the Lessor to re-enter the said leased premises and to remove all persons therefrom and to repossess and enjoy the said premises as in its former estate, after giving said Lessee thirty days written notice of said default."

The record discloses the further facts to be that defendant resided at Los Angeles, that he was a dealer in leases and was not familiar with the operation of a plant such as the one here involved, and he evidently had in mind a sale of the lease without any intention on his part of operating the plant. In other words, it was as to him a pure speculation. Between August 1, 1925, and December 22d following, he made no effort to operate the plant, and visited it only about five times during that period. He hired a caretaker, who was a witness in the case, at $75 per month; he then reduced his salary to $25 per month; then he refused to pay him anything, offering him as compensation the use of the house on the property as a residence, saying that, if that was not satisfactory, he was to surrender the keys and move from the place. Defendant in reality did not pay the caretaker all the sums due him; he failed to keep the water tanks for fire protection in proper condition, and also failed to keep the standby power on, as required by the lease, same being shut off at times because of his failure to pay the necessary charges therefor. Moreover, defendant has never paid or offered to pay any of said carrying charges called for by said lease. Neither in his answer nor in his cross-complaint does he make reference to this failure on his part, nor did he at any time or place offer, nor does he now offer, to pay any of said charges. He wrote, admitting his inability to perform his covenants under the lease, and admitted a practical abandonment of effort to do so. As a part of his plea in his cross-complaint, however, he prays for the sum of $500 per month, without so much as giving credit on the amount so claimed for the charges due from him by the terms of said lease during the time he was in possession of the property. In short, he has done nothing entitling him from a moral standpoint to any consideration whatsoever. He nevertheless asserts his technical eviction and his consequent claim to restoration of possession, even though it is but to admit him to the back door that he may be expelled through the front gate.

[1, 2] The contention offered is that the right to possession could only be terminated by supplementing the other notices with the three-day notice found in section 791 of the Civil Code, incorporating the provisions of sections 1161 and 1162 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that a failure to give this notice left the lease still subsisting and the measure of the rights of the parties. This assumption is based upon a misconception of the lease and a consequent misapplication of legal principles. The lease itself, by the above-quoted provision, provides a forfeiture of the rights of the lessee upon failure to pay the charges stipulated. The notice of default, the lapse of thirty days, and notice of forfeiture completed the process. The rights of the lessee under said lease became extinct, and nothing he could do would restore vitality to the instrument. Neither a further three-day notice nor any other notice would be of advantage to him, for at best it would but lay the foundation to hasten his departure from the premises. When this forfeiture became effective, an election of remedies was open to respondent. It could proceed in unlawful detainer under the summary provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure or else it could seek one of the general remedies offered by law. If it had chosen the former, then only would it be concerned with the provisions of section 791 of the Civil Code as to further notice. But, as it appealed only to the general remedy afforded by the law, it was not required to concern itself with further notice. The essence of the issue made by the pleadings is the right of possession of the premises. Respondent asserted his right and appellant by both answer and cross-complaint asserted its right. The issue is the equivalent of an action for possession of the property. Code Civ. Proc., § 380. This right is especially reserved by section 793 of the Civil Code, and would exist anyway, independent of the procedure contemplated under section 791 of the Civil Code. There is therefore no need for a full discussion of the somewhat complex state of the decisions on the applicability or nonapplicability of the three-day notice in unlawful detainer actions. This is no such action. Abundant authority exists for the distinction we have here drawn. See McCarthy v. Yale, 39 Cal. 585, 587; Martin v. Splivalo, 56 Cal. 128; Joy v. McKay, 70 Cal. 445, 11 P. 763; McKissick v. Ashby, 98 Cal. 422, 425, 33 P. 729; Sauer v. Meyer, 87 Cal. 34, 36, 25 P. 153; Mossi v. Fairbanks, 19 Cal. App. 355, 358, 125 P. 1071; Wickstrom v. McGrath (Cal. App.) 261 P. 326; Williams v. Edge, 192 Cal. 254, 219 P. 747; Andrews v. Russell (Cal. App.) 259 P. 113; Allen v. Houn, 30 Wyo. 186, 219 P. 581; 36 C. J. 617; 16 R. C. L. § 663, p. 1143. This is not a case where the lease does not provide a forfeiture and the provisions of sections 1161 and 1162 of the Code of Civil Procedure must be resorted to to work a forfeiture for failure to pay the rental provided. Standard Livestock Co. v. Pentz (Cal. Sup.) 269 P. 645.

[3] The intimation that respondent comes into a court of equity with unclean hands is not worthy of consideration. It found the property practically unoccupied and in addition thereto it had every right to believe that appellant had abandoned or was about to abandon the premises and that there would be no objection to re-entry thereupon. This is borne out by appellant's failure to pay and by his conduct with reference to the premises and by his admission in a letter dated December 21, 1925, where he states: "* * * I have been unable to take care of the insurance and taxes, and cannot see my way clear at this time to do so. I just returned from San Diego, where I had it out with my brother, and we cannot get together. I feel that the way I have been drawn into this affair and put in over $300.00, that I should be reimbursed by you to this extent. I do not care to stand in the way of any further prospects you may have in this matter. * * *"

Further discussion of this case seems unnecessary. Judgment affirmed.

GOULARTE v. GOULARTE. (Sac. 4089.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 13, 1928.

1. Divorce ⚷79—Decree held not void as against contention trial court could not order service of summons by publication after it had been returned and filed.

Divorce decree held not void as against contention that, summons having been returned and filed because defendant could not be found, trial court was without authority to order service of it by publication.

2. Divorce ⚷160—Divorce decree held not void because defendant's default was not entered, where interlocutory decree recited that defendant did not appear, but made default (Code Civ. Proc. § 670).

Divorce decree held not void as against contention that it did not appear that default of defendant was duly entered by the clerk, as provided in Code Civ. Proc. § 670, where interlocutory decree recited that defendant had not appeared either by counsel or in person, but made default.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Action by Manuel L. Goularte against Anna Goularte. From an order denying motion to set aside an interlocutory decree of divorce, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Elmer S. Leslie and E. H. Christian, both of Oakland, for appellant.

H. W. Coale, of Stockton, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal from an order denying a motion to set aside an interlocutory and final decree of divorce on the ground that the trial court never acquired jurisdiction of the defendant. The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone, which shows that summons was issued on April 1, 1920. It was delivered to the sheriff on April 3, 1920, and, on the same day, he made return that defendant could not be found in San Joaquin county. On April 5, 1920, the summons and return were filed with the county clerk. On April 12, 1920, plaintiff made affidavit for publication of summons, and on April 15, 1920, the court ordered service by publication; the original summons being used for publication.

[1] One of the contentions of the appellant is that the judgment is void because summons having been returned and filed, it became functus officio for all purposes, and the trial court had no authority to order service of it by publication. This contention is without merit. The case of Rue v. Quinn, 137 Cal. 651, at page 657, 66 P. 216, 70 P. 732, directly passes upon the point raised.

[2] The other point urged on the appeal is that the judgment is void upon its face because it does not appear from the judgment roll that the default of the defendant was duly entered by the clerk. The clerk's transcript herein contains a copy of a "Demand for Default" and a copy of the "Clerk's Default," showing the entry of the default, but appellant contends that these are not to be considered by us, as they constitute no part of the judgment roll. The complaint has no memorandum indorsed thereon that the default of the defendant in not answering was entered, as provided for in section 670, Code of Civil Procedure. Also, the interlocutory decree does not contain the usual recital that the default of the defendant has been duly entered. While the decree herein does not present the best form of decree, we think its lack of formality does not demand a reversal of the order of the trial court made herein, for the reason that the interlocutory decree does contain a recital as follows: "And the defendant not appearing either by counsel or in person, but making default," etc. While the words, "making default" lack the precision which would be desirable, nevertheless the word "default" is often used loosely to cover a variety of shades of meaning. 18 C. J. 455. This court is bound to indulge in any presumptions which it may in support of the judgment under attack and in support of the order of the trial court refusing to set the same aside. We therefore consider the language used as indicating an entry of the defendant's default. The trial court had before it its own records, and, knowing that the default had actually been entered, it doubtless used the words "making default" in the judgment to indicate that fact, and, being aware of its own records, had this in mind in denying the motion to set aside the decrees.

Thus considered, the judgment is not void upon its face, nor subject to the attacks made upon it by the appellant.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

MITCHELL v. WHITTIER COLLEGE.
(L. A. 10575.) ★

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 18, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 17, 1929.

Wills ⚿656—Long Beach Junior College held "college," within will directing Whittier College, as trustee, to pay legacies to particular persons while in college (St. 1921, p. 761, § 9).

Long Beach Junior College, organized for high school graduates to provide courses of instruction to prepare for higher institutions, and to prepare persons for vocations and civic and liberal education, under St. 1921, p. 761, § 9, held "college," within scope of will directing trustee to pay specified legacies to particular persons while in college, to assist them in defraying their college expenses, though Whittier College was made trustee, and testatrix expressed preference for persons attending that college; object of University being to provide instruction in science, literature, art, industrial and professional pursuits, and general education, under St. 1867–68, p. 248.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, College.]

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon R. Yankwich, Judge.

Action by Joseph Andrew Mitchell against Whittier College, of Whittier, Cal., as trustee. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. T. Walters and Arthur G. Wray, both of Whittier, for appellant.

Miller & Casady and E. J. Miller, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. Is Long Beach Junior College a "college," within the meaning of paragraph 8 of the last will of Amanda T. Whitson, deceased? This is the sole question presented by this appeal.

In 1921 (Stats. 1921, pp. 756, 761) the Legislature of California provided for the organization, management, control and financing of institutions to be known as junior colleges, by a statute reading in part as follows:

"The junior college board may prescribe junior college courses of study, including not more than two years of work, and admit thereto the graduates of any high school of California, the graduates of other high schools and such other candidates over eighteen years of age as may be recommended for admission by the principal of the junior college; * * * junior colleges may provide courses of instruction designed to prepare for higher institutions of learning; courses of instruction designed to prepare persons for agricultural, industrial, commercial, homemaking, and other vocations; and such courses of instruction as may be deemed necessary to provide for the civic and liberal education of the citizens of the community.

"The junior college board shall adopt regulations governing the organization of such courses of study and shall prescribe requirements for graduation from such courses; provided, that the minimum requirement for graduation from junior college courses of study shall be at least sixty credit hours of work. A credit hour is hereby defined as approximately three hours of recitation, study and laboratory work per week carried through one-half year."

This was done as a part of the public school system and was designed to admit students, graduates of high schools and others of similar scholarship over the age of 18 years, for the purpose of receiving 2 years' training in preparation for entrance into higher institutions of learning, or for courses of instruction in agricultural, industrial, commercial, homemaking or other vocations, and for such courses of instruction as might be deemed necessary to provide for the civic and liberal education of the citizens of the community, and to provide for the organization of such courses of study and to prescribe the requirements for graduation therefrom, and finally to prescribe the minimum requirement of work for such graduation.

Admittedly, Long Beach Junior College meets all these requirements. Subsequent to the effective date of the law, Amanda T. Whitson, a woman of means and culture, interested in higher education and with a particular interest in Whittier College, Whittier, Cal., an institution maintained by the Friends' Church, did, in March, 1925, sign and publish her last will, in which, after providing for specific bequests, by paragraph 8 thereof she proclaimed, as far as here material, the following:

"Eight The rest, residue and remainder of my estate I give and devise and bequeath to Whittier College, Whittier, California, in trust for the following purposes: 1st. Said trust fund shall be known * * * as the Amanda T. Whitson Educational fund. 2d. I direct that said Whittier College shall pay annually out of the said trust fund * * * $400 for a term of four years, to each of the following named persons, while in college to assist them in defraying their college expenses (listing said persons, among whom plaintiff is included). * * * In the event any of the above named persons have completed their education before my death, or in case any of them are not living, or if living do not desire for any reason to accept such assistance, then in that case the amount willed to the person * * * shall remain in the general trust fund. * * * After such of the above named persons as desire assistance in their education * * * has been provided for, * * * I give and devise and bequeath the rest, residue and remainder in full to Whittier College * * * to establish a perpetual fund, the interest and earnings of which shall be loaned by said Whittier College to any needy and worthy young person requiring assistance in securing a college education in sums not to exceed * * * $400 to one person per annum for a term of four years, the sum loaned to bear a reasonable rate of interest per annum. It is my preference that all of the persons assisted as herein provided for shall attend Whittier College. * * *"

Plaintiff, a minor of school age, mentioned specifically in said will, after matriculating at the Long Beach Junior College, applied for the benefits of this provision of the will, claiming to be entitled to $400 a year to pay his expenses while in said junior college. Defendant, trustee of the fund, doubted the validity of plaintiff's claim and refused the request. This suit followed; the complaint setting out the foregoing facts, together with the allegation that said Long Beach Junior College was a college within the meaning of the terms of said will. The answer admitted all of the facts alleged, except the conclusion that said junior college met the requirements of said will, and affirmatively set up the allegation that said college, so being attended by plaintiff, was not a college within the meaning of that word as used in said provision of the will. The court below gave judgment on the pleadings for plaintiff. Defendant has appealed, and, as stated, the sole question presented is to define the scope of the word "college" as used in said last will and testament.

Appellant insists that the proper definition is as follows: "A 'college' is primarily an institution of higher learning, generally incorporated, not supported by public taxation or open to all free of charge, offering instruction in the liberal arts, having but a single faculty and curriculum, and usually leading to the degree of bachelor of arts." See Black's Law Dictionary, p. 215; 11 C. J. 972–980.

Admittedly, early authority in this country gives more or less support to this definition, but it is at once evident that progress has been made in the science of education as well as in all other fields, and a definition sufficient in one day and age might not apply in its entirety to the same institution at a later date. It cannot be expected that new developments made in science, arts, literature, language and invention have not been accompanied by developments in the institutions which foster and nourish this growth. It has well been said: "A college [as an institution] means, or ought to mean, growth; the elimination of the false; the fostering of the true. As it is expected to be perpetual in its service, it must conform to the changed condition of each new generation, possessing an elasticity of scope and work commensurate with the changing requirements of the times which it serves." Central Univ. v. Walters, 122 Ky. 65, 83, 90 S. W. 1066, 1070.

To insist that a college is not such if supported in whole or in part by public taxation, or that a college may not be open to all free of charge, or may not be an extension of high school courses, or must be incorporated, or must have only a single faculty and curriculum, or may confer only a single degree, is to deny progress in the development and efficiency of institutions of learning. We think this deduction may be made from the definition upon which appellant relies, given by Mr. Webster of the word "college," which definition reads in part: "In the United States a college is primarily an institution of higher learning having but a single faculty and curriculum, usually leading to the degree of bachelor of arts; there is, however, no clear line of demarcation, as institutions have retained the name college while extending their instruction to university scope." Webster's International Dictionary. Suppose this young man had enrolled in the University of California, an institution supported in part by the state, and which has for its object "to provide instruction and complete education in all the departments of science, literature, art, industrial, and professional pursuits and general education" (Stats. 1867–68, p. 248).

would it for a moment be said that he was not in "college"? A university is usually in reality but an aggregation of colleges. The test seems to be found largely in the course of study and the requirements of graduation; whether it is confined to teaching the liberal arts, whether it confers more than one degree, or whether it is supported by public taxation, or is open to all free of charge, seem not to be valid tests of its status as a college.

Search as we may, it would indeed be difficult to find a more accurate present-day definition of the scope of the word than that found in the statute above quoted. Courses of study for high school graduates and those of similar attainment, their admission to higher institutions of learning, courses in agriculture, industry, commerce, homemaking and other vocations, and other courses of instruction necessary to provide for the civic and liberal education of the citizens of the community, seem to be of the very essence of a present-day college. It is true that no degree may be conferred, but that is because these institutions only purport to give instruction in the first two years of the college or university courses, but it is evident that a graduate of a junior college may receive from these two years in the institution the same benefits as would be received through spending that time in the higher institution of learning itself.

The definition found in the Ohio statutes (section 7650, Page's Gen. Code Ohio 1926; R. S. § 4007—3) is also a fairly modern statement of the scope of the word "college." It follows: "A college is a school of a higher grade than a high school, in which instruction in the high school branches is carried beyond the scope of the high school and other advanced studies are pursued, or a school in which special, technical or professional studies are pursued, and which, when legally organized, may have the right to confer degrees in agreement with the terms of the law regulating its practices or its charter; or in the absence of legislative direction, in agreement with the practices of the better institutions of learning of their respective kinds in the United States."

Coming now specifically to the provision of the will before us, it may be said that higher education and courses above those of the high schools were certainly the dominant idea in the mind of the testatrix. The framework of the institution, so long as it meets this test, seems not to have been of the essence of the bequest. The fund is made an "educational fund." In two other places decedent uses the word "educational" in a sense which shows that she had in mind education in the higher institutions of learning, institutions graduation from which would be said to "complete" the education of the student as that word is used in the provision before us.

It is urged that, inasmuch as Whittier College may answer to the definition put forth by appellant and quoted above, coupled with the fact that the testatrix was a trustee of that college, and the further fact that in said provision she expressed a preference that all persons assisted by her attend said college, we must thereby conclude that she used the word in the narrow sense, or in the sense of a single curriculum, faculty, and degree in an institution not supported by public taxation. In our opinion this is too narrow a view of her intent. The predominant note of the provision is aid to students seeking higher education, education on the road to a complete scholarship attainment. There is nothing to indicate that she required the institution to conform exactly in every respect to Whittier College. It is a reflection upon decedent's foresight and a stricture upon her benevolence to say that in Whittier College alone she thought this higher education might be obtained, especially when some of her beneficiaries reside without the state of California. The utmost that could be said is that in that respect Whittier College was the institution she personally preferred among the list of colleges, but this is far from saying that she intended to make matriculation in that institution a condition precedent to the right to receive this bounty from her estate. Such a preference so expressed is not compulsory upon the legatee. Estate of Marti, 132 Cal. 666, 61 P. 964, 64 P. 1071.

What we have here said is by no means intended to reflect upon the defendant Whittier College, which happens to be the trustee for the administration of this fund. We realize that it is its sole desire to have this question settled, in order that it may the better perform its duty under said testament. Our answer is that Long Beach Junior College is a college, within the meaning of this provision of said will, and that the plaintiff is entitled to all or so much of said fund specified as may be necessary to defray such legitimate college expense as he may incur while attending Long Beach Junior College.

HOWE v. HOWE. (Sac. 4128.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1928.

1. Divorce 🔑303(3)—At hearing on application to amend divorce decree to require father to support children, previous agreement on matter never approved by court held properly excluded.

At hearing on application for order to amend final decree of divorce so as to award custody of children to mother and to provide that father pay for support of children, written agreement previously entered into between parties regarding custody and support of children, which was not offered in evidence at divorce trial and which was never approved by court, held properly excluded.

2. Divorce 🔑303(1)—Court properly amended divorce decree not mentioning the two children by awarding custody to mother and requiring father to pay $40 per month (Civ. Code, § 138).

Where interlocutory decree of divorce granted in 1912 and final decree entered in 1923 did not mention custody or support of children, and mother in 1927 made application, court did not abuse discretion under Civ. Code, § 138, in awarding custody of the two children to mother and requiring that father pay $40 per month for their support.

3. Divorce 🔑306—That children were in part self-supporting did not relieve divorced father of duty to contribute to support.

Fact that boys were in part self-supporting at time of order requiring divorced father to pay $40 per month for their support did not relieve father of his duty to contribute towards their support.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Divorce suit by Henry R. Howe against Clara Howe. Plaintiff was granted a decree of divorce, and, from an order directing the plaintiff to pay for the support of the minor children, he appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant.

Stahlman & Bennett, of Stockton, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from an order directing the plaintiff, as father of his two minor sons, to pay $40 per month for their support.

On October 7, 1912, the plaintiff was granted an interlocutory decree of divorce from the defendant on the ground of extreme cruelty. At that time the sons were about 2 and 3 years of age, respectively. No provision was made in the decree for the custody of the children or for their support. The final decree of divorce was entered in February, 1923. Likewise in the final decree no mention was made of the custody or support of the children. In 1924 the defendant remarried. In September, 1927, the defendant, on notice to the plaintiff, made application to the court for an order to amend the final decree of divorce so as to award to the defendant the custody of the children and to provide that the plaintiff pay a suitable monthly sum for the support of the minors and for reimbursement for some $4,000 theretofore expended by her for their support. The relief prayed for was granted to the extent of awarding the custody of the sons to the defendant and requiring the plaintiff to pay the sum of $40 per month for their support. From that order the appeal is prosecuted.

[1-3] On October 30, 1912, the parties hereto entered into a written agreement as to the custody of the children and the payment by the plaintiff of $10 per month for the support of one of them. This agreement was offered in evidence at the trial, and on objection of the defendant was refused admission. The ruling of the court on the offer is urged as one of the principal grounds of the appeal. We find no error in the ruling. The agreement was not offered in evidence at the trial of the divorce action and was never approved by the court. The order here complained of was discretionary with the court under section 138 of the Civil Code and no abuse of discretion is shown. The fact that the boys were in part self-supporting at the time the order was made would not relieve the father of his duty to contribute toward their support.

No other points require discussion. The order is affirmed.

CYR v. CYR. (L. A. 8996.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 22, 1928.

1. Judgment 🔑938—Allegation that foreign judgment, and no part thereof, had been paid, sufficiently showed nonpayment as against demurrer.

In action to establish foreign judgment for alimony, allegation "that said judgment and no part thereof has been paid," and that specified amount was due and owing, sufficiently showed nonpayment of the judgment as against demurrer.

2. Divorce 🔑331—Action could be maintained to establish foreign judgment for alimony, where it did not appear that it was not a finality.

An action might be maintained to establish a foreign judgment for alimony, where there was nothing on the face of the record to show that it had not become a finality.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth H. Cyr against P. S. Cyr to establish a judgment for alimony. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Griffith Jones and John J. Craig, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Milligan & Ryzek, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This appeal was submitted upon an order to show cause, no respondent's brief having been filed. The action was one for the establishment in this state of a judgment for alimony in an action for divorce in the superior court of the county of Okanogan, state of Washington. The defendant filed a general demurrer, which was overruled, and, upon his failure to further answer, judgment in the plaintiff's favor was entered by default. The appeal from such judgment is upon the judgment roll.

[1] The appellant makes two points upon the appeal. The first is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and is based upon the following averment in plaintiff's complaint, namely: "That said judgment and no part thereof has been paid by said defendant and that there is now due and owing said plaintiff from said defendant the sum of $50.00 per month from the 18th day of December, 1918." It is the contention of the appellant that the foregoing averment fails to state that the judgment in question had not been paid. There is no merit in this contention. The foregoing averment, while inartificial in form, sufficiently shows the intendment of the plaintiff to be that no part of said judgment had been paid and was good as against the general demurrer.

[2] The appellant's second contention is that the complaint did not state facts to give the court jurisdiction of the person of the defendant or the subject of the action. This contention is based upon the rather novel proposition that, where a judgment is not a final award and is subject to modification by the court which granted it in one state, it cannot be enforced in an action for its establishment in another state. The authorities cited by the appellant do not support this contention. From all that appears on the face of this record the judgment of the Washington court as to the amount payable to the plaintiff thereunder had become a finality long prior to the commencement of the present action in this state. It was therefore like any other money judgment enforceable in this state through an action for its establishment herein. The superior court had jurisdiction to entertain such action. The defendant was duly served with process. He appeared herein and filed a general demurrer, and thus submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court. There is no merit in either of his contentions, which, as we have seen, are made upon the appeal upon the judgment roll alone.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 5, 1928.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Wm. H. Ellis, Judge.

Action for divorce by Nettie M. Burdick against Charles M. Burdick, in which defendant interposed a cross-complaint. From an interlocutory decree of divorce, defendant appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part, with directions.

Walter O. Davison, of Riverside, for appellant.

Loyal C. Kelley, of Riverside, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. A suit for divorce was instituted by the respondent herein, the appellant served and filed an answer and cross-complaint, and respondent answered the pleading last mentioned. The complaint alleged nonsupport and desertion, the existence of community property in Riverside county, California, and that $250 was a reasonable fee for an attorney whom the plaintiff was compelled to employ in order to present her action. She prayed judgment dissolving the bonds of matrimony, all of the realty constituting the community property, attorney's fees in said amount, and temporary alimony and permanent maintenance, together with costs incurred. The answer denied all of the material allegations of the complaint, except the marriage, alleging desertion upon the part of the plaintiff, and in the cross-complaint alleged desertion and adultery of the cross-defendant, and prayed a dissolution of the marital bonds.

It appears from the pleadings of the parties that they were married in the state of Kansas. It is alleged by the plaintiff and respondent that they separated in the county of Riverside more than 12 years previously to her suit for divorce, and that she was at the time of filing her complaint employed. The defendant and appellant admits the time and place of marriage, but denies that they separated in California, averring that he came to California and attempted to persuade his wife to return to Kansas with him, which she refused to do, and that he had sent her money from that state. The trial court found that the plaintiff was a resident of California, and that the defendant resided in the state of Kansas; that they intermarried in 1901, and separated on July 29, 1921, at Riverside, Cal.; that the defendant had deserted the plaintiff, and that she was without means to prosecute the action, and had employed an attorney, the reasonable fees of whom were $250; that the plaintiff was not guilty of desertion nor adultery. It was also found that the plaintiff and defendant had acquired community property, consisting of certain described realty in Riverside county. An interlocutory decree was granted the plaintiff, and she was therein awarded all of the community property, $250 attorney's fees, and costs; but the defendant was by the conclusions of law and judgment adjudged entitled to and given judgment for the sum of $425 as a condition to vesting in the plaintiff title to the real property. The defendant and cross-complainant appealed from the whole judgment upon the judgment roll, by a bill of exceptions, and filed an opening brief, to which the respondent made no response.

[1, 2] As already observed, although the trial court found that there was community property, it awarded the whole to the plaintiff, conditioned upon the payment by her to the defendant of the sum of $425, and allowed her attorney's fees. But it does not appear that the plaintiff and respondent at any time made a motion for alimony or attorney's fees, or that the defendant was afforded an opportunity to be heard, nor did the plaintiff allege the defendant's then place of residence, or that it was impossible to obtain personal service of process upon him within the jurisdiction of the Riverside superior court. In Stampfli v. Stampfli, 53 Cal. App. 126, 199 P. 829, it was said: "The interlocutory decree awarded the plaintiff $150 as attorney's fees. The court is not authorized to allow attorney's fees for past services. Loveren v. Loveren, 100 Cal. 494, 35 P. 87; Lacey v. Lacey, 108 Cal. 46, 40 P. 1056; Wickland v. Wickland, 19 Cal. App. 562, 126 P. 507; Sheppard v. Sheppard, 15 Cal. App. 619, 115 P. 751. The judgment is modified, by striking therefrom the allowance of $150 attorney's fees, and, as so modified, is affirmed, neither party to recover costs of appeal." That the allowance in controversy was unauthorized, is too well settled to warrant further discussion or citation of authority.

Section 146, subdivision 2, of the Civil Code, provides that, "if the decree be rendered on any other ground than that of adultery or extreme cruelty, the community property shall be equally divided between the parties." The decree in the instant case was not rendered upon either of these grounds, nor was adultery or extreme cruelty charged in the respondent's complaint. Section 148 of the Civil Code authorizes a revision, without reversal of the whole judgment, of the part of a decree which disposes of the community property, upon appeal. In Reid v. Reid, 112 Cal. 274, 44 P. 564, and numerous other cases, such procedure was followed.

It is therefore ordered that all of the judgment appealed from, granting a decree of divorce, commencing with the first word thereof, to and including the words "permitting either of them to remarry after such entry of final judgment," be and the same is hereby affirmed. It is further ordered that all of said judgment which disposes of the community property and property rights of the parties, and awards attorney's fees, and orders, adjudges, and decrees that respondent pay to the appellant the sum of $425, which includes all of said judgment from the words herein quoted down to and including the amount of $425, be and the same is hereby reversed, and the trial court is directed to enter a decree equally dividing the community property between the parties.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 30, 1928.

Embezzlement ⚷44(1)—Larceny ⚷65—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for embezzlement and grand theft.

Evidence held to sustain conviction of employee for embezzlement and grant theft as to moneys received from employer's customers for which he failed to account.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Frank O. Lind was convicted of embezzlement and grand theft, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Grant B. Cooper and Cooper & Collings, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and W. Augustine, of San Francisco, for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellant was charged by information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county with grand larceny, embezzlement, and grand theft. He was convicted upon counts charging the two last-named offenses, and appeals from the judgment and order denying a motion for new trial. It was contended in a motion for an instructed verdict and motion for a new trial, and is here insisted, that the evidence conclusively shows that the alleged embezzled and stolen moneys were received by his employers, and that there is therefore no evidence to support the verdict and judgment.

It appears that appellant was employed by a furniture company in the city of Los Angeles during the year of 1927, and that he received a salary of $60 per week; that it was his duty to receive, enter upon the proper books, and deposit in bank, moneys and checks paid to him by customers, for the company's account. An auditor testified that over a period of about 8½ months customers paid in $14,818.71 in divers amounts, for which their accounts were not credited, and which had been withdrawn from the bank. Another witness testified that, when appellant was arrested, he was asked what he had done with the missing funds, and that he replied, "I bought my house, and I paid on my automobiles and my furniture," and admitted having about $400 in the bank; that he was asked, "Mr. Lind, if I understand you correctly, the girl handed you the cash, and you took out what you desired and deposited the rest," to which appellant answered "Yes." Without detailing all of the transactions wherein, according to testimony offered by the prosecution, defalcations occurred, we may observe the principal ones. It was testified that of $500.61 in cash and $126 in checks paid in on July 2, 1927, there was a shortage of $500; that on April 22, 1927, the difference between amounts received and deposited or accounted for was $900; and that on August 3, 1927, the discrepancy was $300. The defendant during cross-examination swore that, while receiving a salary of but $60 per week, he purchased in the year 1927 an Overland and three Stutz automobiles, and that, although he maintained a home for himself and wife, he had "two or three" other places of residence which he visited but did not occupy continuously.

By isolating certain items, appellant attempts through illustration to advance the theory that from the face of the firm's records upon which the prosecution relied, it appeared that the shortages could not have existed, and that the embezzlements could not have occurred. To state his principal argument most favorably to appellant, it is said that "defendant was supposed to have manipulated the books and stolen the money, according to the prosecution," but that some customers paid in checks and other customers paid in cash, which the defendant did not deposit at that time, but that the amounts offsetting them were deposited thereafter, so that the books balanced. However, quoting from direct evidence which the court and jury had before them, it was averred by an accountant who twice examined the books: "Certainly the books balanced. The missing moneys were not credited to any place. * * * They were not credited anywhere. If you eliminate from your bank account moneys which are not deposited, you certainly cannot give respective accounts credit for it. * * * Therefore, in the beginning you have eliminated a credit of $300 to this accounts-receivable control or to your individual account. It shows he still owes $300 which he has paid. It shows he still owes $300. It is accounts receivable, but by circularizing the accounts, he says he does not owe that much money." It is argued that, since the books do not show the discrepancies, there could be no shortage, and that appellant was therefore convicted upon circumstantial evidence of shortages which did not exist. However, from the foregoing positive evidence of the receipt of moneys which appellant neither charged to himself nor credited to the customers, it is obvious that there was a shortage, notwithstanding the fact that his books were ingeniously and perfectly balanced. Upon such evidence, but a small portion of which is set out herein, we are not compelled to invoke the provisions of article 6, § 4½, of the Constitution, discussed by appellant.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ANDERSON. (Cr. 1731.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 3, 1928.

1. Larceny 🔑55—Evidence, in prosecution for theft by fraud, justified finding that person for whom defendant represented he was purchasing property did not exist.

In prosecution for theft committed by fraudulent representations inducing owner of property to deliver possession to defendant without payment therefor, defended on ground that there was no actual fraud inducing plaintiff to part with property, evidence justified finding that person for whom plaintiff pretended he was purchasing property did not actually exist.

2. Criminal law 🔑371(2)—In prosecution for theft by fraud, evidence of transactions committed about same time, showing attempts to commit such crime, was properly admitted (Pen. Code, § 664).

In prosecution for theft committed by fraudulent representations, inducing owner to deliver possession of property to defendant without payment therefor, evidence of other transactions taking place about same time, and showing attempts to commit such crime, held properly admitted to show intent of defendant, in view of Pen. Code, § 664.

3. Criminal law 🔑20, 371(1)—Intent must be shown, where fraud is essential to crime, and is provable by evidence of like offenses committed about same time.

Where fraud is an essential element of a crime, it is necessary to prove intent with which actions of defendant were done, and, in proving intent, it is permissible to introduce evidence of like offenses, especially when committed at or about same time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; V. N. Thompson, Judge.

John M. Anderson was convicted of grand theft, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Ault & MacKinnon, of Calexico, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. From the evidence it appears that the offense was committed by means of fraudulent representations, which induced the owner of the property to deliver possession thereof to the defendant without payment therefor. The defendant, using a false name, purchased from the complaining witness, Washington, 15 tons of hay at an agreed price of $18 per ton, and made said purchase as pretended agent of F. T. Fuller. The evidence indicates that there was no F. T. Fuller, and the address of Fuller in the city of San Diego, as given to Washington by the defendant, was not Fuller's address. Defendant, after hauling the hay away from the premises of Washington, sent it to an address of his own in San Diego, and resold it for $21 per ton. It was only after this prosecution had been instituted that he paid for the hay.

Appellant's assignments of error are as follows: First, that the value of the property obtained was not proved to exceed $200; second, that the evidence fails to establish that the fraud committed by the defendant caused Washington to part with his property; third, that there was no actual fraud committed; fourth, that the court erred in allowing testimony showing other hay deals (not crimes), which showed guilty knowledge of the defendant; fifth, that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct prejudicial to the defendant.

[1] We are of the opinion that there is no merit in any of these assignments of error. It seems unnecessary further to mention any of them, except the third and fourth. The claim that there was no actual fraud committed is based upon the fact that the defendant and his father and his mother all testified that they knew F. T. Fuller, a hay dealer in San Diego, and that the defendant actually was buying hay for Fuller, and that Fuller, at about the time of these transactions, left San Diego and turned over the hay to the defendant. Our introductory statement gives the substance of some evidence to the contrary. Albert Brown, owner of the ranch run by Washington, in Imperial county, testified that he went to the San Diego address which defendant had given to Washington as the address of Fuller, and found that Fuller was not known there. He made other investigations, through the city directory and the telephone directory, and could find no F. T. Fuller in San Diego. George Wright, deputy sheriff, testified that he had asked defendant's father who F. T. Fuller was, and defendant's father said he had no knowledge of any such person, and that he made other investigations in the city of San Diego and was unable to find said F. T. Fuller. Taking the evidence as a whole, the jury was justified in finding that there was no such person.

[2] Over the repeated objection of attorney for defendant, the prosecution was allowed to introduce evidence of three other transactions, all occurring in the same month as the Washington transaction. In each instance defendant attempted to purchase hay in Imperial county—on April 10th from L. J. Thomas; on April 11th from J. H. Otis; on April 14th from L. A. Harris. Each purchase purported to have been made on behalf of "Adams Hay Company," of Los Angeles. In each instance the vendor became suspicious concerning the supposed "Adams Hay Company" and failed to deliver the hay. In at least one instance defendant gave to the vendor a Los Angeles address as the address of said company, but there was no such company at that place. In one instance the vendor sent a telegram to "Adams Hay Company" at that address, and received a telegraphic reply. The witness George Wright testified concerning these telegrams as follows: "I brought that telegram back to the county jail, and took them both, and in his presence I accused him of being the Adams Hay Company himself, and he said he was." Wright testified that, at the said supposed address of the "Adams Hay Company" of Los Angeles, he found a manufacturing concern, which was manufacturing a bed under a patent of the defendant's father.

[3] We think that there was no error in admitting the evidence of these collateral transactions. Although they did not show the commission of any crime of theft, they did show three several attempts to commit such crime. An attempt of this kind is itself a felony. Pen. Code, § 664. Where fraud is an essential element of a crime, it is necessary to prove the intent with which the actions of the defendant were done. In proving such intent, it is permissible to introduce evidence of like offenses, especially when committed at or about the same time. People v. Lucas, 67 Cal. App. 452, 227 P. 709; People v. Morani, 196 Cal. 154 at pages 158, 159, 236 P. 135.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BASTIAN et al. (Cr. 1490.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 4, 1928.

Witnesses ⚷337(1)—Where defendant takes stand, testimony to reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity, referring to time after commission of offense, is admissible (Code Civ. Proc. § 2051).

Where defendant took stand in prosecution for robbery, he subjected himself to provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, so that testimony regarding his reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity was proper, though it referred to time after commission of offense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Gene Bastian and another were convicted of robbery, and they appeal. Affirmed.

John Corgiat, Jr., of Oakland, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendants have appealed from a judgment of conviction on a charge of robbery, and have brought up a typewritten record, including the judgment roll and a transcript of the reporter's notes. No briefs have been filed by either party.

At the time of the argument the defendants stated that they desired to present but one point. They contended that the trial court erroneously allowed certain witnesses to testify regarding the defendant Bastian's reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity. They asserted that the questions as propounded referred to his reputation down to and including the date of the trial, whereas the investigation should have been limited to an inquiry as to such reputation prior to the commission of the offense charged in the information. They cited in support of this contention People v. Thourwald, 46 Cal. App. 261, 189 P. 124. That case is not helpful. The facts in that case were that Thourwald was on trial charged with the violation of section 288 of the Penal Code; as a part of his case Thourwald introduced testimony that his reputation for morality was good; in rebuttal, the prosecution called three witnesses who testified that it was bad; each of those witnesses was asked the question, "Do you know his general reputation in the town of Dunsmuir for morality?" The court on appeal directed attention to the fact that no objection was made in the trial court presenting the point. However, it is patent that the testimony there under consideration was regarding a factor of the crime itself; whereas in the case before us the question involved is merely one as to the weight of evidence. The defendant Bastian took the stand and testified in behalf of both defendants. Having done so, he subjected himself to the provisions of section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court held to that effect regarding a question as to whether the defendant had been convicted of a felony. People v. Crowley, 100 Cal. 478, 482, 35 P. 84. The same rule was declared regarding evidence as to the general reputation for truth, honesty, or integrity of a defendant who had taken the stand and testified in his own behalf. People v. Prather, 120 Cal. 660, 53 P. 259. Whether the impeachment occurs in one manner or the other, it is addressed to the reputation of the witness prior to his taking the stand, and is not limited by the date the offense on trial is alleged to have been committed.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

KROHN v. BOARD OF WATER AND POWER COM'RS OF CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (Civ. 5529.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 5, 1928.

1. Municipal corporations ⚷218(11)—Insertion in minutes of board of civil service commissioners of statement that charges against city employee were not sustained held sufficient finding in writing.

Insertion in the minutes of the board of civil service commissioners of statement that charges against city employee were not sustained held a sufficient compliance with provision of city charter requiring finding of the board to be in writing; there being no express form required by charter provision, and minutes of the board thoroughly and completely covering the situation, so far as either or any of the interested parties were concerned.

2. Municipal corporations ⚷218(11)—Board of civil service commissioners were not required to conduct hearing in determining propriety of city employee's discharge; "investigate" (Los Angeles City Charter, 112 (a).

Board of civil service commissioners, in determining propriety of discharge of city employee, were not required, by reason of the provisions of Los Angeles City Charter, § 112 (a), St. 1925, pp. 1024, 1067, to conduct a public or judicial hearing, in that the word "investigate" was used in a narrower sense than a public hearing or trial, in view of legislative history as shown by St. 1903, pp. 555, 579, St. 1905, pp. 980, 992, and St. 1911, pp. 2051, 2116.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Mandamus by Alexander Krohn against the Board of Water and Power Commissioners of the City of Los Angeles and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., W. B. Mathews, Clarence S. Hill, Floyd M. Hinshaw, Francis H. Lindley, and Geo. P. Adams, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Rosecrans & Emme, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAUSER, Acting P. J. The appeal herein is predicated upon the following facts: Plaintiff, who was a civil service employee of the city of Los Angeles, was discharged for alleged insubordination. Thereafter plaintiff duly filed a request with the board of civil service commissioners of said city "for an investigation of this case," in pursuance of which one of the members of the said board who had been delegated to perform such duty, after inquiry regarding the circumstances surrounding the discharge of plaintiff, filed with said commission his report, to which were attached several affidavits purporting to deal with the situation. Thereupon the said board of civil service commissioners considered said report and adopted a motion, the effect of which was that the discharge of plaintiff was not sustained and that plaintiff should be restored to duty. The department of the city of Los Angeles in which plaintiff was employed having refused to conform to such finding and order by the civil service commission, on application for writ of mandate, it was ordered and adjudged by the superior court that plaintiff be reinstated in his said position with the city of Los Angeles, pending which plaintiff be paid his regular wages until he be assigned to duty.

The points made by appellants for a reversal of the judgment relate to the jurisdiction of the board of civil service commissioners to make the finding of fact and the order of reinstatement of plaintiff to which reference has been had. Of such points, those which are deemed necessary of consideration by this court are that the finding made by the board of civil service commissioners was not in writing; nor was the "investigation" had by said board such as is contemplated by the provisions of section 112 (a) of the charter of the city of Los Angeles (Stats. 1925, pp. 1024, 1067) governing the situation here presented.

So far as is here material, it will suffice to state that in general said section purports to provide for the procedure incidental to the "removal, discharge, or suspension" for "cause, which shall be stated in writing" of classified civil service employees of the city of Los Angeles, as well as for the investigation of the sufficiency of the "grounds" of such action as affecting any such employee; and in the event of lack of sufficient "grounds" for such "removal, discharge, or suspension," the reinstatement or restoration to duty of such employee. Omitting the portion of the charter provision which deals with the manner of removal of an employee, the section to which reference has been had, among others, contains the following provision: "* * * Upon such filing [statement of cause of removal] such removal, discharge, or suspension shall take effect. Within fifteen days after such statement shall have been filed, the said board, upon its own motion, may, or upon written application of the person so removed, discharged, or suspended, filed with said board within five days after service upon him of such statement, shall proceed to investigate the grounds of such removal, discharge, or suspension. If after such investigation said board finds, in writing, that the grounds stated for such removal, discharge, or suspension were insufficient or were not sustained, and also finds in writing that the person removed, discharged, or suspended is a fit and suitable person to fill the position from which he was removed, discharged, or suspended, said board shall order said person so removed, discharged, or suspended, to be reinstated or restored to duty. * * *"

[1] Appellants contend that the board of civil service commissioners failed to comply with the provision of the charter which requires that the finding shall be "in writing." With reference thereto, by the return to the writ it appears that, as shown by the minutes of the board, the following action was taken:

"Commissioner Buzzell presented a detailed written report of his investigation of the discharge of Alexander Krohn from the position of auto machinist, water and power department, together with affidavits bearing on the conduct of F. M. Vandeventer, foreman, which Mr. Krohn stated had caused him to knock Mr. Vandeventer down. After the reading of Mr. Buzzell's report and the accompanying affidavits it was moved that, as the board considered the charges for which Mr. Krohn was discharged were not sustained and as the board considered him a fit and suitable person to fill the position from which he was removed, Alexander Krohn be restored to his position as auto machinist in the water and power department. The motion was adopted by the following vote: Ayes: Commissioners Schreider, Stoneman, Workman, Buzzell, and Fryman. Noes: None."

Specifically, it is urged by appellants that the insertion in the minutes of the board of the statement that the charges against the employee were not sustained was insufficient, but that such finding should appear by some other and separate instrument or document. It is clear that no one was injured by the course adopted by the board; to the contrary, all the rights of either the employee or of the employer were as fully and adequately protected thereby as might or could have been done by virtue of any other procedure which has been suggested. No express form is required by the charter provision, and it is manifest that the substance has been preserved. Whatever may be said of the claimed lack of regularity in compliance with the possibly lawful requirement of what might be termed a "red tape" finding, with all its accompanying various and sundry legal technicalities, it is unquestionable that so far as either or any of the interested parties were concerned, the minutes of the board thoroughly and completely covered the situation.

[2] Probably a more serious objection of appellants is that the "investigation" had by the board of civil service commissioners was such that no jurisdiction existed in it as a foundation for its assumed power in making the order of reinstatement of the employee. In this connection, several different interesting legal questions are submitted for consideration by this court—all of which, however, being primarily dependent upon the construction of the charter provision affecting the "investigation" by the board of the grounds for the discharge of the employee. Reverting to the provision in question, it will be noted that its requirements are that either "upon its own motion," or by reason of the application of the discharged employee, the board "may * * *" or "shall proceed to investigate the grounds for such removal, * * *" It is claimed by appellants that the meaning or significance of the word "investigate" is identical with the word "hearing" or "trial," and that as so construed the procedure adopted and pursued by the board in reaching its conclusion with reference to the sufficiency of the "grounds" for the removal of the employee was wholly irregular and of no validity so far as conferring jurisdiction on the board was concerned.

The history of the section of the charter of the city of Los Angeles would point to a different conclusion. Ordinarily a trial of the nature of that here in question is a result following the filing of charges or an accusation of some sort at which the accused may have the right to be heard in his own defense. Also, the trial tribunal may administer oaths, issue subpœnas for witnesses and enforce the production at the trial of books, papers, documents, etc., pertinent to the inquiry. The charter of 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 455) contains no provision relating to the point at issue. It is not until 1903 (Stats. 1903, p. 555) that any legislation may be found affecting the remedy for alleged wrongful discharge of civil service employees of the city of Los Angeles. Section 242 of the latter act or concurrent resolution (Stats. 1903, p. 579) provides that:

"No officer or employé in the classified civil service of this city other than one belonging to the police force or fire force, who shall have been appointed under said rules, and after said examination, shall be removed or discharged except for cause upon written charges, and after an opportunity to be heard in his own defense. Such charges shall be publicly investigated by the civil service commission. The finding and decision of such commission shall be final and shall be certified to the appointing officer, and shall be forthwith enforced by such officer. Nothing in this article shall limit the power of any officer to suspend a subordinate for a reasonable period, not exceeding thirty days. In the course of an investigation of charges each member of the commission shall have power to administer oaths, and shall have the power to secure by its subpœna both the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books and papers relevant to such investigation for any cause. Nothing in this section shall be construed to require such charges or investigation in case of unskilled laborers."

Said section 242, to which reference has just been had, was amended at the next session of the Legislature (Stats. 1905, pp. 980, 992), by eliminating therefrom the following provision: "In the course of an investigation of charges each member of the commission shall have power to administer oaths, and shall have the power to secure by its subpœna both the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books and papers relevant to such investigation for any cause."

Although the charter was variously amended in the years 1907 and 1909, the section thereof relating to public hearing on written charges against an employee remained intact until the year 1911, when it was amended by section 241, pp. 2051, 2116, Statutes of 1911. That amendment was carried practically verbatim into the present charter of the city of Los Angeles (sec. 112 (a), Stats. 1925, pp. 1024, 1067), and, as hereinbefore set forth, instead of providing for a discharge of an employee only for "cause upon written charges, and after an opportunity to be heard in his own defense," and that such charges be publicly "investigated"—the provision was inserted that either upon written application therefor by the discharged employee, or upon the board's own motion, the board should "proceed to investigate the grounds for such removal. * * * "

Further consideration of the charter of 1903 (Stats. 1903, pp. 555, 579) discloses further procedural provisions ordinarily incident to a public hearing or trial, in that in connection therewith each member of the civil service commission is given the power to administer oaths and to secure by subpœna "both the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books and papers relevant to such investigation. * * * " As compared with the charter provision of 1903, it may be noted that nowhere in the present charter provision relating to the "investigation" of the grounds of discharge of an employee is any language employed either identical with, or even similar to, the words or phrases "written charges," "opportunity to be heard in his own defense," publicly investigated," "administer oaths," "subpœna," "attendance of witnesses," or "production of books and papers"—which characterize the procedure and powers indicated in the charter of 1903.

Attention is also directed to the language of the present charter provision to the effect that within 15 days following the filing of the statement containing the "cause" of the discharge of the employee, the board of civil service commissioners "upon its own motion may * * * proceed to investigate the grounds of such removal. * * * " Assuming that a proposed "investigation" necessarily should take the form of a trial in its ordinary sense, it would seem at least unusual, if not irregular or incongruous, that the court itself should initiate the proceedings. It is therefore evident that the difference between the procedure and powers skeletonized by the provisions of the 1903 charter, and that of the present charter, is radical and significant. It points, if not conclusively, at least distinctly, to an intention on the part of the framers of the charter, and of the Legislature in its resolution, to an abandonment of anything resembling a judicial hearing on the application by the discharged employee for an "investigation" of the grounds of his removal from his position.

In the state of New York it has been held that a provision of a statute, in effect that a civil service employee shall not be removed "until he has been informed of the cause of his removal and has been allowed an opportunity for explanation," is clearly distinguishable in its procedural requirements from a provision which provides for removal of such an employee "for cause after opportunity to be heard." People v. Thompson, 94 N. Y. 451; People v. La Grange, 2 App. Div. 444, 37 N. Y. S. 991; People v. Cruger, 17 App. Div. 483, 45 N. Y. S. 519; People ex rel. Lawson v. Coler, 40 App. Div. 65, 57 N. Y. S. 636. In the case last cited it was held that the language of the statute to the effect that the employee might be discharged only after he had been informed of the cause of his proposed removal and had been "allowed an opportunity for explanation" did not contemplate a public hearing or trial of the matter. In connection therewith, in part the court said: "* * * The charges were not verified under oath, no witnesses were sworn, and the hearing was had before the deputy comptroller, instead of before the comptroller himself. These objections would be substantial, if the opportunity to make an explanation, provided for by the act of 1898 [Laws 1898, c. 186], was in any sense a trial. * * * The act of 1898 contemplates no such formal procedure. It requires nothing more than that the reasons inducing the contemplated removal shall be communicated to the person proposed to be dismissed, and that he shall be fairly heard, if he desires to be heard, in his own behalf, to explain any alleged misconduct, neglect, or incapacity on his part. * * * It seems to afford adequate protection if made to a principal deputy, who communicates it to the superior officer, by whom the removal must actually be made. * * *"

The case of Price v. City of Seattle, 39 Wash. 376, 81 P. 847, is also in point, in that it deals with, and lays down the principle of, the conclusive right of a city to adopt such procedure as it may see fit with reference to the discharge of its employees.

It is therefore concluded that, in the use of the word "investigate," as contained within the charter provision of the present charter of the city of Los Angeles, the legislative intention was to narrow its significance to something less than a public hearing or trial, as those words are generally understood; and that the position of the civil service commission in its relation to the several departments of administration of the city of Los Angeles wherein assistants were employed in the classified civil service of said city, was analogous to that of a superior or chief executive officer of a corporation toward its departmental manager or foreman, so far only as "investigating" or examining into the cause of discharge of an employee was concerned. Assuming the correctness of such determination, the right and power of the board of civil service commissioners to adopt and to pursue such reasonable course as it saw fit with reference to its "investigation" is unquestioned. The jurisdiction being thus established, the findings and order of the board of civil service commissioners in the premises are conclusive.

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

BAUCUS v. RIVEROLL. (Civ. 5338.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 1, 1928.

1. Stipulations ⚷17(3)—Order disregarding parties' stipulation is discretionary.

Order of court, disregarding a stipulation entered into between parties to an action, is discretionary.

2. Appeal and error ⚷949—Order disregarding stipulation will be disturbed only when clearly shown to be result of abuse of discretion.

Order of court, disregarding stipulation entered into between parties to an action, will be disturbed on appeal only when it clearly appears that order was the result of an abuse of discretion.

3. Judgment ⚷363—Motion to vacate judgment and require filing of findings of fact held properly granted, where consent to waive findings was inadvertently given.

Motion to vacate judgment and to require filing of findings of facts and conclusions of law held properly granted, where it appeared that consent of plaintiff to waive findings of fact was inadvertently given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by B. D. Baucus against E. Riveroll. Judgment for defendant. From an order granting plaintiff's motion to vacate judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Denis & Griffith, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. On the conclusion of a trial before the court without a jury, the judge announced that judgment would be rendered in favor of defendant. Thereupon, on request of defendant, plaintiff waived findings of fact, and judgment was entered accordingly. Within a few days following the entry of said judgment, plaintiff gave defendant notice of a motion to vacate the judgment, and to require the filing of findings of fact and conclusions of law in the action.

The court granted the motion and the appeal herein is from such order.

[1, 2] Appellant contends, first, that the court was without authority to set aside the stipulation of the parties; and, secondly, "that such action on the part of the lower court amounted to an abuse of discretion." That an order of a court disregarding a stipulation entered into between the parties to an action is discretionary, and that such order may be disturbed only when it clearly appears that the order was the result of an abuse of discretion, see authorities under sections 63 to 76, inclusive, title "Stipulations," volume 44, Century edition, American Digest; also, in succeeding volumes of the American Digest, under section 12 of the same title.

[3] It appearing that the affidavit in support of the motion here under consideration set forth facts sufficient to show that the consent of plaintiff to waive findings of fact in the action was inadvertently given, this court is unable to agree with appellant in his contention that, in granting the motion to which reference has been had, the court abused its discretion.

SPIEGELMAN v. EASTMAN. (Civ. 3645.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 30, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑933(1)—Same presumptions attach to order granting new trial by different judge as in case order was made by judge presiding at trial.

Same presumptions attach to order granting a new trial by a different judge that would have attached to order if made by judge before whom the cause was heard.

2. Bills and notes 🔑296—Assignor's concealment of fact that he had taken unsecured note as payment of installments constituted fraud based on implied warranty, by reason of qualified indorsement (Civ. Code, §§ 1710, subd. 3, 1774, 3146).

Assignor's concealment of fact that, instead of receiving payments on installment note, he had taken an unsecured promissory note for unpaid installments and had written off interest due, held to constitute fraud within Civ. Code, § 1710, subd. 3, and sections 1774, 3146, based on implied warranty, by reason of qualified indorsement, that he had no knowledge of any fact which would impair validity of instrument or render it valueless.

3. Bills and notes 🔑296—Qualified indorsement does not relieve indorser from liability in accordance with implied warranty.

While a qualified indorsement on a promissory note relieves indorser from position of security for payment, it does not permit a transfer of worthless paper and still leaves indorser liable as vendor with warranty that instrument is genuine and that indorser has good title thereto, without knowledge of any facts impairing validity of instrument or rendering it valueless.

4. Bills and notes 🔑296—Indorser "without recourse" warrants that he possesses no knowledge which would indicate insolvency on part of maker of note.

Though an indorser "without recourse" does not warrant solvency of maker, nevertheless he does warrant that he possesses no knowledge which he would indicate insolvency on part of maker or that he does not know of anything which would tend to indicate that payor of note would be unable to make payment.

5. New trial 🔑68—Order granting new trial cannot be sustained in case evidence establishes any one cause of action.

6. New trial 🔑102(3)—New trial was properly denied for newly discovered evidence consisting of testimony of witnesses known to attorneys, two of whom testified during trial.

Where alleged newly discovered evidence consisted of testimony by witnesses known to attorneys, two of whom were on the witness stand and examined at length during the trial, and conversation claimed as newly discovered evidence was mentioned during testimony given on trial, new trial because of such evidence was properly denied.

and determined by Hon. Hartley Shaw, and granted on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, and on the further ground of newly discovered evidence, and though, as held in the cases of Jones v. Sanders, 103 Cal. 678, 37 P. 649, and Garton v. Stern, 121 Cal. 347, 53 P. 904, the same presumptions attach to the order made by Judge Shaw that would have attached to the order granting a new trial if made by Judge Norton, yet, if any one of the causes of action relied upon by the plaintiff is established without any substantial conflict in the testimony, the order granting a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence cannot be sustained.

The action was begun by the plaintiff to recover the sum of $26,600 as the unpaid portion of the purchase price of an apartment house sold by the plaintiff to the defendant. By the terms of the sale, the defendant agreed to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $47,000, as follows: $16,500 cash, $26,600 by assigning the note of one Philips, secured by chattel mortgage, $1,250 by assigning a chattel mortgage on certain machinery, and $2,650, by the personal note of the defendant, payable on or before 6 months.

The only item involved in this action is the $26,600 represented by the Philips note and chattel mortgage. The face of the Philips note was for $28,000, dated April 26, 1924, and payable at the rate of $350 per month until January 26, 1926, and at the rate of $1,100 per month thereafter. The apparent face of the note and of the installments accruing after September, 1924, the date of the sale by the plaintiff to the defendant of the apartment house referred to, amounted to $26,600. The Philips note was secured by a chattel mortgage covering furniture in a certain building known as the Victoria Hotel. The same mortgage also secured a note, set out in the chattel mortgage, for the sum of $12,000, signed by Jack E. Philips and Mrs. Olive Philips. The note involved in this action was signed only by Jack E. Philips. At the time of the execution of the $28,000 mortgage on the 26th day of April, 1924, and also at the time of its transfer by the defendant to the plaintiff, the property mortgaged was covered by two prior mortgages, one given to secure the rent of the hotel at the rate of $1,350 per month, and the second given to Mr. and Mrs. Troutman in the sum of $15,000, and hereinafter referred to as the Troutman mortgage. The defendant guaranteed the payment of the first $5,000 to be paid by Philips on the $26,600 note; this, by a separate instrument. The note itself was transferred by the defendant without recourse. The note dated April 26, 1924, given, as hereinbefore stated, in the sum of $28,000, bore upon the reverse side thereof the following indorsement: "Paid May 26, 1924, $350; paid June 26, 1924, $350; paid July 26, 1924, $350; paid interest to July 26, 1924, $490; paid August 26, 1924, $350"—apparently reducing the amount due on the note to the sum of $26,600, and showing apparent installment payments and an interest payment in the aggregate sum of $1,890. These installments, however, were not in fact paid, the defendant simply taking from Jack E. Philips an unsecured promissory note for $1,400 and indorsing upon the note an interest payment of $490, without the receipt of either cash or promissory note. In other words, as appears further in the transcript, the interest was simply marked off, or, in the language of one of the parties, "forgiven."

Without taking into consideration the rental agreed to be paid by Jack Philips for the Victoria Hotel, which called for the payment of $1,350 per month, the record shows the following indebtedness of Jack Philips and the liens against the personal property, furniture, good will, etc., including leasehold interest of the Victoria Hotel:

First. A mortgage to secure the payment of the monthly rental accruing on the lease.

Second. A mortgage to George D. Troutman and Lucille C. Troutman, in the sum of $15,000.

Third. An incumbrance in the form of lease contract in the sum of $10,500.

Fourth. A furniture contract, introduced as Exhibit B, calling for the payment of $300 per month, with 8 per cent. interest for 7 months, and thereafter $500 per month for 5 months, bearing interest at 8 per cent.

Fifth. A certain other incumbrance due the Baker Linen Company, for $875. These items aggregate the sum of $20,475, excluding the lease contract of $10,500, which, together with the two notes included in the mortgage given, in part, to secure the $28,000 note, show a total indebtedness of $60,475. The testimony of the defendant, as well as the testimony of some other witnesses, was to the effect that the furniture, leasehold interest, and good will of the Victoria Hotel was of the value of, and would sell for, about $45,000. It does not appear that Jack E. Philips had any other property than that covered by the liens and mortgages herein referred to.

The complaint is in three counts. In the first cause of action set forth in the complaint the plaintiff seeks to recover from the defendant the sum of $26,600 and interest, on the grounds of fraud, to wit, that the defendant made certain fraudulent representations as to the value of the note, and that the plaintiff was thereby induced to accept the same as part payment on the purchase price of the Ambassador Hotel. The second cause of action is based upon the implied warranty of the defendant, by reason of the qualified indorsement on the note, to wit, that he had no knowledge of any fact which would impair the validity of the instrument or render it valueless. The third cause of action is based upon mistake, in that it is alleged that the plaintiff accepted the $26,600 note under the mistaken view or understanding that Jack Philips, the maker thereof, was solvent, that he had no information, and no information was given to him of anything which would tend to show his insolvency, and also under the mistaken understanding that Olive Philips, the mother of the defendant, had signed the $28,000 note.

[2] In the consideration of the issues presented upon this appeal, the testimony as to the first and second causes of action set forth in the complaint overlap, yet there is a clear distinction between what is required to prove the first cause of action and the testimony necessary to sustain the second cause of action. In addition to what we have hereinbefore stated, the record shows that, immediately after acquiring the $28,000 note hereinbefore referred to, the defendant placed the same in the hands of a broker named Odell, to be by him disposed of. Odell was given information as to the amount due on the note, but was given no information as to the installment payments thereon having been marked as paid without being paid, nor was he given any information as to the marking off of the interest due on the note by an indorsement thereon indicating that the interest had been paid. The first offer to the plaintiff to purchase the Ambassador Hotel and include the note in part payment therefor, was made by Odell on behalf of the defendant, in which offer it was represented that there was then due on the $28,000 note the sum of $26,950. This offer was not acceptable, and thereafter, on or about the 10th day of September, 1924, an offer was made which was acceptable to all parties, and in this offer the amount due on the $28,000 note was, in consideration of the indorsements thereon, figured at $26,600. The assignment of the note and mortgage stated the balance due on the $28,000 note to be $26,600. The record shows that the $12,000 note secured by the same chattel mortgage as the $28,000 note was signed by Mrs. Olive Philips as well as by Jack E. Philips, and that Mrs. Philips was reputed to be a very wealthy woman, thus giving additional strength and security for the payment of that note. This note, however, was not included in the assignment to the plaintiff. The defendant testified, in substance, that he made no special effort to collect the installments falling due on the $28,000 note; that he had given no consideration to the insolvency of Philips, and thought that he would be able to work out of his difficulties; that the scare over the hoof and mouth disease prevalent during the latter part of 1924 had lessened the tourist travel and interfered with the apartment house business. The record, however, shows that the financial condition of Philips, known to the defendant, was such as to lead unerringly to the conclusion that Philips, at all times after giving the $12,000 note and the $28,000 note on April 26, 1924, was insolvent. Section 3450, Civil Code, relating to assignments for the benefit of creditors, defines an insolvent in the following language: "A debtor is insolvent, within the meaning of this title, when he is unable to pay his debts from his own means, as they become due."

While the maker of the $28,000 note had not made any assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and therefore this section of the Code is applicable only as a definition, yet the situation presented is exactly parallel with the one described in the Code as testified to by the defendant, the business Philips, the maker of the note, was conducting did not yield sufficient revenue to enable him to make payment of the installments as they came due on his indebtedness. The record shows that, including the security given to cover the lease, there was an indebtedness of over $70,000, almost one-half of which was prior in point of time to the mortgage held by the defendant, and more than half of which was prior to the $28,000 note assigned to the plaintiff, and, at the same time, the property securing the indebtedness was valued at about $45,000, including the leasehold interest, good will, and all that went to make up the business. This shows the payment of the installments could not be enforced or obtained out of any means belonging to Philips by reason of the prior liens. It is true the defendant testified that the indorsements made on the $28,000 note, indicating that installments thereon had been paid when nothing had been paid, was not done with intent to defraud, but this testimony has little or no weight in view of the fact that parties holding secured notes do not, in the ordinary course of business, waive the security, mark off the interest due, and take an unsecured note representing only a portion of the amount credited on the back of the secured instrument. Being directly contrary to the usual course of business, and no other explanation having been given than that herein referred to, only one conclusion can be reached from the transaction under consideration, and that is a purpose to give to the $28,000 note an apparent value which it did not possess; likewise to give to the maker thereof an apparent ability to pay the installments on the notes as they became due, which he did not possess. The $28,000 note was in the hands of a broker for sale, and its transfer or commercial value depended directly upon the payment of the monthly installments specified therein. While we are setting forth these matters primarily in relation to the second cause of action contained in the plaintiff's complaint, we see no escape from the further conclusion that the defendant was seeking by this subterfuge and concealment of the true situation to pass a worthless piece of paper on to some uninformed person, and thus gain something for nothing, an act which is expressly denounced by the third clause of section 1710 of the Civil Code, which describes deceit as follows: "The suppression of a fact, by one who is bound to disclose it, or who gives information of other facts which are likely to mislead for want of communication of that fact." Here the apparent information was that the installments accruing had been paid. The concealment consisted in the fact that, instead of receiving payment, the defendant had taken an unsecured promissory note for the unpaid installments, and had written off the interest due. If that does not also amount to a fraud upon an uninformed purchaser of such a note, we do not understand the meaning of the word. What we have said relates to uncontradicted testimony, and establishes the first cause of action, were it not for the technical defect, if it be a defect in this case, of the omission of one question and one answer in the record, to wit, a question as to whether the plaintiff relied upon the record representations as shown thereby, and an answer thereto that he did.

We do not need to decide whether, when the fraud consists in deceit or concealment, such testimony of reliance thereon is necessary to make out a case of fraud. The uncontradicted testimony in this case and what we have hereinbefore set forth brings this case so clearly within the second cause of action set forth in plaintiff's complaint that we do not need to dwell at length upon either the first or the second cause of action. The $28,000 note was transferred by a qualified indorsement, and therefore carries with it the warranty created by law. Section 3146, Civil Code, reads: "Every person negotiating an instrument by delivery or by a qualified indorsement, warrants—(1) That the instrument is genuine and in all respects what it purports to be; (2) That he has a good title to it; (3) That all prior parties had capacity to contract; (4) That he has no knowledge of any fact which would impair the validity of the instrument or render it valueless." And section 1774 of the same Code reads: "One who sells or agrees to sell an instrument purporting to bind anyone to the performance of an act, thereby warrants that he has no knowledge of any facts which tend to prove it worthless, such as the insolvency of any of the parties thereto, where that is material, the extinction of its obligations or its invalidity for any cause." Turning to section 3146, Civil Code, the act of the defendant directly violated the first subdivision thereof, where it says that such an indorser "warrants that the instrument is genuine and in all respects what it purports to be." For the purposes of this discussion it may be admitted that the instrument was genuine, but it was not in all respects what it purported to be. The instrument purported to be one upon which $1,890 had been paid in installments and in interest, whereas in truth and in fact not one cent had been paid. By the Code section referred to the defendant likewise warranted that he had no knowledge of any fact which would impair the validity of the instrument or render it valueless. This again was directly violated by the defendant, who knew that he was unable to collect the installments accruing upon the note. He knew that the maker of the note, as shown by the record which we have recited, was absolutely financially unable to meet the installments, and that the maker of the note had no property whatever out of which the installments could be realized by legal proceedings. Turning to section 1774, Civil Code, we find that the defendant violated the warranty that he had no knowledge of any facts which would tend to prove the instrument worthless, such as the insolvency of the parties thereto. This latter is given only as an illustration, but in this particular case it applies, because the defendant did know, from what we have set forth and shown, that he could not have avoided knowing of facts which tended to prove the paper worthless, such as the example given in the Code provision, the insolvency of the maker of the note, the fact that the maker of the note was mortgaged for almost twice the value of property he possessed, and that the property possessed was not bringing sufficient income to enable Philips to meet the accruing installments due on his indebtedness. The record shows that, subsequent to the transfer to the plaintiff of the note involved in this action, foreclosure proceedings were begun against Philips on the prior liens mentioned in this opinion, but is not considered as bearing upon any issues presented for determination.

[3, 4] While a qualified indorsement on a promissory note relieves the indorser from the position of a security for its payment, it does not open the door for the transfer of worthless paper. As said in 19 California Jurisprudence, p. 882, § 70: "One who exempts himself from liability as an indorser by using the expression 'without recourse', or its equivalent, does not stand freed from all obligation with respect to the indorsement. His liability to subsequent parties is precisely the same as the liability of a transferor to his transferee, where the instrument is negotiated by delivery only. An indorsement 'without recourse' still leaves the indorser liable as a vendor with the following warranties: That the instrument is genuine and in all respects what it purports to be; that the indorser has a good title to it; * * * and that the indorser has no knowledge of any fact which would impair the validity of the instrument or render it valueless." Section 1774 incorporates, also, the warranty that the transferor has no knowledge of anything which would tend to show the insolvency of the payor. Likewise, as said in Carroll v. Nodine, 41 Or. 412, 69 P. 51, 93 Am. St. Rep. 743: "On an indorsement 'without recourse' there is an implied warranty by the seller that the paper is what it purports to be, and that no payments have been made except those which appear to be indorsed thereon, and that such as so appear are genuine and operate to continue the obligation in force as against the Statute of Limitations."

As we have shown herein, the indorsement appearing upon the notes transferred to the plaintiff are not genuine; they are simply fictitious indorsements made thereon to give the note a fictitious value. While an indorser "without recourse" does not warrant the solvency of the maker, he does warrant that he possesses no knowledge which would indicate insolvency on the part of the maker, or, to use a different expression, that he does not know of anything which would tend to indicate that the payor of the note would be unable to make payment, which is equivalent to insolvency where one is unable to pay his debts and has no means out of which payment can be obtained, as the record conclusively shows in this case. In support of what we have here stated, we may further refer to the case of State Exchange Bank v. National Bank of Commerce, 70 Okl. 234, 174 P. 796, 2 A. L. R. 211, and the extended note following said case. There is likewise a distinction to be drawn between fraud and warranty. This distinction is best shown by quoting the language of the text found in 22 California Jurisprudence, 960: "While the fact that the defendant acted with superior knowledge is the gist of the action, whether it be one on the case for false representation, or upon contract, for breach of warranty, there is, in theory at least, a plain distinction between fraud and warranty in respect to the degree of the defendant's knowledge. To support the action for deceit, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant was aware of the falsity of his statement, or, at any rate, that he spoke with a conscious lack of knowledge as to the truth, whereas, to the maintenance of an action for breach of warranty, it is not essential to show that the seller consciously misstated the fact as to the quality, fitness or value of the goods or thing; the plaintiff need only establish an assumption by the seller of superior knowledge as to the fact—a state of mind which is perfectly consistent with good faith or a belief in the truth of the statement. In short, fraud or deceit is proved by the fact that the defendant knew the statement to be false, whereas, breach of warranty is established by proof that he ought to have known that it was erroneous."

[5] In support of the contention that the same rules apply as to pleading, practice, and testimony in cases of implied warranty, where the warranty is created by law, that applies to actions based upon fraudulent misrepresentation, and that the plaintiff must show by testimony, not only that the representations were made, but that he relied upon them, the defendant cites the case of Crocker-Woolworth National Bank v. Nevada Bank, 139 Cal. 564, 73 P. 456, 63 L. R. A. 245, 96 Am. St. Rep. 169. An examination of that case, however, shows that it is inapplicable, as it was based upon representations, and not upon an implied warranty or warranty created by law; and this is true in relation to the case of Goings v. White, 33 Ind. 126, cited in Crocker-Woolworth v. Nevada Bank, supra, in support of the language there used, which, if the distinction is not carefully made between fraudulent representations and warranties created by law, would lead to the conclusion that the case holds there is no distinction between the two. The case of Pepper v. Vedova, 26 Cal. App. 406, 409, 147 P. 105, draws the distinction which we are here making, and likewise refers to the case of Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 P. 1011, where the same subject is considered, showing a distinction between fraudulent representations and warranties which enter into and become a part of the contract by reason of the Code provisions which we have heretofore cited. Again, as said in 35 Cyc. p. 368: "There is a definite distinction between representation and warranty, although it is sometimes difficult to determine whether a given statement is the one or the other. A representation is an antecedent statement made as an inducement to the contract, but not a part of or an element in the contract, whereas a warranty becomes, by agreement, a part of the contract. The untruthfulness of the representation, unless material or fraudulent, will not affect the contract. On the other hand, in the case of a warranty, it is immaterial whether the seller knew his statements were untrue or not. A statement is none the less a warranty because it is false and fraudulent. In the case of a warranty, however, the rights of the purchaser rest in contract, while in the case of representation and fraud they are based on tort."

In the case at bar, the rights of the purchaser of the note in question rest upon contract. He took the note with certain warranties written into it by operation of law. These warranties, as we have just stated, constituted a part and parcel of the contract, and, when the plaintiff, suing upon the contract, established a breach thereof, by uncontradicted testimony, a case was made out which necessitated a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. Any other verdict would have been contrary to both the law and the facts. This being true, the order of the trial court granting a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence is without support. One cause of action set forth in the plaintiff's complaint being thus established, and no question being raised as to the correctness of the instructions given by the court to the jury, the verdict should stand. While it is alleged that the court erred in refusing certain proffered instructions, no argument is made and nothing set forth in the briefs to show in what particular the court erred, and while, under the circumstances, we are not compelled so to do, we have examined the refused instructions and find no cause of complaint on the action of the trial court in refusing the same, or in instructing the jury as to the issues involved in this action. It is unnecessary for us to consider further either the first or the third cause of action set forth in the plaintiff's complaint, for the simple reason that, if one cause of action is properly made out and sustained, as we have stated, the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

[6] In relation to the subject of newly discovered evidence, the law is well summarized in 20 California Jurisprudence, p. 77, § 55, as follows: "To entitle a party to a new trial on this ground it must appear that the evidence, and not merely its materiality is newly discovered; that the evidence is not cumulative, merely; that the evidence is something as to render a different result probable, on a new trial; that the party seeking relief could not, with reasonable diligence, have discovered and produced the evidence at the trial." The affidavits in support of the motion for new trial fall short of any of these requirements. The witnesses whose testimony is claimed to constitute newly discovered evidence are named as J. E. Philips, Mrs. Phoebe Philips, E. A. Odell, and F. J. Easley. The record shows that, of these witnesses, J. E. Philips, mentioned in the record as Jack Philips, and E. Odell, testified repeatedly during the course of the trial. The examination of both witnesses was very exhaustive. They testified as to all of the subject-matter embraced in the recitals contained in the affidavits. Mrs. Phoebe Philips is the wife of Jack Philips, and her presence at the conversation related by her in her affidavit was repeatedly testified to by the witnesses Jack Philips, Olive Philips, and the plaintiff. The remaining witness, F. J. Easley, was a clerk at the hotel kept by Jack Philips, and reference to him is made in the testimony of Jack Philips. It is thus shown that all of the witnesses whose testimony is now claimed to constitute newly discovered evidence were known to the attorneys for the defendant; that two of them were on the witness stand and were examined at length; that the conversation constituting the newly discovered evidence purports to be a conversation which took place at the very instant of time mentioned in the testimony of Jack Philips, wherein he refers to a visit of the plaintiff to the Victoria Hotel at a time preceding the 10th day of September, 1924. The record contains an affidavit, on the part of the plaintiff, showing that the conversation referred to in the affidavit, had with the plaintiff, occurred after the transfer of the note and mortgage when the plaintiff subsequently visited the Victoria Hotel. Be that as it may, the record shows that the attorneys for the defendant and the defendant himself knew all the parties who were present in the Victoria Hotel; that their names were mentioned; that the conversation supposed to have been had with the plaintiff and Philips was detailed by Philips, and now it is sought to add thereto additional testimony as to the conversation referred to, when the defendant and his counsel made no attempt whatever, so far as the record shows, to ascertain whether they had brought out in full the entire conversation had between the plaintiff and Philips relative to the Victoria Hotel. The affidavits seek now to introduce testimony that during said conversation Philips stated, in substance, to the plaintiff that he was not meeting his installment payments. This would touch the question of fraud, but not the question of warranty. It would extend this opinion to too great a length to review the testimony of the different witnesses and review the alleged newly discovered evidence, but the record shows that the defendant is resting his case upon the statement that he and his counsel did not know of the testimony, and made no attempt whatever to show any effort to discover all the claimed facts relative to the conversation now sought to be made the basis of a motion for new trial. Where no effort is shown to have been made to produce the alleged newly discovered evidence, and where the record shows that, if any effort whatever had been made, all of the alleged facts might have been ascertained, no foundation is laid for the granting of a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence.

It follows from what we have said that the order granting a new trial in this cause must be, and the same is, hereby reversed, and the judgment affirmed.

CITY OF NORTH SACRAMENTO v. IRWIN.
(Civ. 3688.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 1, 1928.

Municipal corporations 🔑918(2)—Recitals in ordinance calling bond election, though unnecessary, cannot be treated as surplusage.

Where ordinance calling bond election stated the time when first payments of principal and interest would be made, the recitals thereof cannot be treated as surplusage, though it was unnecessary to recite such date, in that the proposition as stated in ordinance was the only one approved by the voters, and vote authorizing indebtedness imports the particulars named as conditions on which that assent was given.

On rehearing. Rehearing denied.

For former opinion, see 271 P. 788.

Chas. L. Gilmore, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

W. O. Irwin, in pro. per.

FINCH, P. J. The petitioner has applied for a rehearing. It is urged that it was unnecessary to recite, in the ordinance calling the election, when the first payments of principal and interest would be made, and therefore the recitals thereof may be treated as surplusage and that they constitute "no part whatever of the proposition voted upon by the elector." The proposition as stated in the ordinance, however, was the one, and the only one, approved by the voters. As said in Skinner v. City of Santa Rosa, 107 Cal. 464, 472, 40 P. 742, 745 (29 L. R. A. 512): "Particulars were inserted in the submission which the statute did not require to be submitted; but these particulars having been submitted, the vote authorizing the indebtedness to be incurred imports the particulars named as the conditions upon which that assent has been given, and hence no one can say that without these favorable conditions the result of the election would have authorized the indebtedness to be incurred." Petitioner relies upon City of Santa Barbara v. Davis, 6 Cal. App. 342, 92 P. 308; Derby v. City of Modesto, 104 Cal. 515, 38 P. 900; and Law v. San Francisco, 144 Cal. 384, 77 P. 1014. In each of those cases the departure in the issuance of the bonds from the recitals in the ordinance calling the election was in respect to the number of the bonds and not the times or amounts of the annual payments thereof. In the first of these cases the proposition submitted to the voters was the issuance of 40 bonds of $1,250 each, payable one each year. The ordinance adopted pursuant to the approval of such proposition by the voters provided for the issuance of 80 bonds of $625 each, payable two each year. Manifestly, the variance was immaterial and in no sense increased the burden on the taxpayer. The other cases relied on by petitioner are to the same effect.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

ANTHONY v. CROCKER FIRST NAT. BANK. (Civ. 6577.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 7, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Findings on substantially conflicting evidence that bond interest coupons were deposited with bank for collection only will not be disturbed on appeal.

Findings, based on substantially conflicting evidence, that depositor and bank agreed that bond interest coupons, amount of which were credited to depositor's account, were deposited for collection only, and that advance to depositor was conditioned on collection thereof, and that depositor was instructed not to draw any further checks against account until bank reported collection, will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Appeal and error 🔑204(3)—Contention that bank passbook constituted written contract, which could not be varied by parol testimony, cannot prevail on appeal, where no objection was made to such evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 1856).

Contention that bank passbook, showing unrestricted credit for amount of bond interest coupons, constituted written contract, which could not be varied by parol testimony that coupons were deposited for collection only, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, cannot prevail on appeal, where no objection was made to such evidence.

3. Evidence 🔑408(1)—Bank passbook is not "written contract," which cannot be varied by parol testimony (Civ. Code, § 1625; Code Civ. Proc. § 1856).

A bank passbook does not constitute a contract in writing, within Civ. Code, § 1625, so as to preclude parol testimony, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, that bond interest coupons, amount of which was credited to depositor, were deposited for collection only.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Written Contract.]

4. Banks and banking 🔑134(1)—Statute held to entitle bank to charge uncollectible bond interest coupons to depositor's account (Bank Act, § 16c).

Under Bank Act (St. 1925, p. 513) § 16c, which became part of terms under which uncollectible bond interest coupons were deposited with bank, which forwarded them for collection on following day, it was entitled to charge them to depositor's account, in absence of written agreement to contrary.

5. Banks and banking 🔑159—Bank held entitled to judgment against depositor for amount advanced on uncollectible bond interest coupons deposited for collection only, irrespective of statute (Bank Act, § 16c).

Uncollectible bond interest coupons having been deposited with bank for collection only, not sold to it, it was entitled to judgment against depositor for amount advanced thereon, irrespective of Bank Act (St. 1925, p. 513), § 16c.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Lee Anthony against the Crocker First National Bank, which filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sawyer & Sawyer and F. W. Sawyer, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Morrison, Hohfeld, Foerster, Shuman & Clark and W. T. Fitzgerald, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff commenced this action to recover from the defendant the sum of $2,320. Defendant denied the alleged indebtedness, and by way of cross-complaint prayed judgment against plaintiff in the sum of $500. The court denied plaintiff any relief, and gave judgment for the defendant in accordance with the prayer of its cross-complaint. From said judgment the plaintiff appeals.

[1] In support of his cause of action, the plaintiff, Lee Anthony, testified that on the 15th day of June, 1926, he called at defendant's banking house in San Francisco, and asked Charles Pratt, Jr., an assistant cashier of the defendant, if they would purchase 94 interest coupons of Santa Fé Railway bonds, their face value being $2,820; that after examining said coupons Mr. Pratt stated they were the same as cash, and the bank would buy them. The bank then issued to him a depositor's passbook of the bank, and he was given a credit of $2,820 therein, and he immediately drew a check thereon in the sum of $500. Mr. Pratt then introduced him to the cashier of the bank, with directions to the latter to cash the check, stating that the check was all right and plaintiff had money there. The check was thereupon paid. The bank thereafter refused to pay any more checks, or to pay him the balance due as shown by his passbook.

In sharp conflict with this testimony is that of Charles Pratt, Jr., who testified that there was no conversation as to the bank purchasing the coupons, and that it was explained to plaintiff the bank would take them for collection, and he assented thereto; that a depositor's passbook was thereupon issued to plaintiff, in which he was given a credit for the face value of said coupons, but he was told not to check upon the account until the bank had made collection of the money; that plaintiff thereupon requested an advancement of $1,000 to pay some hospital bills, and that amount was refused. After further conversation, the witness agreed to advance the sum of $500. The latter wrote out the check, had the plaintiff sign it, and then took the check himself, drew the money, and gave it to the plaintiff, again advising the latter not to draw any more money until the bank reported collection. The witness further testified that the coupons were returned to the bank as uncollectible.

James O'Hanlon, coupon teller of the defendant bank, testified that he was called by Mr. Pratt, and counted and listed the coupons; that when he was through counting them Mr. Anthony said to Mr. Pratt, " 'Well, can you give me some money on those coupons?' and Mr. Pratt said, 'Well, how much do you want?' and he said, 'Well, $1,000,' and Mr. Pratt objected. Mr. Pratt turned to me, and I said, 'Well, it will not be—the funds won't be in our hands for several days.' Mr. Pratt said to Mr. Anthony: 'It is not the usual practice to advance money on these. I could not give you $1,000 anyway. If it was a matter of a couple of hundred dollars I might accommodate you.' I told plaintiff we would let him know when the coupons were collected." Paul Herbert Devine, an employee of the bank, testified that the coupons were tendered to the plaintiff and demand made upon him for the return of the $500 advanced to him by the bank. The letter of the bank, forwarding the coupons for collection, bears date June 16, 1926.

Other evidence tending to corroborate that of Pratt and O'Hanlon is in the record, but the foregoing is ample to establish that certain findings of fact, to the effect that it was agreed by the parties that said coupons were deposited for collection only, and that the $500 advanced to plaintiff was conditioned upon the bank collecting the coupons, and the further finding that plaintiff was instructed not to draw any further checks against said account until the bank reported collection, are based upon a substantial conflict in the evidence, and they will not be disturbed upon appeal. 2 Cal. Jur. § 543, and cases there cited.

[2, 3] Indeed, counsel for appellant admits such conflict, but earnestly contends that such evidence should not have been admitted, that the passbook issued by the bank, showing an unrestricted credit of $2,820, constituted a contract in writing and could not be varied by parol testimony. Section 1856, Code Civ. Proc. This claim is answered in the negative, because there was no objection made to the evidence and, further, we are of the opinion that a passbook does not constitute a contract in writing, within the meaning of section 1625 of the Civil Code. In 3 Ruling Case Law, § 160, p. 531, it is said: "An entry in a passbook, however, is not a written contract, within the rule that parol evidence is inadmissible to vary a written contract; but it is in the nature of a receipt, and is prima facie evidence that the amount credited was received by the bank, and the entries may be explained or contradicted." We have been unable to find any California cases exactly in point, but National Gold Bank v. McDonald, 51 Cal. 64, 21 Am. Rep. 697, and Ocean Park Bank v. Rogers, 6 Cal. App. 678, 92 P. 879, hold that a credit made in a passbook of a depositor, and nothing else appearing, no presumption is raised that the check is received as cash or otherwise than for collection.

[4, 5] A number of California cases bearing upon the relation between a depositary bank and its depositor are cited by counsel for both appellant and respondent, but in each of these cases there is some feature distinguishing it from the case at bar. These cases were decided upon a state of facts arising prior to 1925. In the latter year the Legislature enacted section 16c of the California Bank Act. Stats. 1925, p. 513. So far as material to the question under discussion it provides as follows: "Any credit allowed by any bank organized under the laws of, or doing business in, this state, for any check, note or other instrument providing for the payment of money and drawn on or payable at the same bank in which it is deposited or on or at any other bank, or on any other branch of the same bank, or on any other party, shall be only provisional, subject to final payment and to the receipt by the bank in which it is deposited of the funds in actual money, or in solvent credit on the books of any federal reserve bank, or on the books of any bank designated as a depositary by the forwarding bank; * * * and further provided, that when such check, note or other instrument providing for the payment of money is drawn on or payable at any other bank, or on any other party, it shall be sent in course of collection by the end of the next succeeding business day. * * * Until the proceeds of any check, note or other instrument providing for the payment of money shall have been actually received by the bank allowing such credit, in actual money, or in solvent credit on the books of any federal reserve bank, or on the books of any bank designated as a depositary by the forwarding bank, such check, note or other instrument may be charged back to or collected from, the depositor from whom it was received regardless of whether or not the check, note or other instrument itself can be returned. * * * Any provision of this section may be modified or set aside by an agreement in writing between any such bank and any party from whom any check, note or other instrument is received for collection, deposit, or other purpose."

So far as we are advised this section of the Bank Act has never been construed, but in construing a similar statute of the state of Florida in Federal Reserve Bank v. Malloy, 264 U. S. 160, 44 S. Ct. 296, 68 L. Ed. 617, 31 A. L. R. 1261, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the relation of the payee to the initial bank of deposit was controlled by the Florida statute, with respect to which they must be presumed to have dealt with each other. Applying the principle of that decision to the instant case, section 16c, supra, became a part of the terms under which the deposit was made. This conclusion is further strengthened by the following indorsement appearing on the inside page of the passbook: "The rights and obligations of the depositor are defined by the laws of the state of California and the United States of America." In the absence of an agreement in writing to the contrary, the coupons in suit having been forwarded for collection on the day following the deposit, and being uncollectible, the defendant bank, by the terms of the statute, was entitled to charge the worthless paper so deposited to the plaintiff's account. We further hold that the trial court having held the transaction to have been a deposit of the paper for collection only, and not one of sale, irrespective of section 16c, supra, the defendant was entitled to judgment.

PURDY v. BUFFUMS, Inc. (Civ. 5523.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 5, 1928.

1. Master and servant 🔑3(1)—Defendant's acceptance of plaintiff's offer to work for stipulated salary and stipulated percentage of sales held not conditional, notwithstanding expression of hope that plaintiff would change terms as to percentage.

Defendant's acceptance of plaintiff's offer to work for stipulated sum and stipulated percentage of sales held not conditional, notwithstanding that "percentage seems a bit high" and expression of hope that plaintiff might later change her terms, and rules of law that agreement to make contract in future amounts to nothing and that sale contract is incomplete until price is fixed or agreed on, are inapplicable.

2. Master and servant 🔑70(3)—Servant held entitled to percentage of sales as stipulated in original offer, though she subsequently signed employer's printed form carrying notation, "Rate $50.00 per wk." (Code Civ. Proc. § 1858; Civ. Code, § 1642).

Employee held entitled to percentage of sales as stipulated in original offer in addition to salary, notwithstanding that she subsequently signed printed form of employer carrying notation, "Rate $50.00 per wk.," since such form did not use word "only" or words "no commission," and court must construe instruments to give effect to every clause unless such construction would be obviously repugnant to parties' intention or lead to absurdity, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1858, and Civ. Code, § 1642.

3. Contracts 🔑169—Rules that contract may be explained by circumstances and that acts of parties thereunder may show intention are inapplicable to unambiguous contracts (Civ. Code, § 1639).

Rules that contract may be explained by reference to circumstances under which it was made, and that acts of parties done under it afford reliable means of arriving at their intention, are inapplicable in construing clear and unambiguous contracts, since intention is to be ascertained from writing alone, if possible, under Civ. Code, § 1639.

4. Master and servant 🔑80(13)—Interpretation of employment contract held law question.

Interpretation of contract of employment sued on held to be question of law and not of fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action on a contract for services by Aleen Purdy against Buffums, Inc. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Denio & Hart, Denio, Hart, Taubman & Simpson, and Geo. P. Taubman, Jr., all of Long Beach, for appellant.

Benjamin & Benjamin, of Los Angeles (Aaron Elmore, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

CRAIL, Justice pro tem. Some time prior to June 23, 1923, the plaintiff entered into negotiations with the defendant for her employment as manager of its hair goods and beauty parlor department, and wrote the defendant a letter in which she offered to enter upon such employment at $50 per week and 5 per cent. of the gross sales of the department. Thereupon the defendant replied by letter as follows:

"Our Mr. Johnson handed me your note, which I have gone over carefully, and am glad to know that you have decided to come with us later, when our building is ready. * * *

"As I recall, your wage was to be $50.00 per week and five per cent of the gross sales. Without going into the matter more fully, I might say that the percentage seems a bit high, at least while the business is being developed. The wage is all right, for I am sure you can put across the program that we are intending to inaugurate. However, we are willing to let the percentage part remain, and will work it out with you later.

"We want you to feel that you are engaged for the job, and will leave the entire matter in your hands."

And from that time on both parties considered that plaintiff was employed as manager of the department which was to be established when a new building was completed. On May 1, 1924, the plaintiff commenced upon her duties as indicated. She had several conversations with Mr. Buffum, president of the company, but nothing was ever said about changing her compensation. On May 5, 1924, she went downstairs to the bookkeeper, named Miss Brown, who prepared "a little yellow slip," which was in printed form, "Form 19–1M," but contained blank spaces for name, date to begin, rate per week, etc., which plaintiff signed, as follows:

Form 19-1M 4-23 Del Mar. No. 2401
Buffums'
24 and 25 Date 5/5, 1924.
Department: Beauty Parlor
Name: Mrs. Aleen Purdy
Address: 239 Ximeno
Telephone number.
Occupation: Beauty Parlor
To begin 5/5, 1924. Rate $50.00 per wk.

It is understood and agreed that my term of employment may be discontinued at any time by myself or Buffums', and that my compensation shall be based on the actual time employed.

Employed by

Aleen Purdy
Employé's Name.

Approved by C.A.B.
Entered Pay Roll
Record No.

Plaintiff accepted for almost a year $50 per week, and made no demand for her commission until the day prior to her resignation. In explanation she said she did not expect the payment of the commission until the end of the year.

The trial court held in effect that the two letters constituted a contract between the parties, and that this contract was not modified, so far as compensation was concerned, by the writing of May 5th, and entered judgment accordingly.

[1] It is the contention of appellant (1) that there was no valid contract between the parties, and (2) that, if there were such a contract, it was modified by the writing of May 5th, and that plaintiff's compensation was limited thereby to $50 per week. In support of these contentions appellant expounds several propositions of law which it seems our duty to consider.

Appellant contends that there is no contract "when essential parts of the intended agreement are to be determined by future negotiations." 6 Cal. Jur. 45. But in this case we have an offer and an unequivocal acceptance of it. Answering the offer, defendant says: "We are glad to know that you have decided to come with us. * * * Your wage was to be $50.00 per week and five per cent of the gross sales. * * * The percentage seems a bit high. The wage is all right. * * * However, we are willing to let the percentage part remain. * * * We want you to feel that you are engaged for the job," etc. The acceptance may be a "grumbling" one, but it is unequivocal. Johnson v. Federal Union, etc., Co., 187 Mich. 454, 153 N. W. 788; 1 Elliott on Contracts, 44; 13 Cor. Jur. 283. "We are willing to let the percentage part remain." How else could it remain except as offered or demanded by plaintiff? It is true that there is added, "and we will work it out with you later." No length of time was fixed for the continuance of the employment, and either party could terminate it at will. The words are a mere expression of hope that later the offeror will change her terms. This does not make the acceptance conditional. 13 Cor. Jur. 283.

Appellant next asserts that "Preliminary negotiations are not evidence of a binding agreement and are nudum pactum." It is certainly true that an agreement that parties will, in the future, make such contract as they may then (later) agree upon amounts to nothing. Dillingham v. Dahlgren, 52 Cal. App. 322, 198 P. 832. But this law has no application to the writing before us, as we have endeavored to point out above.

Again it contends that, "Where the price of the commodity called for * * * is to be subsequently * * * fixed by the agreement of the parties, the contract of sale is incomplete and unenforceable, until the price is so fixed or agreed upon" (citing Jules Levy & Bros. v. A. Mautz & Co., 16 Cal. App. 666, 117 P. 936). This is merely a more specific or detailed statement of the same law. If the acceptance be qualified or go not to the actual thing proposed, there is no binding contract. Four Oil Co. v. United Oil Producers, 145 Cal. 623, 79 P. 366, 68 L. R. A. 226. However, in the instant case there is a definite proposal, and the proposal was squarely assented to.

[2] Appellant next contends for the rule that the intention of the parties should be gathered from the whole instrument, taking it by the four corners, and, when several papers concerning one subject-matter are separately executed by the same parties, all should be construed together as one contract, and the intention of the parties should be gathered from all the instruments, taken together. Civ. Code, § 1642, and 6 Cal. Jur. 298. But this apparently is what the learned trial judge did. There are no words in the little yellow slip which annul or strike out of the contract the 5 per cent. commission. Both writings refer to a wage of $50 per week; but the second writing speaks neither for nor against a 5 per cent. commission. For instance, it does not use the word "only," or the words "no commission." The words "and five per cent. of the gross sales" still remain in the contract. It is the duty of a court to so construe a written instrument as to give force and effect to every clause so that no clause may become redundant, unless such construction would be obviously repugnant to the intention of the parties, to be collected from its terms, or would lead to some absurdity. 6 Cal. Jur. 259; Scudder v. Perce, 159 Cal. 429, 114 P. 571. To the same effect is the Code provision which reads: "Where there are several provisions or particulars, such a construction is, if possible, to be adopted as will give effect to all." Code Civ. Proc. § 1858.

[3] Appellant next contends for the rules that a contract may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made, and that the acts of the parties done under a contract afford one of the most reliable means of arriving at their intention. But these rules are not applicable in construing clear and unambiguous contracts. They have to do with contracts in which the intention of the parties cannot be ascertained from the writing alone because the writing is doubtful, uncertain, or ambiguous. Salter v. Ives, 171 Cal. 790, 155 P. 84. The intention of the parties is to be ascertained from the writing alone if possible. Civ. Code, § 1639. Surrounding circumstances and subsequent conduct may be invoked to interpret a contract only in cases where upon the face of the contract itself there is doubt, and the evidence is used to dispel that doubt, not by showing that the parties meant something other than what they said, but by showing what they meant by what they said. United Iron Works v. Outer Harbor, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 81, 141 P. 917; Pierce v. Merrill, 128 Cal. 464, 61 P. 64, 79 Am. St. Rep. 56.

[4] In closing, appellant sets out "five salient facts" which it claims the evidence dis-closes. But they already have been referred to and disposed of in what we have said above, and we would not feel justified in discussing them at further length in this opinion, since the interpretation of the contract is a question of law and not of fact.

The judgment is affirmed.

MAZURAN v. STEFANICH et ux.★
(Civ. 6564.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 6, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 5, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 4, 1929.

1. Appeal and error 🔑731(5)—Specification of insufficiency of evidence as being insufficient to justify decision held too general (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 648–653).

Where record was brought by bill of exceptions settled pursuant to provisions of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 648–653, specification of insufficiency of evidence in bill of exceptions as being insufficient to justify the decision that the court rendered was too general to permit examination into sufficiency of the evidence by appellate court; section 648 requiring that objection must specify particulars in which evidence is alleged to be insufficient.

2. Evidence 🔑434(9)—Oral evidence held admissible to show contract between attorney and clients was signed by clients without reading it, pursuant to fraudulent representation by attorney.

Oral evidence held admissible to show that written agreement between attorney and client was signed by clients without reading it, in the belief, fraudulently induced by attorney's representations, that it embodied the terms of their previous oral agreement, though theoretically attorney and client, when agreeing on terms of employment, are dealing at arm's length with one and another, and no relation of confidence ordinarily exists until after execution of contract.

3. Contracts 🔑94(1)—Written contract induced by misrepresentation by party occupying confidential relation may be set aside.

Where parties occupying a relation to one and another which the law regards as confidential, a written contract which one of the parties inducing the other to sign by knowingly misrepresenting its contents may be set aside.

4. Trial 🔑404(4)—Blanket finding that all allegations in answer were true held sufficient finding that relation existed as alleged therein.

Blanket finding to the effect that all the allegations contained in the answer were true held sufficient finding that relation of attorney and client existed as alleged in answer.

5. Fraud 🔑20—Attorney's misrepresentation, inducing client to sign employment contract contrary to oral agreement, constituted actionable fraud (Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 4).

Where attorney orally agreed to perform seven distinct legal services for clients, and fraudulently induced clients to execute a writing which they believed provided for all seven services, but which in fact provided for only one, there was actionable fraud, under Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 4, by reason of making a promise with no intention of performing it.

6. Fraud 🔑58(1)—Evidence held insufficient to establish ratification of contract for attorney's services after knowledge of fraud in inducing written contract.

Evidence held insufficient to establish ratification by clients of contract with attorney for legal services after they had full knowledge of attorney's fraud in inducing them to execute a written contract providing for one service contrary to oral agreement for seven distinct services.

7. Fraud 🔑35—Ratification of fraudulent transaction can only be made with full knowledge of facts.

Ratification of a fraudulent transaction can only be made where there is full knowledge of the facts constituting the fraud, and depends primarily on the intention of party as shown by his declarations, acts, and conduct.

8. Fraud 🔑50—Party claiming ratification of fraudulent transaction has burden of proof.

Burden of proving ratification of a fraudulent transaction rests on party making a claim thereof.

9. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)—Failure to make finding which would be adverse to appellant is not error.

Failure of trial court to make finding which would necessarily be adverse to appellant is not reversible error.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1071(1)—Finding on cross-complaint that sum paid attorney for services before discovery of fraud was reasonable compensation held not prejudicial.

Finding of court on cross-complaint for money alleged to have been paid to attorney on employment contract before discovery of fraud, to effect that such sum was reasonable compensation for legal services rendered, held not prejudicial as to attorney, in view of fact that judgment would not be res judicata in suit to recover for any other services performed by attorney.

went for defendants below, and plaintiff appeals. Defendants in their answer set up as an affirmative defense that the note and mortgage were procured by certain fraudulent representations of plaintiff, and the trial court found in defendants' favor on this issue. In this behalf the court found that, prior to the execution and delivery of the note and mortgage, plaintiff, who is an attorney at law, promised and assured defendants, who are husband and wife, that he could and would, in consideration thereof, perform seven distinct legal services, each of which is specifically set out in the findings; that he made said promises without any intention of performing, and did not perform, them; that solely by reason of said promises and in reliance thereon defendants executed and delivered the promissory note and mortgage. The court further found that, contemporaneously with the execution of the note and mortgage, defendants also signed a certain agreement in writing which in terms bound plaintiff to perform only one of the seven legal services theretofore agreed upon in consideration of the giving of said note and mortgage, but that this agreement was signed by defendants without reading it, in reliance upon the false and fraudulent representation of plaintiff that the agreement embodied the promise to render all seven of the legal services theretofore agreed upon. This summary of the findings on this issue will suffice for a general understanding of the questions raised on the appeal. Other findings are discussed hereafter in connection with the consideration of certain claimed errors to which they are pertinent.

[1] A large part of the briefs is devoted to the contention that certain of the findings are not supported by the evidence. The record is brought here by a bill of exceptions settled pursuant to the provisions of sections 648–653 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The only specification of insufficiency of the evidence in the bill of exceptions is in the following language: "That the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision of the court rendered in this action." Under the settled rule of practice in this state, this specification is too general to permit this court to examine into the sufficiency of the evidence to support any or all of the findings. Section 648, Code of Civil Procedure, provides in this regard that, "when the exception is to the verdict or decision, upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify it, the objection must specify the particulars in which such evidence is alleged to be insufficient." Under this provision of the Code it has always been the rule that the bill of exceptions must, at the very least, specify the particular finding or findings which it is claimed are not supported by the evidence (Mills v. Brady, 185 Cal. 317, 320, 196 P. 776, and cases cited; Schultz v. City of Venice, 200 Cal. 50, 251 P. 913), and this for the very good reason that "the adverse party may know what evidence by way of amendments to embody in the statement or bill and that the trial court's attention may be directed to these designated matters." Crow v. Crow, 168 Cal. 607, 611, 143 P. 689, 690. It follows that, in the absence of any more particular specification of the insufficiency of the evidence than that above quoted, this court not only should not, but cannot, review the evidence set out in the bill of exceptions to determine whether or not it is sufficient to support the findings attacked. We may add, however, without discussing it, that an inspection of the record satisfies us that the findings are sufficiently supported by the evidence included in the bill.

[2] Appellant urges that the court erred in permitting evidence to be introduced to show that the written agreement was signed by respondents without reading it in the belief, fraudulently induced by appellant's representations, that it embodied the terms of their previous oral agreement. In this behalf appellant contends that one who signs a written instrument is under the legal duty to ascertain its contents before signing it, and, having failed to read it, cannot afterwards attack it on the ground that he relied on the false representation of the other party that its contents were different from those which it actually contained. This is a question which has perplexed the courts of this and other jurisdictions. The rule contended for by appellant is supported by the following California decisions: Hawkins v. Hawkins, 50 Cal. 558; Kimmel v. Skelly, 130 Cal. 555, 62 P. 1067; De Laval Supply Co. v. Steadman, 6 Cal. App. 651, 92 P. 877. The opposite rule is announced in an equal number of cases. Wenzel v. Schulz, 78 Cal. 221, 20 P. 404; Togni v. Taminelli, 11 Cal. App. 7, 103 P. 899; Knight v. Bentel, 39 Cal. App. 502, 179 P. 406. In neither line of decisions is any reference to be found to the other. A similar contrariety of opinion exists in other jurisdictions. See the cases collected in notes in 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 463, and L. R. A., 1917F, 637. It is said in 6 R. C. L. p. 634, that, "while there is always a sharp struggle in the courts between the desire to repress fraud upon the one hand, and on the other to discourage negligence and the opportunity and invitation to commit perjury, the rule seems to be settling down to hearing all the facts, still scrutinizing closely, and even suspiciously, the claim of a party to such an instrument that he had not read it." We are inclined to the view, announced in this quotation, that, upon a clear showing that a written instrument was executed by one party to it without reading it, in the belief, induced by the fraudulent representations of the other party, that its provisions were different from those set out, the courts should set the agreement aside. Certainly it would be a reproach to our law if an attorney, in negotiating the terms of his employment by a client, could thus deliberately misrepresent the terms of a writing and hold the client to a bargain which he never intended to make. While theoretically, in agreeing upon the terms of such employment, the attorney and prospective client are dealing at arm's length with one another, and no relation of confidence ordinarily exists until the contract of employment is executed (Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 510, 105 P. 981), we cannot close our eyes to the fact that, as a practical matter, many people would sign such a contract without reading it, when prepared by an attorney, because of the fact that the drawing of contracts is a matter which the average person, and very rightly, feels is peculiarly a lawyer's business.

[3, 4] There is another factor in this case, however, which compels us to decide this point against appellant in any event. Whatever may be the diversity of opinion on this question where the parties are dealing at arm's length, it is the unquestioned rule that, where the parties occupy a relation to one another which the law regards as confidential, a written contract which one of the parties induces the other to sign by knowingly misrepresenting its contents may be set aside. Calmon v. Sarraille, 142 Cal. 638, 76 P. 486. It is alleged in paragraph I of defendants' separate answer and defense that at and prior to the time of the negotiations leading up to the execution of the writings here in question appellant was and had been "the attorney and confidential adviser of the defendants herein." While there is no specific finding covering this allegation, there is a blanket finding, VIII, "that all the allegations contained in the answer * * * of the defendants are true." This is a sufficient finding that the relation of attorney and client existed at the time of the negotiations as alleged in the answer. Continental B. & L. Ass'n v. Wilson, 144 Cal. 776, 78 P. 254.

[5] Appellant further urges that, since the trial court found that appellant's misrepresentations consisted in the promise that he "could and would" perform certain legal services for respondents, and his ability to perform those services depended entirely upon the facts which were only known to appellant as related to him by respondents, in the absence of a finding as to just what facts were related to appellant and whether those facts were true, his promise that he could and would do certain things amounted only to an expression of opinion based entirely on respondents' story, and could not constitute actionable fraud. It is unnecessary for us to pass upon this interesting question. The court found, as we have seen, that appellant orally agreed to perform seven distinct legal services for respondents and fraudulently induced respondents to execute a writing which they believed provided for all seven services, but which in fact provided for only one. It is clear from this that appellant in no event intended to perform, or to endeavor to perform, the six services which he caused to be omitted from the written agreement prepared by himself. A promise made with no intention of performing it is actual fraud. Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 4. The gist of appellant's fraud in this case was not that he promised to do something which he could not do, but that he promised to do something which he did not intend to do.

[6] Another of appellant's contentions is that the evidence shows that, after full discovery of the fraud, respondents ratified their contract with him. While not presented in that way, this contention really amounts to the claim that the trial court failed to find on the material issue of ratification. This issue was not raised by the pleadings, since the issue of fraud was first set up by the answer. It arose, if at all, on the evidence, under section 462, Code of Civil Procedure. If the evidence would support a finding that respondents ratified the contract with full knowledge of the fraud, the failure to find on that issue was error. Taylor v. Taylor, 192 Cal. 71, 81, 218 P. 756, 51 A. L. R. 1074. This rule necessitates an examination of the evidence on this point.

The bill of exceptions shows that respondent Frank Stefanich testified that, after signing the contract, he put it away in his desk. He then testified: "I next saw this contract in July some time." Respondent Mary Stefanich testified: "I do not read English very well. I never went to school. I can read English if it is written plainly. I also write plain English, with a lot of mistakes. I did not read the contract marked Exhibit A and attached to the cross-complaint. I read it long afterwards. It is very difficult to read. There are lots of words in it that I do not understand. I did not read it until long after it was written and signed, probably in August." Two letters were introduced in evidence written by Mrs. Stefanich to appellant. One was dated August 6, 1923, and signed Frank Stefanich, but Mrs. Stefanich testified that it was written by her. In this letter appellant's conduct of the suit referred to in the written contract was discussed, and he was told to try to settle matters amicably. "If not then you can do what is best." The second, dated September 23, is signed by Mrs. Stefanich, and, without mentioning any litigation by name, says that I "do hope you can win both cases very soon to show others that you can. I did hear lot of misunderstandings in S. F., but does not bother me any." The evidence shows that appellant was discharged by respondents some time in October.

From this meager testimony appellant argues that respondents, after they had full knowledge of the fraud, elected to ratify their contract with him and retain his services, citing Nounnan v. Sutter Land Co., 81 Cal. 7, 22 P. 515, 6 L. R. A. 219, and Schmidt v. Mesmer, 116 Cal. 267, 48 P. 54. We do not think that the evidence is sufficient to support this contention.

[7] "When the original fraud is clearly established by circumstances not liable to doubt, a confirmation of such a transaction is so inconsistent with justice, so unnatural, so liable to be connected with fraud, that it ought to be watched with the utmost strictness, and to stand only upon the clearest evidence as an act done with all the deliberation that ought to attend a transaction the effect of which is to ratify that which in justice ought never to have taken place." Morse v. Royal, 12 Ves. 373, quoted in Green v. Duvergey, 146 Cal. 379, 80 P. 234. Ratification of a fraudulent transaction can only be made where there is a full knowledge of the facts constituting the fraud (Siebold v. Berdine, 61 Cal. App. 158, 214 P. 655), and depends primarily on the intention of the party as shown by his declarations, acts, and conduct. French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 590, 217 P. 515.

[8, 9] In the light of these principles, we are satisfied that the evidence above quoted is not sufficient to support a finding of ratification. The burden of proving ratification was on appellant. The testimony of Stefanich that he "saw" the contract again in July does not establish that he read it then. And, even if he did read it in July, he had nothing to do with the writing of either letter, and the evidence is silent as to whether he had knowledge of their writing. Mrs. Stefanich's testimony that she read it probably in August does not fix any definite date, and is qualified by her testimony that she does not read English well and found the contract difficult to read and much of that she did not understand. How much she understood when she did read it is left to speculation. It is likewise left in complete uncertainty whether the letter of August 6 was written before or after Mrs. Stefanich had read the contract. What cases are referred to in the letter of September 23 is equally undetermined. These are all matters which counsel for appellant could have cleared up by further questions, and neither this court nor the trial court would be justified in spelling out a ratification from the fragmentary testimony which was elicited. This evidence neither shows the full knowledge of fraud nor the unequivocal intent to waive the fraud and abide by the contract which are essential to ratification. The failure to make a finding which would necessarily be adverse to appellant is not reversible error. Furlong v. White, 51 Cal. App. 265, 272, 196 P. 903.

[10] Respondents cross-complained for $2,000 alleged to have been paid to appellant before discovery of the fraud. As to this payment, the court found "that said sum was and is ample, just and reasonable compensation to plaintiff for any and all legal services rendered by plaintiff." Appellant complains that this finding is outside the issues and not supported by the evidence. It is difficult to see how appellant is injured thereby. The suit was one for foreclosure of a mortgage, and the judgment simply decrees that the note and mortgage are void, and that plaintiff take nothing. As to the services agreed to be rendered by appellant in consideration of the note and mortgage, the court found that they were not performed, and this finding cannot be reviewed because of the insufficiency of the specification hereinabove discussed. If appellant performed any other services for respondents the judgment in this case would not be res adjudicata in a suit to recover for them.

This disposes of all the errors alleged except those directed to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings.

The judgment is affirmed.

In action on contract for services as financial agent or broker in procuring extension of credit, evidence showing that no loan was consummated, and that plaintiff never performed services contemplated, held sufficient to support judgment for defendant.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1071(3)—Where findings on material issues were supported by evidence, fact that additional findings were unsupported will not warrant reversal.

Where findings on material issues are supported by evidence, fact that additional findings, which would not have affected judgment, if made the other way, were not supported by evidence, will not warrant reversal, since it is only when judgment rests on some particular finding for its validity and support that lack of evidence sufficient to support such finding becomes material.

3. Brokers ⚷49(1)—Broker's agreement to procure extension of credit on terms acceptable to borrower is consummated at time terms are accepted.

to borrower, is consummated at time of acceptance of terms obtained.

4. Appeal and error ⚷882(3)—Broker, suing on express contract, cannot for first time on appeal urge recovery on quantum meruit.

Where action for services as broker in procuring extension of credit was brought on theory that plaintiff was working under terms of express contract, plaintiff cannot for first time on appeal urge recovery on quantum meruit.

5. Corporations ⚷592—Corporation delinquent in payment of taxes does not forfeit charter and become defunct, but may defend action brought against it (St. 1917, pp. 371, 377; Pol. Code, § 3669c, subd. 2).

Under St. 1917, pp. 371, 377, and Pol. Code, § 3669c, subd. 2, corporate rights, privileges, and powers of domestic corporation are suspended for nonpayment of taxes, but it does not forfeit charter and become defunct, and statute expressly reserves power to defend any action brought against it.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Harry Nathan against the American Photoplayer Company, in which Louis E. Goodman intervened. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals; and from an order denying a motion to dismiss the action, intervener appeals. Affirmed.

Dowd & Reagh, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Brownstone & Goodman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SPENCE, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff and appellant Harry Nathan brought this action against defendant and respondent American Photoplayer Company, seeking judgment in the sum of $2,500 upon an alleged express contract, and also upon common counts for services as a financial agent or broker in procuring the extension of credit to respondent by a New York bank. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment entered in favor of defendant and respondent, American Photoplayer Company, from which judgment plaintiff and appellant Harry Nathan appeals.

Louis E. Goodman intervened as a stockholder of the defendant and respondent corporation, and moved that the action be dismissed on the ground that the corporation had forfeited its charter in 1924 by reason of failure to pay its taxes, and had therefore ceased to exist prior to the commencement of this action. The motion was denied, and from this order the intervener and appellant Louis E. Goodman appeals. It was stipulated by the parties that the bill of exceptions and transcript might be used on the appeal of the intervener, as well as on the appeal of plaintiff.

[1, 2] On this appeal plaintiff and appellant Harry Nathan contends that the findings are not supported by the evidence. Plaintiff and appellant failed to embody in the bill of exceptions any objections specifying the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient as required by section 648 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We have, however, examined the transcript, which purports to set forth all of the evidence introduced, and conclude that the evidence is sufficient to support the findings on certain material issues, and sufficient to justify the decision in favor of defendant and respondent. These findings, which were against plaintiff and appellant and are supported by the evidence, were the findings upon material issues which were essential to plaintiff and appellant's cause of action. If there were additional findings made by the court, which were not supported by the evidence, this would not warrant a reversal of the judgment. "It is only when a judgment rests upon some particular finding for its validity and support that the lack of sufficient evidence to support such finding becomes material; complaint may not be made of an unsupported finding which, had it been made the other way, would not have affected the judgment." 24 Cal. Jur. 993, 994; Nelson v. Dutton, 63 Cal. App. 717, 220 P. 12; American Nat. Bank v. Donnellan, 170 Cal. 9, 148 P. 188, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 744; Schurman v. Look, 63 Cal. App. 347, 218 P. 624.

The amended complaint here consisted of four counts, all relating to the same transaction or subject-matter. The first count alleged an agreement whereby defendant, "in consideration that plaintiff would procure the extension of credit in the sum of $100,000, or any part thereof, from any banking corporation in the city of New York to defendant, promised, agreed and undertook forthwith upon the same being so procured to pay plaintiff the sum of five (5%) per cent. of the amount of any credit so established for defendant." It further alleged that plaintiff had "fully and in all things complied with all the conditions and obligations of said contract resting upon him and * * * under the terms of said contract secured for defendant * * * an agreement to extend to defendant credit to the sum of fifty thousand ($50,000) dollars." The second count is substantially the same, except that the words "the extension of credit" are changed to "a loan of money." The third and fourth counts were drawn somewhat in the form of common counts for work and services. All of the material allegations were put in issue by the answer, and the court found against the plaintiff and appellant upon practically all of these allegations.

We are satisfied that, under the evidence, plaintiff's only color of claim to a right of recovery was under the first alleged cause of action. In fact the plaintiff himself takes the position in the closing brief, in dealing with the merits of the case, that "plaintiff was under the duty of showing (a) a contract between himself and the defendant; (b) that he secured a customer ready, willing, and able to extend the credit on terms which were either the same as those proposed by defendant, or satisfactory to it; (c) that the failure of the transaction to go through was neither the fault of himself or the customer." We will therefore direct our attention to the first alleged cause of action, for, if the evidence was sufficient to support findings adverse to plaintiff on the material allegations therein contained, the plaintiff under the evidence here would not be entitled to recover under the other alleged causes of action covering the same subject-matter.

We will refer to plaintiff and appellant as "Nathan" and the defendant and respondent as "the company." The company was doing a large business in the manufacture of musical instruments, which were frequently sold on installment contracts, payable over a period of 24 to 30 months. The company had previously received credit from various banks in financing its business. Nathan was a financial agent or broker in New York. Nathan and Werner, the president of the company, had conversations in the early part of 1923 relating to the possibility of Nathan obtaining accommodations for the company from a New York bank. Werner stated that the company would want a line of credit of from $50,000 to $100,000, one-half to be on the company's paper, and one-half to be on the company's paper guaranteed by a bonding company. With relation to the nature of the "line of credit," Werner testified without contradiction that he advised Nathan that the bank would have to agree to renewals of the loans over the length of time covered by their installment contracts, and that the bonding company which would be secured by the installment contracts required that such arrangement be made with the bank. Both parties testified that the guaranty of the bonding company was to cover only one-half of the amount. There is a conflict as to the amount of compensation which Nathan would receive, and also as to whether any compensation would be due unless the loan was actually made. We deem these matters immaterial, however, as the evidence failed to show that Nathan ever obtained "a line of credit" upon the terms proposed.

Several months after the conversations between Nathan and Werner, and after Nathan had failed to get accommodations on the terms proposed, the committee of the Irving National Bank took action, as shown by the minutes of their meeting of June 1, 1923, for "$50,000 on collateral consisting of installment purchase notes. Loan for four months, guaranteed in total by Fidelity & Casualty Company of Baltimore, approved, provided commensurate balances are carried." Plaintiff's Exhibit I shows that Nathan in applying to the bank, stated that "obligations will be paid without renewal and they will keep commensurate balances." Nathan wired the company on June 12th, advising them briefly, but not in detail, of the action of the bank. In reply, M. J. Samuels, vice president of the company, wired Nathan on June 13th, asking him to have the bank forward necessary resolutions and forms of notes, and requesting Nathan to "please write details." No resolutions or note forms were ever received from the bank, nor did Nathan ever advise the company of the details upon which this loan could be arranged. No loan was consummated with the bank on the terms proposed or any other terms. Shortly thereafter the company was placed in the hands of a committee and underwent a reorganization.

From a review of the evidence it is apparent that Nathan never performed the services contemplated. The uncontradicted testimony shows that Nathan was to procure (1) a "line of credit" of from $50,000 to $100,000; (2) upon an understanding that loans were to be renewed for a period equal to the life of the company's installment contracts; (3) with one half of the amount to be guaranteed by a bonding company and the other half to be without such guarantee. All that the testimony tends to show that Nathan did procure was (1) a loan of $50,000; (2) for a definite period of four months, with the understanding, given to the bank by Nathan, that the obligation would be paid without renewal; (3) and the entire amount to be guaranteed by a bonding company.

It affirmatively appeared from the bank records, introduced by Nathan himself as Exhibit I, that he called at the bank on June 11th, and that he was advised that his original proposition "was not interesting," and that, when Nathan was advised of the terms upon which the bank would make a loan, it "was not pleasing." He then told them that he would like to bring some further information and see if they "could not get a different point of view." Instead of furnishing further information, he sent the brief wire of June 12th above mentioned, and the vice president of the company wired back, asking for forms and details which were not forthcoming. Nathan obviously knew that he had not procured a line of credit on the terms proposed. It is further apparent that the company was not fully advised of the details of the plan upon which the bank would make any loan, and therefore it cannot be said that it accepted any new or different terms, or that such terms were satisfactory to it.

[3] It may well be doubted whether an agreement, as alleged in the amended complaint, to pay a commission in the event that a broker will "procure the extension of credit," without further specifications of the time, rate of interest, security, balances required, or understanding regarding renewals, is sufficiently definite to form the basis of a contract or cause of action, unless the terms finally obtained are acceptable to the borrower. In the latter case, the agreement is consummated at the time of the acceptance of the terms obtained.

Assuming, however, that the proposition made to Nathan in the present case was sufficiently definite to form the basis of a unilateral contract upon performance by Nathan, the evidence fails to show performance according to the terms proposed, and fails to show acceptance by the company of any other terms. Without such performance according to terms, or acceptance of new terms, mutuality was entirely lacking, and in fact no contract existed. The findings of the trial court to the effect that Nathan did not perform any of the terms or conditions, and that no credit was secured under the terms of any contract, were supported by the evidence and fatal to his recovery.

It may be further noted that the bank had never made any binding agreement to make a loan to the company on any terms, and in view of the contemplated reorganization of the company at the time that Nathan finally sent the wire in June, 1923, and his failure to forward note and resolution forms as requested, the court was justified in inferring that the bank was not then ready and willing to extend any credit to the company. The fact that under the indefinite allegations the court made findings adverse to plaintiff and appellant on practically all of the remaining allegations is not material. These supported findings were conclusive, and, under the authorities above cited, no reversal should be had on the ground that some other finding or findings are not supported by the evidence.

[4] Counsel further argues that, because of the company's financial condition and the impossibility of obtaining credit, Nathan should recover for his services on a quantum meruit. This theory of the case seems to have been first advanced by counsel on this appeal. The case was tried upon the theory that there was an express contract, duly performed by Nathan. In his proposed findings, which were not signed, he abandoned the common counts of his complaint, and asked no findings on the allegations therein contained, nor on the financial condition of the company. No misrepresentation of the financial condition was alleged or proved. On the contrary, statements showing the condition of the company were forwarded to Nathan upon his request, shortly after his conversation with Werner, the correctness of which statements is not questioned. At all times involved here, it was admittedly in need of credit to finance its business. It was many months after the conversations with Werner that Nathan secured the unsatisfactory action of the committee of the Irving National Bank, and it was about this time that the reorganization was being contemplated. Counsel has at all times taken the position that Nathan could and did obtain credit for the company under the terms of an agreement, and cannot at this stage of the proceedings turn about and say that this was impossible, and that he therefore should recover on a quantum meruit.

[5] On the appeal of the intervener and appellant Louis E. Goodman, it is claimed that his motion to dismiss the action should have been granted, on the ground that prior to the commencement of this action the defendant corporation was defunct, having forfeited its charter for nonpayment of taxes. Counsel on both sides argue at length concerning the provisions of section 416 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the manner of suing corporations whose charters have been forfeited and whose directors have become the trustees. The argument of counsel leads to the conclusion that they have overlooked the provisions of Statutes 1917, pp. 371, 377, and section 3669c, subdivision 2, of the Political Code. The penalty for nonpayment of taxes was thereby changed, so that a domestic corporation no longer forfeits its charter and becomes defunct, but its corporate rights, privileges and powers are merely suspended; the statute, however, expressly reserving to the corporation the power to defend any action brought against it. "Under the former law, when the charter was forfeited, the directors then in office became the trustees of the creditors and of the stockholders of the corporation. Under the present law, however, the charter is not forfeited, the corporation does not become defunct, and there are no trustees." Usher v. Henkel (Cal. Sup.) 271 P. 494. Although delinquent in payment of taxes, the defendant corporation was properly made a defendant in this action, and had the power to defend as provided by statute. The motion of the intervener as a stockholder to dismiss the action was properly denied.

The judgment in favor of defendant and respondent American Photoplayer Company is affirmed, and the order denying the motion to dismiss of the intervener and appellant Louis E. Goodman is also affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

CITY OF OAKLAND v. DE GUARDA et al.★
(Civ. 6401.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 5, 1928.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing Jan. 3, 1929.

1. Municipal corporations ⚷348—City, as trustee for property owners who were assessed greater amount upon performance of contract by second contractors, may recover such excess cost for benefit of property owners in action on street contractor's bond (Street Improvement Act 1911, §§ 1–7, 10–16, 19, 20, 26, 27, 29; Civ. Code, § 2837).

In action on street contractor's bond, given under Street Improvement Act 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730) § 15, city, as trustee, for benefit of property owners who were assessed upon performance of contract by second contractor for larger sum than would have been assessed if first contractor had performed, may recover such excess cost, since in equity property holders are beneficiaries of bond under provisions of Civ. Code, § 2837, and Street Improvement Act 1911, §§ 1–7, 11–16, 19, 20, 26, 27, 29, and bond is distinguishable from those given under sections 10 and 19.

2. Municipal corporations ⚷347(1)—Street contractor's bond should be construed in connection with statute as well as contract.

Street contractor's bond should be construed, not only in connection with contract which it is given to protect, but also in connection with statute in pursuance of which contract was entered into and bond given.

3. Trusts ⚷160(2)—Equity will not permit execution of trust to fail for want of sufficient trustee.

Equity will not permit execution of trust to fail for want of sufficient trustee, for equity looks to intent rather than form, and regards that as done which ought to be done, and goes beneath external form to substance of things for purpose of making remedies more complete.

4. Municipal corporations ⚷348—Street contractor's surety cannot, in action by city as trustee, urge defense based on assumption that city would wrongfully hold money received for its own use.

In action on street contractor's bond brought by city as trustee, defendant surety company cannot be permitted to urge defense based on assumption that city would attempt to hold for its own use and benefit money which it received for use and benefit of real parties damaged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by the City of Oakland individually and as trustee against Salvatore De Guarda and another. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Leon E. Gray, former City Atty., Preston Higgins, City Atty., and Homer W. Buckley, Deputy City Atty., all of Oakland, for appellant.

Heller, Ehrman, White & McAuliffe and F. Whitney Tenney, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

BUCK, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an action to recover against a defendant street contractor and a defendant surety company upon a statutory surety bond given by the defendants for the faithful performance of a contract for street improvement in the city of Oakland under the provisions of the Street Improvement Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730).

Two counts are pleaded in the complaint; the first being on behalf of the city individually, and the second by the city as trustee for the property holders in the assessment district.

The defendant contractor De Guarda made default, and judgment was rendered against him and no appeal taken by him. The defendant National Surety Company interposed a general and special demurrer to the two causes of action stated in the complaint. The demurrer to the first cause of action was overruled with leave to answer. But defendant's demurrer to the second cause of action was sustained without leave to amend. Defendant National Surety Company having failed to answer as to the first cause of action within the time allowed, judgment was entered against the defendant on the first cause of action; and, as to the second cause of action, the plaintiff not having been granted leave to amend its complaint, judgment was given in favor of the National Surety Company on the second cause of action. No appeal was taken by the National Surety Company from the judgment entered against it on the first cause of action. And this appeal is taken by plaintiff from the judgment against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendant surety company upon the second cause of action.

[1] In the second cause of action, facts are alleged showing valid proceedings by the city under the Street Improvement Act of 1911, leading up to the entering into a contract between the city and defendant De Guarda for the performance of street work, some of which work, as shown by the resolution of intention and other proceedings, made a part of the contract, was to be paid for by the city out of the general fund, and the balance of the work "shall be and is hereby made chargeable against and shall be assessed upon" a certain described district in pursuance of the statute. The contract in question is set out in the complaint; and it is further alleged in both causes of action that the defendant De Guarda executed a bond to the city of Oakland with the defendant National Surety

Company as surety, and payable to the city in the sum of $10,000, conditioned for the faithful performance of said contract, and which provided that the defendants are jointly and severally bound to the city of Oakland, which bond provided also by its terms that, "if the defendant contractor shall well and truly perform all the covenants and conditions and agreements of said contract then said bond shall become void, else to remain in full force and virtue." It is then alleged in both causes of action that "said defendant, De Guarda, never did any work under the terms or in pursuance of the said contract or in performance of the work specified in said contract—and said plaintiff made repeated demands upon defendant, De Guarda, and repeatedly requested defendant surety company to commence and complete said contract but both the said defendants utterly failed, neglected and refused to commence and complete said contract." It is then alleged in both causes of action that the said delinquency was reported to the city council, and facts are stated showing that the city council undertook all the proceedings provided for in the statute for the letting of a new contract covering the same work to a new and different contractor, which contract was in all respects properly performed, and that, after it had been performed under the direction and to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets "the City Engineer of the City made a diagram of the property affected and benefited by said work and improvement as described in the Resolution of Intention and to be assessed to pay the expenses thereof"; this being the same resolution of intention which was the basis of the contract signed by the defendant De Guarda and for the faithful performance of which the defendant surety company executed its bond. The complaint then alleges that "said diagram showed each separate lot, piece, or parcel of land, the area in square feet of each of such lots, pieces, or parcels of land, and the relative location of the same to said work, all within the limits of the assessment district, and that thereafter, and after the contractor had fulfilled the contract to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets, he later proceeded to estimate upon the lands and lots within said assessment district the benefits arising from said work and to be received by each such lot, portion of such lot, piece, or subdivision of land, and thereupon made an assessment to cover the sum due for work performed and specified in said contract." And it is further alleged that under the entire contract the total amount assessed against the district for the work to be paid for by the property holders of the district in proportion as their property was benefited thereby, was the sum of $40,076.92. While under the contract entered into by the defendant De Guarda, and for the performance of which contract the defendant surety company became surety, the total amount to be assessed against the lots in the assessment district in proportion to the benefits conferred was the total amount of $36,538.26. Consequently, the property holders benefited by the improvement in question were under the new contract assessed for $3,538.66 more than they would have been had the defendant De Guarda well and truly performed the contract entered into between De Guarda and the city for the performance of which the defendant surety company became surety. Judgment for said sum of $3,538.66 was therefore demanded by plaintiff as trustee for such property holders. And, as already stated, the demurrer of the surety company was sustained to this second cause of action without leave granted plaintiff to amend. Both respondent and appellant agree that the single question involved on this appeal is, "Can the City of Oakland as trustee for the property owners who are assessed upon performance of the contract by the second contractor for a larger sum than would have been assessed if the first contractor had performed the contract, recover for the benefit of such property owners this excess cost?"

In the case at bar, the bond sued upon is given under the provisions of section 15 of the Street Improvement Act of 1911, and is to be distinguished from the bond providing for a forfeiture given under section 10 of the same act, as construed in the case of Mill Valley v. Bonding, etc., Co., 68 Cal. App. 372, 229 P. 891, and also from the bond to protect laborers and materialmen given under the provisions of section 19 of the act, as construed in the case of Los Angeles S. Co. v. National Surety Co., 178 Cal. 247, 173 P. 79.

In each of the above cases the surety company sought to escape liability by contending for a strict construction of the rule laid down in section 2836 of the Civil Code, to the effect that a surety cannot be held beyond the express terms of his contract. But in each of the above cases the appellate court held the surety company liable under their bond by applying the principle laid down in section 2837 of the Civil Code, to the effect that "in interpreting the terms of a contract of suretyship, the same rules are to be observed as in the case of other contracts."

And in the Mill Valley Case the court availed itself of the following rules of interpretation: "The law at the time of the execution of a bond is a part of it; if it gives to the bond a certain legal effect it is as much a part of the bond as if in terms incorporated therein, and must be construed with the statute [citing cases]." And also, "a contract must receive such an interpretation as will make it lawful and operative if it can be done without violating the intention of the parties. (Civ. Code, sec. 1643.)"

In the case of Los Angeles S. Co. v. National Surety Co., supra, the following rule of construction was made applicable to a surety bond given under section 19 of the Street Improvement Act, in connection with the performance of work of a public character which was for the benefit of specified individuals: "The surety is charged with notice that he is entering into what is in a very proper sense a public obligation and one that will be relied upon by persons who can in no manner control the conduct of the nominal obligee and with respect to whom the latter is a mere trustee"—citing Equitable Surety Co. v. United States, 234 U. S. 448, 34 S. Ct. 803, 58 L. Ed. 1394. And, in applying the foregoing principle of construction to the bond given by the surety company in the case of Los Angeles S. Co. v. National Surety Co., supra, the court also used the following language (citing many cases): "The covenant in the bond should be read in the light of the statute, the purpose of which was to protect those who furnished labor and materials for work described in the contract and not the particular engagements under which the work is done." And in the case at bar, if we are to be guided by the foregoing established rules of interpretation, we should first avail ourselves of "the light of the statute," and determine therefrom, if we can, what was the purpose of the covenant in the bond by which the defendant surety company insured the faithful performance of the contract, and for whose protection such covenant was entered into by the defendant surety company.

Also, as stated in the case of Callan v. Empire State Surety Co., 20 Cal. App. 483, at page 489, 129 P. 978, 980: "Section 2837 of the Civil Code provides that in interpreting the terms of a contract of suretyship, the same rules are to be observed as in the case of other contracts. As was said by Mr. Justice Lorigan in Sather Banking Co. v. Briggs Co., 138 Cal. 724 (72 Pac. 352), 'While it is true that a surety cannot be held beyond the express terms of his contract, yet in interpreting the terms of a contract of suretyship the same rules are to be observed as in the case of other contracts. Such construction does not mean that words are to be distorted out of their natural meaning, or that by an implication something can be read into the contract that it will not reasonably bear; but it means that the contract shall be fairly construed with a view to effect the object for which it was given, and to accomplish the purpose for which it was designed. The old rule of strictissimi juris applies only to the extent that no implication shall be indulged in to impose a burden not clearly inferable from the language of the contract, but does not apply so as to hold that a contract shall not be reasonably interpreted as other contracts are.' (See, also, to the same effect, Pratt v. Matthews, 24 Hun [N. Y.] 387.)"

Also, as stated in the case of Turner v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 187 Cal. 76, at page 85, 200 P. 959, 962:

"In this case the Surety Company stands upon a purely technical defense, and while it is true that the rule is in its favor that it may rely upon the strict terms of its contract, there is no reason in law or equity why the same liberality of construction and interpretation of those terms should not be applied as in construing any other contract.

"In the matter of the obligations of corporations organized to execute surety bonds and securities as a business there is a growing disposition in the courts to hold such sureties to their obligations unless there has been some material departure from the conditions of the agreement. (21 R. C. L. p. 1160; Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1087.)"

See, also, Hunstock v. Royal Securities Corp., 51 Cal. App. 769, at bottom of page 773, 197 P. 763, 765.

In the case at bar, it is the contention of the respondent surety company that the covenant in the bond reciting that the bond was given for the faithful performance of the covenants of the contract was applicable only to that portion of the work to be paid for by the city, and was consequently for the sole benefit of the city of Oakland individually, as set out in the first cause of action, because the city of Oakland was the only obligee expressly mentioned by name in the bond. But, if the foregoing rules of interpretation, applied in the cases cited above, be applied in the case at bar, and the bond be construed in the light of the statute in pursuance of whose provisions it is given, and in the light of the contract as a whole to protect the performance of which the bond was given, and "with a view to effecting the object for which it was given and to accomplish the purpose for which it was designed," and that this rule of interpretation be applied for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not in truth and in fact the city of Oakland was intended to be the sole and only beneficiary of the covenant of the bond insuring faithful performance of the contract—if this be done, it would seem to follow that the same result may be obtained in the case at bar as was obtained in the cases cited above, where the respective surety companies, when sued by the actual beneficiaries of the bond who paid for protection under the bond, were required to respond to the obligations clearly assumed by such surety companies under their contracts of suretyship.

From the language of the statute as it must be construed, it appears that the amount of the bond, for the giving of which the surety company receives compensation, is based, not simply upon the contract price of the work that is to be paid for by the city alone, but the amount of the bond and the consequent risk assumed by the surety company thereunder is based upon the contract price of the entire work done under the contract, including both the work which is for the special benefit of the city as a whole and the work which is for the special benefit of the individuals owning the specific properties within the assessment district. And, consequently from this provision alone of the statute relating to the amount of the bond, a fair inference may be drawn that the obligations of the bond are intended to be for the benefit, not only of the city individually, but also for the benefit of the property holders within the assessment district who, under the contract, bear the greater portion of the burden of the contract, the faithful performance of the whole of which is intended to be protected by the bond as construed in the light of the provisions of the statute and in the light of the contract itself. But it is respondent's contention that, notwithstanding the foregoing facts stated and admitted as true in the complaint, no recovery should be had on behalf of the property holders because "the sole beneficiary of the bond was the City of Oakland * * * and no mention is made of the property holders in either the bond or the contract, and the only damage respondent obligated itself to pay was the damage suffered by the city." And in this connection respondent contends "that in the case at bar the liability under the bond extends only to the city in that the only purpose appearing from a reading of both the bond and contract is that of protecting the city from any damage it might suffer."

[2] It is undoubtedly true, as contended by learned counsel, that "it is not so nominated in the bond" given by the surety company in so many words or by expressed language that the property holders "were to be beneficiaries." Nor is it "so nominated" by the express terms of the statute. But defendant's bond should be construed, not only in connection with the contract which it was given to protect, but also in connection with the statute in pursuance of which the contract was entered into and the bond given. Also the rights and obligations of the parties herein should be considered in the light of established principles of equity. As to the contention of the respondent that the property holders were and are not in law and equity the rightful beneficiaries of the contract and the bond given by the defendant surety company holding the surety company bound that the said contract should be in "full force and effect" in the event that the defendant contractor "should fail to perform the covenants of such contract"—at the outstart sections 1 and 2 of the statute provide that the city council of each municipality "is hereby invested with jurisdiction to order to be done thereon any of the work mentioned in this act under the proceedings hereinafter described," and that "whenever the public interest or convenience may require, the City Council is hereby authorized and empowered to order the whole or any portion" of the streets of the city to be graded, etc. And throughout the balance of the statute and in every portion of the statute pertaining to the carrying on of the work and raising money to pay for the work it is clearly recognized and impliedly expressed that the property holders owning property abutting on the work have a special interest in the work, and under the law this special interest in the work is based upon the presumption that their particular property being specially benefited by the work, as such property holders they are rightfully burdened with the obligation to bear the expense of the work upon a proper performance of the work. Section 3 recognized the equitable doctrine that cost of the work should not be assessed against any property holder where the council has excepted from the frontage "any of said work already done upon a street to the official grade"; and section 3 provides that "the lots and portions of lots fronting upon said excepted work already done shall not be included in the frontage assessment for the class of work from which the exception is made"; and section 4, in recognition of the equitable doctrine that the expense assessable on any lot should not exceed one-half of the total assessed value of the lots and lands assessed, makes special provision that the expense in such a case may be made "chargeable upon a district, which the said City Council shall * * * declare to be the district benefited by said work or improvement"; and section 5 of the act, in further recognition of the special interest of the abutting property holders in the work, makes special provision that notices of the passage of the resolution of intention shall be "posted along the line of said contemplated work or improvement, at not more than 300 feet in distance apart, * * * and thereafter all persons shall be deemed to have notice of the date of the completion of such posting." Section 6 provides that, after the posting and publication of the notice of the resolution then "any owner of property liable to be assessed for said work may make written protest against the proposed work or against the extent of the district to be assessed, or both"; and, in further recognition of the interest possessed in said work by the property holders, section 6 makes special provision for the time and place for the hearing of such protests and provides that if "the City Council finds that such protest is made by the owners of more than one-half of the area of the property to be assessed for said improvements, no further proceedings shall be taken for a period of six months from the date when said protest was received. * * *" And section 7 specifically provides that the council may not be deemed to have acquired jurisdiction to order the proposed improvements until "fifteen days after the date of the completion of the posting of the said notice of improvement. * * *" And sections 11 and 12 provide that, after the work is ordered and the contract awarded, that notice "of such award of contracts shall be posted for five days," and shall be published in a certain manner; and, in further recognition of the interest of the property holders owning "frontage of lots and lands liable to be assessed," it is provided that "within ten days after the first publication of said notice of said award," the owners of three-fourths of said frontage may "elect to take said work and enter into a written contract to do the whole work at the price at which the same has been awarded." Sections 13 and 14, in recognition of the agency of the city in furthering the work, provide that there shall be further advertising in the event that the original bidder neglects to enter into the contract. Section 15, after the foregoing recognition in the statute of the interest in the work possessed by the property holders and the duty on the part of the city to expedite the commencement of and the carrying on of the work to the advantage of the parties interested therein, provides that "all contractors, contracting owners included, shall, at the time of executing any contract for street work, execute a bond to the satisfaction and approval of the Superintendent of Streets of said City, with two or more sureties and payable to such City, in a sum not less than twenty-five per cent. of the amount of the contract, conditioned for the faithful performance of the contract." It was under the provisions of the foregoing section that the bond of the defendant surety company herein was executed, and the sections immediately following clearly show that the property holders by virtue of the interest they have in the work and the further fact that they, and they alone, ultimately and directly pay for the work including, of course, as a part of the cost of the work the remuneration which the defendant National Surety Company received for executing its bond, it is quite apparent that in equity at least such property holders should be deemed to be the persons beneficially interested, not only in the contract under which the work is done, but also in the bond given to secure and insure the faithful performance of the contract; and section 16 indicates and demonstrates how highly interested in the work such property holders are, and to what extent by virtue of their interest therein they can waive defects in any of the proceedings "relating to said improvement." And, as indicating the trusteeship of the city in the performance of the work being done as aforesaid for the benefit of the property holders who are interested therein by virtue of their frontage holdings, section 18 provides that the superintendent of streets is authorized in his official capacity to make all written contracts and to receive all bonds authorized by this act, and to do any other act either express or implied that pertains to the street department under this act; and the city council may by ordinance prescribe general rules directing the superintendent of streets and the contractor as to the materials to be used and the mode of executing the work and "the assessment and apportionment of the expenses of all such work, or improvement shall be made by the Superintendent of Streets in the mode provided by this Act." Section 19 provides for the execution of the bond to be "made to inure to the benefit of any and all persons, companies or corporations who perform labor on, or furnish materials to be used in the said work or improvement." This bond is for the direct benefit of the materialmen, and is only indirectly for the benefit of the property holders, and it is for the benefit of the property holders in that it induces a larger class of materialmen to compete in the work. And, as conclusive and ultimate proof of the fact that in law and equity the property holders are the persons deemed to be beneficially interested in the performance of the work, it is provided in subdivision 1 of section 20 that "the expenses incurred for any work authorized by this act * * * shall be assessed upon the lots and lands fronting thereon, except as otherwise in this act specifically provided; each lot or portion of a lot being separately assessed, in proportion to the frontage, at a rate per front foot sufficient to cover the total expense of the work." And other subdivisions of the same section provide in detail for the equitable assessment of such cost upon the property and owners benefited by such work. Section 26, in further recognition of the interest possessed in said work by the property holders who are specifically benefited thereby, provides that "the owners, whether named in the assessment or not, the contractor, or his assigns, and all other persons directly interested in any work done under this act, or in the assessment, feeling aggrieved by any act or determination of the superintendent of streets in relation thereto, or who claim that the work has not been performed according to the contract in a good and substantial manner, * * * shall, within thirty days after the date of the warrant, appeal to the city council, as provided in this section, by briefly stating their objections in writing, and filing the same with the clerk of said city council," and special provision is made for the hearing of these objections and the correction of the errors indicated therein; and, in further recognition of the interest of the property holders in the work and in indorsement of the fact that such property holders must be specifically benefited thereby, section 27 provides that the contractor or his assign may sue the owner of land, lots, or portion of lots assessed and recover the amount of any assessment remaining unpaid, with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum until paid, and, in addition to cost, may recover attorney's fees, and that notwithstanding that any suit may be settled or a tender may be made before recovering in said action. And section 29 provides that "the court * * * shall have power to adjudge and decree a lien against the premises assessed, and to order such premises to be sold on execution. * * *"

From the foregoing it is therefore evident that in equity the property holders who pay for the work and whose interests are protected in the performance of the work by the provisions of the statute are the beneficiaries of the work, and hence are the beneficiaries in equity, at least, of the bond given to secure the faithful performance of the work. This equitable interest is well recognized by the authorities. Volume 1 (4th Ed.) of Elliott on Roads and Streets, p. 756, par. 646, states in general language as follows: "Street improvement statutes usually provide that a bond shall be required to secure the faithful performance of the contract, but the municipality would doubtless have power to require a bond without any specific grant of authority. It has been held that such a statutory provision is mandatory and for the benefit and protection of the property owners who have to pay for the improvement." Among other cases cited by the author as authority is the case of Barker v. Southern Const. Co. (Ky.) 47 S. W. 608, which uses the following language at page 609: "It seems to us that the statute requiring security for the faithful performance of the contract is mandatory, and manifestly for the benefit and protection of those who have to pay for the improvements, because it is well known that it is possible for work to be apparently done in the manner required, and yet in fact great frauds might be perpetrated by contractors; and, if no security had been taken, the loss would fall upon those who had to pay for the improvements, because, if the improvements prove worthless, the property owners would again be liable to assessment for additional improvements."

In the case at bar, the property holders had a valid and subsisting contract with the defendant De Guarda under the provisions of the statute. As the result of the wrongful default of the contractor, the property holders under the provisions of the statute were obliged to accept and be obligated under the contract from Tobin, which contract required them, under the provisions of the statute, to pay out a large sum in excess of what they were required to pay out under the contract with De Guarda if the same had been performed. And under the bond given by the National Surety Company at their expense they were intended to be protected against any loss which would consequently follow from not having the work done under the first contract.

In other words, it is the clear intent of the statute in this case, not only to recognize, but to give full force and effect and proper protection to, the beneficial interest possessed by the property holders in the performance of the work to be done under the contract entered into in pursuance of the provisions of the statute. This is recognized as already indicated in the various provisions of the statute itself. The city, through its council and its street superintendent, is required by the statute to protect at all stages of the proceedings and recognize this special interest that the property holders have in the contract. And that they are deemed to be beneficially interested is made evident by the very effective remedies given to the contractor to enforce against property holders, both by personal judgment and by a special lien on their property, the rights of the contractor if he faithfully performs his contract. It would, therefore, follow as a matter of right and equity that the duties of the contractor towards the property holder as well as the obligation of those who have gone surety for the contractor should be commensurate with and in direct proportion to the rights which they have against the property holder. In other words, the obligations of the contract as well as of the bond given to secure it should be enforceable for the benefit of the property holders who are made to bear and shoulder the corresponding obligations of the contract. In enforcing the obligations of the property holder, the city, under the statute, for the benefit of the contractor, acts as the agent and assistant of the contractor, and in fairness and equity it would seem that the property holder should be permitted to, at least in a formal way, avail himself of the same use of the city and its good offices. Surely the same public interest which evoked the original action of the city in passing its resolution of intention to do the work would be a sufficient warrant to protect the individuals for whose benefit the work is done and whose interest in the work is specifically recognized at every stage of the progress of the work under the statute. The mere failure on the part of the Legislature to state in hæc verba that the property holders are interested in the work and benefited thereby does not in a court of equity prevent a fair inference to be drawn from the language and purpose of the statute that such beneficial interest does as a matter of fact exist.

[3] In the case at bar, it cannot be said that the contract expressly provides that the defendants have no liability under the bonds. By the explicit language of the bonds, both defendants are liable to some one if the contract is not performed, and by fair and equitable implication they are liable to those interested in the contract. In substance, the only contention of the defendant National Surety Company here is, not that the surety company is not liable under the bond, but that the surety company is not liable to the plaintiff herein suing as trustee for the benefit of the property holders. But equity will not permit the execution of a trust to fail for want of a sufficient trustee, for equity looks to the intent rather than to the form, and regards that as done which ought to be done, and goes beneath the mere external form to the substance of things for the purpose of making its remedies more complete, thereby awarding and securing to the person beneficially interested the remedy to which he is entitled by the principles and doctrines of equity. It would seem that the property holders whose rights under the De Guarda contract were taken away by the failure to well and truly perform such contract and to their damage as already indicated by the enhanced sum they were required to pay for the same work under the statute, that these property holders should have all the resources of a court of equity at their command to pursue their remedy against a defendant who, for a full and fair consideration, insured the performance of the violated contract. 1 Pomeroy's Equity (4th Ed.) 360–380.

In Missouri cases cited and relied upon by counsel (St. Louis v. Wright Contracting Co., 202 Mo. 451, 101 S. W. 6; St. Louis v. Wright Contracting Co., 210 Mo. 491, 109 S. W. 6; St. Louis v. Anderson, 229 Mo. 181, 129 S. W. 528, 138 Am. St. Rep. 414; City of St. Joseph v. Rackliffe-Gibson Const. Co. et al. [Mo. App.] 203 S. W. 223), it does not appear that the statute construed by the learned court contained the numerous provisions enacted in our statute above, showing the direct and tangible interest taken by the city through its council and street superintendent in the performance of the contract and the doing of the work for the benefit of the property holders and the direct interest taken by the city for the benefit of the contractor in requiring the property holder to bear the burdens and pay the expenses of the work, all of which should properly vest in the property holder sufficient correlative rights to enable them to avail themselves of the agency and trusteeship of the city in the enforcement of the statutory bond given to the city for the proper protection of the property holders under the contract in question.

In the case at bar, the same reasoning and the same rule is applicable as was announced by our Supreme Court in the case of Los Angeles S. Co. v. National Surety Co., 178 Cal. 247, 173 P. 79, where the court used the following language taken from the United States Supreme Court in the case of Equitable Surety Co. v. McMillan, 234 U. S. 448, 34 S. Ct. 803, 58 L. Ed. 1394: "The surety is charged with notice that he is entering into what is in a very proper sense a public obligation, and one that will be relied upon by persons who can in no manner control the conduct of the nominal obligee, and with respect to whom the latter is a mere trustee."

Also in the case of City of Philadelphia (to Use of Rose Brick Mfg. Co.) v. Stewart, 195 Pa. 309, 45 A. 1056, it was held that a city may sue in its own name to use of the persons for whose security it was given, on a bond given it by a contractor for city work, conditioned that he shall pay for labor and material furnished therefor and shall comply with an ordinance for protection of subcontractors as well as laborers and materialmen. It was held in that case that "the city recovers on its legal title, though the money may ultimately go to the use of plaintiffs."

Also in the case of City of Alpena v. Title Guarantee Insurance Co., 158 Mich. 678, 123 N. W. 536, it was held that a city contracting for a public work and requiring the contractor to give a bond conditioned on his paying for the labor and materials used in the work, may sue on the bond for the use of materialmen. And the same reasoning which gave this protection to the laborers and materialmen would enable the property holders in this case to avail themselves of the suit brought in their behalf by the city of Oakland, as was done in the case cited, by having the action brought in the name of city of Alpena.

[4] But it is the contention of the respondent "that the obvious result achieved in the event the city is allowed to recover in the capacity of trustee would be that any sum recovered would go in the general fund; lose its identity and the real parties damaged would not be benefited thereby." But this unfortunate conclusion can be based only upon the assumption that the city of Oakland, through its proper officers, would attempt to hold for its own use and benefit money which it had received for the use and benefit of "the real parties damaged," who were rightly and justly entitled to the money. The defendant surety company cannot be permitted to urge in its own defense any such assumed wrongful conduct on the part of the city of Oakland.

The judgment, therefore, is reversed, with direction to the court below to allow plaintiff to amend the complaint as it may be advised.

PEOPLE v. ROSENCRANTZ. (Cr. 1492.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 21, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑1202(1)—Withdrawal of defendant's plea of guilty and dismissal of charge after conviction of felony, if shown by defendant's probation, did not prevent consideration of conviction in subsequent prosecution (Pen. Code, §§ 644, 1203(d).

Withdrawal of defendant's plea of guilty and dismissal of charge after conviction, if shown by probation, did not prevent consideration of the conviction in determining liability of defendant under repeater statute, imposing additional penalty in case of prior conviction for felony (Pen. Code, § 644), since such statute does not relate to manner in which judgment on conviction has been expiated, under section 1203(d).

2. Criminal law 🔑1202(1)—Information in previous prosecution for passing fictitious instrument charged crime as regards applicability of repeater statute (Pen. Code, §§ 476, 644).

Previous information for making and passing a fictitious instrument charged crime under Pen. Code, § 476, denouncing the making and passing of bill, note, check, or other instrument in writing for payment of money, in determining question of defendant's prior conviction for felony under repeater statute (Pen. Code, § 644).

3. Indictment and information 🔑147—Objection to information for uncertainty should be raised by demurrer.

Uncertainty of information in alleging passing of worthless check on particular persons, whereas evidence showed check was made payable to different party, should be raised by demurrer.

4. Witnesses 🔑337(5)—District attorney's reference on cross-examination, for purpose of impeachment, to defendant's second prior conviction, held not error.

Reference by district attorney to defendant's second prior conviction, made on defendant's cross-examination for purpose of impeachment, held not error.

5. Criminal law 🔑624—Refusal to permit trial of question of insanity, first raised near close of trial, and supported only by showing of defendant's previous commitment to asylum, held not error.

Refusal of court to try question of insanity, on request made near close of trial, held not error, where only showing in support of motion was that defendant had been twice committed to asylum, and it was not shown whether she was insane, or was committed for habitual intemperance.

6. Constitutional law 🔑203—Statute imposing life imprisonment for felony, where defendant has been three times previously convicted of felony, held not ex post facto (Pen. Code, § 644, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1066).

Pen. Code, § 644, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1066, fixing term of imprisonment at not less than life, where defendant has been previously three times convicted of felony, held not ex post facto, as adding new punishment to previous convictions.

7. Constitutional law 🔑203—Law authorizing graduation of punishment for future offense by consideration of offender's past conduct is not ex post facto.

Law is not objectionable as ex post facto which, in providing for punishment for future offenses authorizes consideration of offender's past conduct and graduation of punishment accordingly.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

E. Rosencrantz was convicted of fraudulently making, drawing, and uttering a check without sufficient funds, and of three prior convictions for felonies, and she appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 271 P. 902.

W. L. Albert and T. L. Christianson, both of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. Defendant was tried before a jury on an information charging the fraudulent making, drawing, and uttering a check upon a bank without sufficient funds, and also charging three prior convictions of separate felonies. The defendant denied the first prior conviction alleged and admitted the second and third. The jury found her guilty of the offense charged in the information, and also found that she had suffered the first alleged prior conviction. She was thereupon sentenced to the state prison at San Quentin for the term prescribed by law, which, under the terms of section 644, Penal Code, calls for imprisonment for not less than life. From the judgment following the verdict, and from the order denying her a new trial, the defendant has appealed on a typewritten record.

[1] The first prior conviction set out in the information was for fraudulently drawing a check without sufficient funds on January 12, 1920. The defendant denied this conviction, and, the issue having been joined, the jury found against the defendant. She now argues that, because she was given probation following that conviction, it might be possible that the plea of guilty had been withdrawn and the charge dismissed. Aside from the fact that it was for the defendant, and not the state, to prove those circumstances if they existed, it is sufficient to say that they are wholly immaterial here. The Code section (Pen. Code, § 644) relates to a prior conviction of a felony, and not to the manner in which the judgment on the conviction has been expiated. Pen. Code, § 1203, subd. (d).

[2] The second prior conviction set out in the information was alleged to have been for a felony—making and passing a fictitious "instrument." It is now argued that this is not a crime under our Code, but that the law covers the making and passing of fictitious bills, checks, and drafts only. Section 476 of the Penal Code expressly denounces the making and passing of "any fictitious bill, note, or check, purporting to be the bill, note, or check, or other instrument in writing for the payment of money * * * knowing the bill, note, check, or instrument in writing to be fictitious."

[3] It is argued that the information is insufficient because it alleges the passing of a check on G. E. and C. A. Anderson, whereas the evidence shows that the check was made payable to the Auditorium Garage, and the information fails to show any connection between the Andersons and the Auditorium Garage. If the information was uncertain in this respect, the point should have been raised by demurrer, but this was not done. It might be that there is a variance between the pleading and the proof, but this is not the point raised by defendant.

[4] Criticism is made of the action of the district attorney in referring to the second prior conviction, to which charge the defendant had pleaded guilty. The reference was made on cross-examination of the defendant for the purpose of impeachment. This was not error. People v. Oubridge, 38 Cal. App. 68, 69, 175 P. 276, and cases cited.

[5] It is stated, with apparent lack of confidence in the point, that the trial court erred in not trying the question of insanity. The issue of insanity was not raised by the defendant by plea, but near the close of the trial her counsel suggested to the court that he believed her to be insane and requested leave to change the plea and have the question of insanity submitted to the jury. The only showing in support of the motion was that several years before the trial the defendant had been twice committed to an asylum in this state, but whether the commitments were made upon a finding that she was then insane, or whether she was committed for habitual intemperance, was not made clear. We find no error in the court's ruling.

[6, 7] Finally, it is argued that section 644 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1066), and which fixes the term of imprisonment at not less than life where the defendant has been previously three times convicted of a felony, is ex post facto, in that it, in effect, adds new punishment to the previous convictions. "A law is not objectionable as ex post facto which, in providing for the punishment of future offenses, authorizes the offender's conduct in the past to be taken into the account, and the punishment to be graduated accordingly." Ex parte Gutierrez, 45 Cal. 429, 432, quoting from Cooley's Constitutional Limitations.

Ex parte CROWLEY. (Cr. 1064.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 30, 1928.

1. Drunkards ⟹2(1)—Proceedings for commitment of persons charged with excessive use of stimulants must be in substantial compliance with statute (Pol. Code, §§ 2168, 2185c).

Proceedings under Pol. Code, §§ 2168, 2185c, relating to commitment of persons charged with excessive use of stimulants, being purely statutory, the requirements of the statute must be at least substantially, if not strictly, followed in order to give the court wherein it is proposed to hear proceedings jurisdiction thereof.

2. Drunkards ⟹2(1)—Affidavit in proceeding for commitment of person because of excessive use of stimulants held fatally defective for failure to set out facts (Pol. Code, §§ 2168, 2185c).

Affidavit in proceeding under Pol. Code, § 2185c, relating to commitment of person charged with excessive use of stimulants, stating in attempted compliance with section 2168 that person sought to be committed had lost all self-control and will power from the excessive use of stimulants, held fatally defective for failure to set out facts and circumstances with at least some particularity, showing on what the conclusion of the affiant was based.

Application by Ida M. Brickell for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of Eva Crowley, to secure a release from the Napa State Hospital. Writ granted.

Daniel A. Ryan and George F. Snyder, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This matter is before the court upon the petition of Ida M. Brickell, praying for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of Eva Crowley, wherein it is alleged that the said Eva Crowley is unlawfully detained, confined, and restrained of her liberty by Dr. G. W. Ogden, medical superintendent of the Napa State Hospital; that said writ be directed to the said Dr. G. W. Ogden, and that upon the hearing hereof, the writ be granted, restoring said Eva Crowley to her liberty and releasing her from the custody of Dr. G. W. Ogden, as superintendent of said Napa State Hospital. The petition is based upon the alleged insufficiency of the affidavit upon which the proceedings in this matter were instituted to have the said Eva Crowley committed for and on account of the alleged excessive use of intoxicating stimulants, to give the court jurisdiction to proceed with the hearing and commitment of the said Eva Crowley.

The affidavit upon which the proceedings were instituted, in so far as material here, is in the following words: "James B. Crowley, being duly sworn, deposes and says: That there is now, in said county of San Francisco, a person named Eva Crowley who is so far addicted to the intemperate use of stimulants as to have lost the power of self-control." And then, in the attempted statement as required by section 2168 of the Political Code, contains only those words: "Has lost all self-control and will power from the excessive use of stimulants—quarrelsome and threatening." Following what we have just stated, the affidavit prays, in the usual form, that proceedings be had, commitment be made, etc., and is subscribed and sworn to.

The basis for this proceeding is found in section 2185c of the Political Code, containing provisions for the commitment of persons addicted to the intemperate use of narcotics or stimulants to such an extent as to have lost the power of self-control, etc. This section provides for an affidavit being made before a magistrate, and, after so providing, specifies that the affidavit and warrant of arrest must be substantially in the form provided by section 2168 of the Political Code relating to the arrest of persons charged with insanity. Section 2168 of the Political Code contains the form which must be used as a foundation for the proceeding, and also requires that the facts relating to the party charged, or the actions of the party charged, must be set forth. The cases based upon this section in this state relative to the commitment of persons charged with the intemperate use of intoxicating liquors require, in order to give jurisdiction for the institution of the proceeding, that something more be set forth than the mere opinion of the person making the affidavit; that is, that the facts and circumstances be detailed with at least some particularity, showing upon what the conclusion of the affiant is based, and not merely the opinion or conclusion of the person making the affidavit.

[1, 2] Upon the hearing of this cause it was urged with considerable emphasis that, while the hearing was had in a superior court, it was and is a proceeding in which such court exercises only limited powers, and that, therefore, the presumptions and intendments in favor of the jurisdiction, which prevail where a cause is heard before a court of general jurisdiction, do not apply; that upon habeas corpus the scope of inquiry is not limited, by reason of the order of commitment, as is the case after trial in a criminal cause upon an information or indictment. By reason of the decisions hereafter set forth upon which the order of the court in this cause will be based, we deem it unnecessary to enter into a discussion of this question, as it would only be academic, in that it is not requisite to any determination we may make herein.

It is sufficient to state that the proceeding in relation to the commitment of persons charged with the excessive use of stimulants is much narrower in its provisions than those which are provided for an inquiry into a determination of a person's mental state. If a person is found by the court to be insane, he is entitled to a jury trial, whereas, the provisions of section 2174 of the Political Code awarding a jury trial to an alleged insane person, do not extend that right to one alleged to be an excessive user of intoxicating liquors. It may also be stated that proceedings such as the one under consideration are purely statutory, and are not based upon the common law, which has always recognized the power of courts or commissions in lunacy, to inquire into the mental condition of persons alleged to be insane. This leads to the conclusion that the requirements of the statutes must be at least substantially, if not strictly, followed, in order to give the court wherein it is proposed to hear the proceedings, jurisdiction thereof. Thus the cases hold that facts and not conclusions must appear in the affidavit filed at the institution of the matter, and upon which the validity of further proceedings must rest. If jurisdiction is not acquired by reason of the affidavit not complying with section 2168 of the Political Code, it appears that the subsequent action of the court in directing the issuance of the commitment does not give vitality to that which was void in the first instance.

In the case of Henley v. Superior Court, 162 Cal. 239, 121 P. 921, the affidavit under consideration, in a case where one was held for examination under the Code provision, supra, relating to the excessive use of stimulants, read as follows: "Nellie H. Tayler, being duly sworn, deposes and says that there is now in said county, in the city or town of Sacramento, a person named Wm. Henley, who is so far addicted to the intemperate use of stimulants as to have lost the power of self-control." The court in that cause issued a writ of prohibition restraining the superior court from proceeding with an inquiry as to whether Wm. Henley was or was not addicted to the excessive use of intoxicating liquors, based upon such an affidavit, holding that the affidavit was fatally defective and did not give the court jurisdiction, and a writ of prohibition was ordered issued. The affidavit in that case is, in all substantial particulars, no different from the affidavit presented to us for consideration.

If a writ of prohibition will issue restraining a court from further proceedings upon an affidavit which does not give the court jurisdiction, we do not perceive how the taking of proceedings by a court not having jurisdiction to proceed can logically lead to the conclusion that an affidavit, void at the beginning of the hearing, becomes valid at the conclusion thereof. It is not a question of mere insufficiency; it is a failure to give life at the very birth of the cause, and we do not see how a court, proceeding to do that which it has no jurisdiction to do, can "animate the corpse."

In Re Watson, 63 Cal. App. 424, 218 P. 600, this court held that an affidavit charging that "James * * * Watson had been for a period of several weeks last past, and then and there is a person who, from the inordinate use of alcoholic liquor and the influence thereof is irresponsible in his acts and insane therefrom," insufficient to give the court jurisdiction, citing the sections of the Political Code hereinbefore referred to, and also the case of Henley v. Superior Court, supra.

Somewhat analogous to the proceedings here under consideration are the provisions of the Juvenile Court Law (St. 1915, p. 1225), although certain sections of that law provide for appeals, and in that respect are less drastic than the provisions of the Political Code relative to the commitment of inebriates. Nevertheless, under the Juvenile Court Law, if the petition upon which the proceedings are founded is insufficient to give the court jurisdiction, a writ of habeas corpus will lie for the discharge of the juvenile so held after commitment.

In the Matter of the Application of Azhocar, 49 Cal. App. 352, 193 P. 505, for a writ of habeas corpus, where a commitment had been issued, the court held as follows: "A ward of the juvenile court is entitled to her discharge on habeas corpus where the petition upon which the order of commitment was made was insufficient to confer jurisdiction."

Likewise, in the Matter of the Application of Richard Watts Burner, 23 Cal. App. 637, 139 P. 90, it was held, after commitment, that, if the petition was insufficient to give the court jurisdiction, the juvenile was entitled to discharge upon habeas corpus. Also, in the Matter of Edward Mundell, 3 Cal. App. 472, 86 P. 833, upon application for a writ of habeas corpus after commitment, it was held that the petitioner was entitled to the writ on the ground that the petition was insufficient to give the court jurisdiction.

While we have pointed out that the Code provisions relative to committing inebriates are more restrictive in the rights granted to such a person than the rights guaranteed to a person charged with insanity, nevertheless it has been held that in lunacy proceedings the statutory requirements giving jurisdiction must be strictly followed. 32 Cal. Jur. p. 634.

In view of the cases which we have cited, we see no escape from the conclusion that Eva Crowley is entitled to the writ prayed for herein, and it is so ordered, and the said Eva Crowley is hereby discharged from the custody of Dr. G. W. Ogden, as superintendent of the Napa State Hospital.

I concur: FINCH, P. J.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by R. A. Smith against L. Pittler. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Crabbe, of San Francisco, for appellant.

William Klein, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Plaintiff recovered a money judgment against defendant upon two assigned claims. One claim of $960 was for the purchase by defendant while in New York from Anton D. Dimou & Co. of a quantity of raw furs, and the other claim of $124.25 was for the cost of matching and sewing said furs by Albanos Company, also of New York. When the purchased furs arrived in San Francisco by express, the defendant refused to accept them, claiming that they arrived later than agreed upon. In addition to this claim she now claims the contract was within the statute of frauds. This appeal on these points resolves itself into a question of fact as to whether the sale and delivery of the furs was complete in New York.

[1] The plaintiff's several witnesses testified that defendant visited the place of business of Anton D. Dimou & Co., where she selected and purchased the furs upon 60 days' credit; that she ordered the furs taken to the shop of Albanos Company for finishing; that she accompanied the furs to the latter place and gave directions there for finishing and shipment to San Francisco; in other words, that she purchased the furs outright from the first merchant, received delivery of them, and then made her own separate contract with the second merchant for the finishing and shipment of the furs. This is the version of the transaction which the court accepted in making its findings and decision in favor of plaintiff. Defendant's testimony is in direct conflict with this version of the transaction, but the record fails to show that the trial court did not decide this issue of fact in accordance with the weight of the evidence. Delivery and purchase being complete in New York, the above-mentioned points on appeal furnish no warrant in law for defendant to refuse delivery of or payment for the furs.

Defendant's version of the transaction is set out in her answer. Her answer denies the allegation of the complaint that said Anton D. Dimou & Co., Inc., on the 16th day of October, 1925, sold and delivered to defendant merchandise for the agreed price of $960, terms 60 days. This denial is immediately followed by the following allegation: "In that regard defendant alleges that on or about the 16th day of October, 1925, said Anton D. Dimou & Co., Inc., plaintiff's assignor, sold to defendant herein in New York certain Baum Martin dressed skins to be by them made up for the agreed price of $1,040.00, terms eighty dollars on receipt of goods in San Francisco, the balance in sixty days, said goods to be delivered in San Francisco not later than November 1, 1925; that said goods were purchased for the Christmas season of 1925; that said goods did not arrive at San Francisco until December, 1925, too late for the said season's sale; that plaintiff on or about November 13, 1925, notified the said Anton D. Dimou & Co., Inc., that owing to the fact that the goods were not received, she would not be able to use them, and that the order was canceled."

[2] The only evidence offered of any attempted cancellation on November 13 was defendant's letter on that date to Albanos Company. There was none written to Anton D. Dimou & Co. before December 7. The furs had been shipped by express by Albanos Company on December 1, to defendant at San Francisco. Regardless of dates, appellant could not cancel her purchase from Anton D. Dimou & Co., Inc., after a complete sale and delivery in New York, even if Albanos Company was too slow in performing its agreement to finish the furs. In making its findings of fact, the court followed the allegations of the complaint and ignored the above-quoted allegation of the answer. This is assigned as error. This allegation was sufficiently covered by the findings on the first cause of action, which on this point, omitting unnecessary words, were "that on the 16th of October, Anton D. Dimou & Co. sold and delivered to defendant merchandise for the agreed price of $960, terms 60 days."

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes and on the second cause of action, in substance, "that in the month of November, 1925, Albanos Company performed work, labor and services and furnished materials to defendant at her special instance and request —reasonable value $124.25." The allegation in the answer, although in the form of an affirmative allegation, is really nothing more than a denial of the contract as alleged in the complaint, specifying that a different contract was made, so different that the two could not both be true. Such an allegation may be treated in the findings as a traverse and does not constitute an allegation of new matter. Goddard v. Fulton, 21 Cal. 430; Kendrick v. Gould, 51 Cal. App. 712, 197 P. 681.

[3] If Albanos Company was a partnership doing business under a fictitious name, plaintiff, as its assignee, was still entitled to maintain this action in California. The provisions of Civil Code, § 2468, prohibiting partnerships transacting business in this state under a fictitious name from maintaining an action, do not apply to a partnership not transacting business in this state. Moon v. Martin, 185 Cal. 361, 363, 197 P. 77; Haun v. Rosenmayer, 46 Cal. App. 353, 189 P. 117.

[4, 5] The proof of assignment of the claim of Albanos Company to Anton D. Dimou & Co. is sufficient. Besides the written and acknowledged assignment there is the testimony of Theo. Albanos to the assignment. Defendant had transacted business for seven years with Theo. Albanos, acting for Albanos Company, including the transaction sued upon in the second cause of action herein. If there are any technical defects in the execution of the written assignment the testimony of Theo. Albanos that the document was delivered as the assignment of the claim of Albanos Company would be sufficient. 3 Cal. Jur. "Assignments," §§ 20, 21. The reassignment of the Albanos Company claim from Anton D. Dimou & Co. to the plaintiff is free from all criticism as to form. Only the authority of the president to execute it is questioned. This assignment is executed in writing in the name of the corporation, by its president, and under the seal of the corporation properly acknowledged and proved. This is sufficient without proof of a formal resolution authorizing the president to execute the assignment. Greig v. Riordan, 99 Cal. 316, 33 P. 913.

[6] The court properly found the corporate existence of Anton D. Dimou & Co., without its charter being offered in evidence. Defendant contracted with the company as a corporation, addressed letters to it as a corporation, and in her answer alleged special terms of the contract made with that company as a corporation. Having made the contract with the corporation, she cannot deny its corporate capacity, when it undertakes to sue on that contract. Fresno Canal, etc., Co. v. Warner, 72 Cal. 379, 14 P. 37; J. I. Case Threshing Machine Co. v. Copren Bros., 45 Cal. App. 159, 187 P. 772; Curtin v. Salomon, 80 Cal. App. 470, 251 P. 237.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

FRELIGH v. McGREW et al. (Civ. 5860.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 4, 1928.

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑39—Understanding of parties preliminary to executing lease became merged in completed document.

Understanding and stipulation of parties preliminary to execution of lease became merged in completed and executed document.

2. Fraud 🔑22(1)—Misrepresentations, if made by defendant's agent, that objectionable clause in lease was eliminated, did not show fraud, where plaintiff had opportunity to read lease or refer it to attorney before signing.

In action to recover money paid in leasing apartment, on ground that money was obtained by false representations, representations, if made, by defendant's agents, that clause in contract requiring chattel mortgage on furniture to secure rent had been eliminated, when in fact it had not, could not be relied on by plaintiff to establish fraud, where plaintiff had ample opportunity to read conditions of lease before signing it, or refer it to attorney as she previously did.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑27—Contract for lease, which plaintiff had opportunity to read or have approved, held valid and enforceable, unless rescinded.

Contract for lease of apartment house, which plaintiff had opportunity to read or refer to attorney before signing, held valid, and, unless there was rescission, contract would remain in force, entitling defendant to retain first and last month's rent paid down in accordance with contract.

4. Landlord and tenant 🔑34(4)—Plaintiff, suing to recover rent paid two years after signing of lease, held not to have complied with statute requiring prompt rescission after discovery of facts entitling plaintiff to rescind (Civ. Code, § 1691).

Where lease was executed by plaintiff, who was under no disability preventing her from ascertaining contents thereof, and suit to recover rent paid down was not brought until two years after lease was signed, delay, without explanation, showed noncompliance with Civ. Code, § 1691, requiring person rescinding contract to rescind promptly on discovering facts entitling him to rescind.

5. Courts ⚿188(3)—Suits to rescind contracts are equitable, and not within municipal court's jurisdiction (Civ. Code, § 3406; Code Civ. Proc. § 76).

Suits for judicial rescission and cancellation of contracts, under Civ. Code, § 3406, are essentially equitable actions, of which municipal court has no jurisdiction, under Code Civ. Proc. § 76, giving superior court original jurisdiction in all cases in equity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Henry M. Willis, Judge.

Action by Stella M. Freligh against Susan B. McGrew, also known as Susan Underwood, and others. Judgment for plaintiff was reversed by the superior court, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 260 P. 805.

Arsen Yeretzian, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Stephen Monteleone, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

KEETCH, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff and appellant brought an action in the municipal court of Los Angeles county to recover the sum of $1,000 paid by her in a transaction involving the leasing of an apartment house in the city of Los Angeles, owned by the defendant Mrs. Susan B. McGrew. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and defendant appealed to the superior court. The matter is now before us on appeal from a judgment of reversal rendered by the superior court.

It appears, from the facts contained in the statement submitted to the superior court on appeal, that about September 9, 1924, Mrs. Freligh began negotiations for the leasing of the McGrew Apartments through Mrs. McGrew's agents, R. J. Frank and J. M. Schisler, codefendants named in the complaint. The term of the proposed lease was for 10 years, at a monthly rental of $500, unfurnished, the first and last months' rent to be paid in advance. The premises were under lease at the time to a Mrs. Craig, and she owned the furniture. It is claimed by the plaintiff that prior to the execution of the lease on Sepember 14, 1924, Frank and Schisler, as the agents of Mrs. McGrew, made certain promises of assistance to her, the plaintiff, in order to close the deal, including an offer of a loan of $500 with which to complete the purchase of the furniture from Mrs. Craig. The lease was prepared, and plaintiff submitted it to her attorney, who made several objections to it. Another lease was presented to the plaintiff for her signature, and it is claimed by her that Frank and Schisler stated that it had been corrected to conform to her wishes. She signed it without reading it, and without again submitting it to her attorney. This fact is admitted by her. Shortly after she discovered that Mrs. Craig had disposed of the furniture, and at about the same time she also discovered that one of the clauses in the lease to which she particularly had objected, requiring the giving of a chattel mortgage upon the furniture to secure the rent, had not been changed or eliminated. These statements of the plaintiff are specifically denied by the defendants; they asserting that Mrs. Freligh's negotiations for the purchase of the furniture from Mrs. Craig was an independent transaction, unknown to Mrs. McGrew, and had nothing whatever to do with the execution of the lease, and that as to the latter the plaintiff had signed it with full knowledge of its contents. Whatever conflict there may be in these particulars, it is undisputed that the lease was executed by the parties, that the receipt of the $1,000 for the first and last months' rental is acknowledged therein, and that plaintiff took possession of the premises and occupied them for several months thereafter.

The complaint consists of two counts, one in the nature of the common count for money had and received, and the other a recital of the contentions of plaintiff as briefly outlined above, and in effect charging that the signature of the plaintiff to the lease was procured by means of false representations. In reversing the judgment, the lower court held as to the first count that, in order to maintain an action for money had and received, when paid under an alleged fraudulent contract, there must have been a rescission of the contract in accordance with the requirements of sections 1689 and 1691 of the Civil Code, and that there was nothing in the record to indicate that that had been done; hence, that the finding of the trial court was erroneous.

It is the contention of appellant here that under the facts as stated there was no need for rescission, because the money was obtained by false representations. In support of this claim counsel relies chiefly upon the language of the court in Minor v. Baldridge, 123 Cal. 191, 55 P. 785. In that case it appears that Baldridge, as representative of the California, Oregon & Idaho Railway Company, entered into a contract with the plaintiff by which the latter agreed to pay $20,000 in six installments to the corporation, in connection with the building of a proposed railroad, conditioned upon the corporation's building the road up Mad river and to purchase lumber from the plaintiff. Some time after the contract was signed Baldridge represented that the terminal had been secured on Humboldt bay and that the first installment of the money was due. The plaintiff, relying upon this statement, paid over $1,000 to the corporation. The jury found the representations to be false, and that the defendant had never purchased lumber from the plaintiff. The language of the court, as quoted by appellant, is as follows: "The action is not based upon a breach of a contract, nor is it necessary to have a rescission of the contract to enable plaintiff to maintain his action. The theory is that the money was obtained upon a false representation that it had become due under the contract, by the performance of the conition precedent by the corporation. This might all be, and the contract still remain in force."

[1-3] It may here be said that, whatever may have been the understandings and stipulations of the parties preliminary to the execution of the lease in the instant case, they became merged in the completed and executed document, and apparently the only basis for plaintiff's contention of fraud is the statement of plaintiff that the agents of Mrs. McGrew assured her that the clause in the contract to which she had objected had been eliminated when it had not. These representations were denied by all of the defendants; but, assuming that they were not, there is no dispute of the fact that Mrs. Freligh, the plaintiff, had ample opportunity to read and ascertain the conditions of the lease before signing it, or, if she preferred, to refer it to her attorney as she had done in the previous instance. This she admits she did not do, and under the circumstances she was not entitled to rely upon the representations of the defendants, if they were made to her as she alleges. Oppenheimer v. Clunie, 142 Cal. 316, 75 P. 900. The contract was a valid, existing contract, and, unless there was a rescission, it would "still remain in force," to quote the language of the court in the case cited by appellant, and under its terms Mrs. McGrew would be entitled to retain the $1,000 paid as the first and last months' rent.

In Oppenheimer v. Clunie, supra, which was an action to have a lease canceled upon the ground that the defendant had made false representations as to certain conditions of a building, the plaintiff took possession and occupied the premises for some months after the contract for lease had been executed. The lease was signed in October, 1900, and the action was not brought until January 10, 1902. It was held that the plaintiff could not maintain his action to rescind, because he did not rescind promptly, and also that he had accepted and ratified the lease after full knowledge of the facts. In this connection the court quotes Pomeroy in his work on Equity Jurisprudence (section 894) as follows: "If in a contract of sale or leasing, representations are made by the vendor concerning some incidents, qualities, or attributes of the subject-matter which are open and visible, so that the falsity of the statement is patent to an ordinary observer, and it is made to appear that the purchaser at, or shortly before, the concluding of the contract, had seen the thing itself which constitutes the subject-matter, then a knowledge of the facts is chargeable upon such party; he is assumed to have made the agreement knowingly, and cannot allege that he was misled by the false representations."

In the case of McGibbon v. Schmidt, 172 Cal. 75, 155 P. 463, the court said: "The action to recover the purchase money was not based on fraud. It was in the form of an action for money had and received. It could not have been successfully maintained except by proof that the contract had been rescinded, or that defendant had been guilty of a breach thereof. The judgment of nonsuit was, therefore, as we must presume, based upon the fact that no rescission, termination, or breach of the contract had been proven and that it was still in force; that the plaintiff had no remedy such as she sought to enforce by that action."

[4] In the case of Deasy v. Taylor, 39 Cal. App. 235, 178 P. 538, which was an action to set aside certain agreements and transfers on the ground of fraud, it was alleged that certain of the defendants named, knowing the plaintiff to be ill, intoxicated, and unable to transact business, fraudulently procured and caused her to sign the document in question, and the court so found. It was there held that it was necessary for the plaintiff to rescind. It is also pointed out in that case that one of the essential elements of an effective rescission required by section 1691 of the Civil Code is that the person seeking to rescind must do so promptly upon discovery of the facts which would entitle him to rescind, if he is free from duress, menace, undue influence, or disability, and is aware of his right to rescind.

We have already noted, so far as is shown by the record before us, that the plaintiff here was under no disability which would prevent her from reading or ascertaining the contents of the lease before she signed it, and it also appears from the record that the instrument in question was signed in September, 1924, and that the action was filed in the municipal court in October, 1926, or two years later, which, without explanation, would certainly indicate a noncompliance with the statute in this particular alone. We again cite the case of Oppenheimer v. Clunie upon this point, where the court, after stating that "it is a fundamental rule in * * * equity that a party desiring to rescind must do so promptly," quotes further from the language of Pomeroy (section 837) as follows: "The person who has been misled is required, as soon as he learns the truth, with all reasonable diligence to disaffirm the contract, or abandon the transaction, and give the other party an opportunity of rescinding it, and of restoring both of them to their original position. * * * If after discovering the untruth of the representations, he conducts himself with reference to the transaction as though it were still subsisting and binding, he thereby waives all benefit of and relief from the misrepresentations."

[5] As to the second cause of action, the superior court, in its opinion, stated as follows: "The second cause of action purports to be an action for judicial rescission under the authority of section 3406 of the Civil Code. If it is an attempt to secure such judicial rescission, it must prove abortive, as the municipal court has no jurisdiction of such an action. Suits for judicial rescission and cancellation of contracts are essentially equitable actions of which the municipal court has no jurisdiction." Section 76 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "the superior court shall have original jurisdiction in all cases in equity." After a perusal of the allegations of the second cause of action the correctness of the decision as reached by the judge of the superior court is apparent and requires no further comment by us. We are also in accord with the holding that the findings of fact "do not sustain the conclusions of law nor the judgment based thereon."

Judgment affirmed.

In prosecution for grand theft, proposed instructions, which were fully covered by instructions given in so far as they were sound, held properly refused.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

Steve Lalor was convicted of grand theft, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph A. Brown, of San Francisco, and Carl E. Lindsey, of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The district attorney filed an information against the defendant charging him with having committed grand theft. The defendant appeared, pleaded not guilty, and a trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury, the jury returned a verdict of guilty, the defendant made a motion in arrest of judgment, the motion was denied, the defendant made a motion for a new trial, the motion was denied, and the defendant has appealed from the orders and the judgment.

[1] The defendant contends that the information does not state a public offense. The charging part of the information is as follows: "The district attorney for the county of Fresno, state of California, hereby accuses Steve Lalor of the crime of a felony, towit: grand theft, in that the said Steve Lalor on or about the 9th day of November, 1927, at and in the said county of Fresno, and state of California, unlawfully took the property of one Margaret J. Adams, consisting of 400 shares of the stock of the 'Great Republic Life Insurance Company' of a value in excess of $200, lawful money of the United States." If we omit the words, "consisting of 400 shares of the stock of the Great Republic Life Insurance Company," the information as written follows literally the provisions of section 484, section 487, and section 952 of the Penal Code, as those sections were amended in 1927 (St. 1927, pp. 1043, 1044, 1046). By inserting the deleted phrase, an information which was otherwise sufficient was not made insufficient.

[2] In the next place, the defendant contends that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict and judgment, and insufficient to show that the defendant committed any offense. After stating some of the facts, the defendant clarifies his contention by saying "there is not a vestige of evidence as a matter of law connecting the defendant with the offense prior to its commission nor any sufficient evidence therein of guilt or criminal participation prior to the commission of the offense." As shown by the opening statement of the district attorney and by the evidence tendered by him, it was at all times the theory of the prosecution that this defendant and a man sometimes called Fred Burdette, alias Walter C. Gillette, alias Herman Fink, did, prior to November 4, 1927, form a conspiracy to obtain possession of the certificates of stock of the Great Republic Life Insurance Company (a corporation doing business in Los Angeles) and thereafter converting the certificates into cash. In carrying out this conspiracy, Fred Burdette was to appear and interview the stockholder and make the representation that the Great Republic Life Insurance Company was about to amalgamate with the Philadelphia Life Insurance Company, and that under the plan one share of stock in the amalgamated company would be issued for two shares of stock of the Great Republic Life Insurance Company; that to substantiate his representations Gillette carried what purported to be a letter written on the letterhead of the Great Republic Life Insurance Company and purporting to be signed by two of the well-known officials of that company; that, after the conspirators had obtained the certificates, then this defendant would negotiate the sale of the certificates and divide the proceeds; that, in conducting these proceedings, Burdette introduced himself as Walter C. Gillette, and exhibited what purported to be the letter of authorization, but which in truth and in fact was entirely a forgery. Following out this theory of its case, the prosecution called witnesses showing: That Burdette and Lalor were together as early as November 4, 1927. That on the 7th they were in Fresno and this defendant registered himself and also registered Burdette under the name of Herman Fink at the Hotel Californian in Fresno, where they took rooms 511 and 512. That on the same date they called at the Wilbur ranch, where Burdette introduced himself as Gillette. That Mr. Wilbur was not at home, and the two left, but that Burdette returned the next day. That on the 9th they called at the post office in Caruthers, a small town located in Fresno county. That at about half past 1 in the afternoon Burdette entered the post office and inquired as to the residence of the prosecuting witness Margaret J. Adams. On being informed of the location of her residence, he went outside and was afterwards seen standing by the side of an automobile talking to a man who was seated in the automobile and who was identified as this defendant. At about 2 p. m. Burdette called on Mrs. Adams and introduced himself as Walter C. Gillette, exhibited the letter above referred to, made the representation hereinbefore recited, and induced her to indorse and deliver her certificate of stock. That thereafter he delivered to her a receipt. While in the house he obtained from H. A. Adams his certificate in the same manner, and executed to him a receipt. On the 11th this defendant and Burdette were in San Francisco. This defendant had the certificates in his possession and delivered the same to W. S. Hopkins with instructions to negotiate a sale and pay the proceeds to the defendant. On that same date Hopkins delivered the certificates to Martin Judge, Jr., & Co. On the next day that company delivered to Hopkins its check for $1,500, which Hopkins cashed and thereafter paid the moneys to this defendant in the defendant's room at the Hotel Plaza. On the same day this defendant paid Burdette out of said moneys the sum of $600. Thereafter, on the 15th, Martin Judge paid Hopkins $3,449.12 in the form of a check. Hopkins immediately cashed the check, and on the same date at the same place paid the defendant the proceeds. Both Mr. and Mrs. Adams testified that they had never received anything for their respective certificates. Persons to whom Burdette had introduced himself under the name of Gillette were shown a picture of Burdette, and they testified it was a picture of the man who called himself Gillette. Writings proved to have been made by the person claiming to be Gillette were shown to persons who stated they were written by Fred Burdette. We think it needs no argument to show that the evidence so introduced was sufficient to prove the offense alleged in the information and that the offense was committed as contended by the prosecution.

[3, 4] The defendant contends that the trial court erred in receiving evidence. We think it did. However, the error was not against the defendant but in the defendant's favor. Many items of evidence, each tending in some degree to prove a conspiracy, were erroneously rejected. For the purpose of proving the conspiracy, the prosecution called Arthur M. Elburg, who resides at Cupertino, Santa Clara county, and attempted to prove that he was interviewed in November, 1927, by a man representing himself as Gillette, regarding stock held by the witness in the Great Republic Life Insurance Company. The defense immediately interposed numerous objections, and Mr. Elburg was not allowed to do much more than to give his name and address. The defendant now claims that the prosecution erred. The contention is without foundation. The error was on the part of the defense. A general treatment of the law on the subject is contained in 12 C. J. at page 633. Among other things, it is there said: "The fact of a conspiracy may be proved by any competent evidence. The conspiracy may of course be shown by direct evidence, and, it is apprehended should be so proved if this character of evidence is attainable. Direct evidence is, however, not indispensable. Circumstantial evidence is competent to prove conspiracy. Proof of the combination charged, it has been said, must almost always be extracted from the circumstances connected with the transaction which forms the subject of the accusation. * * * The government has the right to show the whole history of the conspiracy from its commencement to its conclusion. And it is no objection that the evidence covers a great many transactions and extends over a long period of time, that it may show another crime. * * * Where the guilt of a party depends on the intent, purpose, or design with which an act is done, or on his guilty knowledge thereof, collateral facts in which he bore a principal part may be examined into for the purpose of establishing such guilty intent, design, purpose, or knowledge. It is sufficient that such collateral facts have some connection with each other as a part of the same plan or as induced by the same motive, and it is immaterial that they show the commission of other crimes. * * *" See, also, People v. Lawrence, 143 Cal. 148, 76 P. 893, 68 L. R. A. 193; People v. Moran, 144 Cal. 48, 77 P. 777; People v. Kizer, 22 Cal. App. 10, 133 P. 516, 521, 134 P. 346. The witness Bernice Gann testified regarding the call at the Wilbur place. Acting upon the motion of the defense, the court struck her testimony out. Later the court reversed its ruling. The defendant complains of the ruling reinstating the evidence. The ruling was clearly correct, and the defendant was laboring under error when he made the motion to strike out.

[5] Finally, the defendant complains regarding the instructions given by the trial court. The court gave an instruction on the subject of circumstantial evidence. It is contended the instruction was erroneous. The contention rests on the assumption that after each phrase the trial court should have inserted "if any," and, in failing to do so, that the trial court assumed that every fact mentioned by the trial court had been proved. The trial court was not bound to continually insert "if any." On the other hand, the duty of the trial court was to instruct clearly. It did so, and committed no error. In this same connection the defendant claims that "no statements of the defendant were in any way given in evidence in this case." Of course, that is not true. Statements made by this defendant were testified to by Verdieck, Stockird, Hopkins, and Du Bois.

[6-8] The defendant calls to our attention that he requested the trial court to give some instructions which the trial court did not give, and assigns the omission as error. In this we think the defendant is mistaken. The first proposed instruction was ambiguous, unintelligible, and assumed that the sole act of the defendant was the act of selling the certificate of stock. Furthermore, it was a request that the court instruct on one specific piece of evidence. The second proposed instruction was addressed to a set of facts which ignored the greater part of the case presented by the prosecution. The third and fourth proposed instructions, in so far as they are sound, were fully covered by instructions which were given. The fifth proposed instruction misquoted the record, and was an incorrect statement of the law as stated in the authorities above cited. All of these requests were, for the reasons mentioned, properly refused.

Both the orders and judgment are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BECK. (Crim. No. 1063.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 4, 1928.

Criminal law 🔑796, 1172(9)—Instruction in rape trial that punishment is exclusively for court held prejudicial error, requiring reversal (Pen. Code, §§ 261, 264).

In trial for rape, under Pen. Code, § 261, court's failure to instruct jury to recommend whether punishment should be by imprisonment in county jail or state prison, as provided by section 264, and instruction that question of punishment is one exclusively for court, which jury has no right to consider, was prejudicial error, requiring reversal of conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Thomas H. Selvage, Judge.

John H. Beck was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Blaine McGowan, of Eureka, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was charged, under subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code, with the crime of rape. He was found "guilty as charged in the information" and was thereupon sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison. He has appealed from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The court failed to instruct the jury to "recommend by their verdict whether the punishment shall be by imprisonment in the county jail or in the state prison," as provided by section 264 of the Penal Code, but instructed the jury that "the question of punishment is one exclusively for the court and with which a jury has no concern and which a jury has no right to consider." This was prejudicial error requiring a reversal. People v. Currie (Cal. App.) 269 P. 770; People v. Sachau, 78 Cal. App. 702, 248 P. 960; People v. Rambaud, 78 Cal. App. 685, 248 P. 954.

The judgment and the order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

TOON v. PICKWICK STAGES, NORTHERN DIVISION. (Civ. 6335.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 10, 1928.

1. Trial 🔑133(6)—In automobile collision case plaintiff's counsel's statement that photographs were unfair, in requesting that jury view place of accident, held not prejudicial, considering court's instruction to disregard.

In action for damages sustained in automobile collision, plaintiff's counsel's statement that photographs were unfair, in making request that jury be taken to place of accident, held not prejudicial, where court promptly reproved counsel and admonished the jury that they were not to regard or be influenced by statement, and jury viewed place of accident.

2. Trial 🔑234(3)—In automobile collision case, where defendant's witness' testimony showed defendant was negligent, instruction to find for plaintiff if he was not negligent held proper.

In automobile collision case, where negligence on part of defendant was inevitable inference to be drawn from testimony of its own witnesses, if believed, court properly instructed jury that if they believed plaintiff not guilty of contributory negligence they must find in his favor.

3. Trial 🔑339(3)—Where jury returned verdict for plaintiff for $5,000 and medical expenses and other items, court properly sent out jury to find damages specifically (Code Civ. Proc. § 619).

Where jury, after retiring for consideration, returned to court with verdict for plaintiff for $5,000 and medical expenses, court costs, and counsel fees, which fees could not be allowed, court properly sent out jury with instructions to find plaintiff's damages specifically under Code Civ. Proc. § 619.

4. Trial 🔑339(3)—Where jury was sent out to find damages specifically under statute, they could reconsider issues; "or again sent out" (Code Civ. Proc. § 619).

Where jury returned verdict for plaintiff for $5,000 and medical expenses, court costs and counsel fees, which fees could not be allowed, and court sent out jury with instructions to find plaintiff's damages specifically under Code Civ. Proc. § 619, jury could reconsider issues, since "or again sent out" in statute can only be that jury may reconsider issues.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action for damages for personal injuries by Louis R. Toon against Pickwick Stages, Northern Division. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William G. Griffith, of Santa Barbara, and B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Mygatt, Robertson & Crawford, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

STROTHER, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for personal injuries suffered in the collision of a light laundry truck, driven by him, with a stage of defendant.

The defense was a denial of negligence on the part of defendant and contributory negligence of plaintiff. The case was tried by a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

The accident occurred in March, 1921, at the intersection of Cacique and Voluntario streets in the city of Santa Barbara. At the northwesterly corner of the intersection was a store or filling station, which obstructed the view between the northerly part of Cacique street and the westerly part of Voluntario street.

Plaintiff was driving easterly on Voluntario street, and defendant's stage was going southerly on Cacique street, thereby entering the intersection to the left of plaintiff. Plaintiff's testimony was that he entered the intersection at the rate of from 8 to 12 miles an hour; that though he looked to the right and left, he never saw the stage, even at the moment of impact; and that he was rendered unconscious by the shock. Sanchez, a witness for plaintiff, testified that plaintiff was traveling at the rate of 10 miles an hour just before he entered the intersection.

Ott, who was driving the stage, was a witness on behalf of defendant. He testified that he was traveling at the rate of between 20 and 25 miles an hour when he arrived at a point 3 or 4 feet from the intersection line; that the plaintiff was then about the same distance from the intersection and was going from 3 to 6 miles an hour faster than the witness, and went straight ahead at the same speed. The witness said that he put on his brakes as he crossed the property line and was going between 10 and 15 miles an hour at the time of collision.

The testimony of Brooks, a passenger on the stage, also a witness for the defendant, was practically to the same effect as that of Ott, except that on direct examination he testified that the stage was going 15 to 20 miles an hour at the moment of collision, and on cross-examination that it was going 5 or 6 miles an hour.

Each car entered the intersection on its own right side of the street. The collision occurred after each vehicle had passed the center line of the street across which it was traveling; hence after the stage had passed from the right to the left side of its road. The laundry wagon was carried diagonally across the street, a distance of 48 feet, into the corner of a lot, and completely demolished.

The court correctly instructed the jury as to the rules regarding negligence, proximate cause, and contributory negligence, as applicable to the facts of the case. A number of assignments of error are made by appellant, but only three appear to be of sufficient importance to justify consideration.

[1] In the course of the trial defendant offered in evidence several photographs of the scene of the accident, and more particularly that part of Cacique street traversed by the stage in its approach to the intersection. These were admitted over the objection of plaintiff that they did not truthfully portray the scene. At the request of both parties the jury was taken to the place of the accident. Plaintiff's counsel in making the request stated that his reason for wanting the jury to see the place was that the photographs were unfair. This statement was objected to by defendant's counsel, and the court reproved plaintiff's counsel and admonished the jury that they were not to regard or be influenced by the statement. Thereupon the incident was assigned by defendant as prejudicial conduct on the part of plaintiff. Considering the prompt action of the court and the fact that the jury were put into a position to determine from their own observation the conditions at the place of the collision, it does not appear that defendant could have been prejudiced.

[2] The court instructed the jury that if they believed that the defendant's stage entered the intersection at a greater rate of speed than was lawful, and further believed that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, they should find for plaintiff. The giving of this instruction is assigned as error, as ignoring the question of proximate cause and being in effect a direction to the jury to find for plaintiff. The jury had been told by the court that any negligence on the part of the plaintiff, concurring or co-operating with negligence of the defendant to proximately cause the injury, was contributory negligence, which would prevent the plaintiff from recovering. From the evidence the jury could come to no other conclusion than that the collision was caused by the negligence of one or the other or of both the parties. Negligence on the part of the defendant was an inevitable inference to be drawn from the testimony of its own witnesses, if believed. The court correctly instructed the jury that if they believed that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence they must find in his favor.

[3, 4] At the conclusion of the trial, the jury, after retiring for consideration, returned to court with the following verdict: "We the jury in the above-entitled action find for the plaintiff, and assess his damages in the sum of $5000.00 and medical expenses, court costs and counsel fees." The court advised the jury that counsel fees could not be allowed in the action, and instructed them to retire "and fix specifically your verdict on the amounts you have found." After some discussion between court and counsel, the court instructed the jury that: "The verdict should state specifically what your verdict is as to the amount of damages." The jury then retired and brought in the following verdict: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff and assess his damages in the sum of $7500.00."

Defendant objected to the entry of the verdict on the ground that it was not their verdict, as they had already assessed the damages at $5,000, and the additional assessment of $2,500 was illegal and void; that the verdict was contrary to the court's instructions; that the verdict had been changed after its rendition and was not the true verdict. The court overruled the objection, and the verdict was entered. This action of the court is urged as error.

Section 619 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that: "When the verdict is announced, if it is informal or insufficient, in not covering the issue submitted, it may be corrected by the jury under the advice of the court, or the jury may be again sent out."

The court properly sent the jury out with instructions to find plaintiff's damages specifically. The whole issue was at large when they retired. They had evidently not passed upon all the issues presented to them, and had found upon one matter which was not in issue. The statute provides that in such case one of two things shall be done, evidently according to the circumstances, either the jury shall correct the verdict under the advice of the court, "or again be sent out." The latter can only mean that they may reconsider the issues. If they had returned a verdict reducing their finding of damages, or finding for the defendant, it was equally within their power.

The judgment is affirmed.

ATWELL v. MERCANTILE TRUST CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 6472.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 7, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 5, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 4, 1929.

1. Banks and banking 🔑154(2)—One-year limitation applies to action for payment of forged check, though complaint is in form of one for deposits (Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3, § 348).

If gravamen of depositor's action against bank is payment of forged or raised check, one-year limitation prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3, applies, though complaint is in form of one for deposits, time for which is not ordinarily limited under section 348.

2. Banks and banking 🔑154(2)—Limitation on action for payment of forged check does not apply to action for payments on forged indorsements (Civ. Code, § 3265 (a), 3112; Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3; Pen. Code, §§ 470, 476).

A check, which is defined as bill of exchange payable on demand by Civ. Code, § 3265 (a), being complete without indorsement, required to be written on instrument or attached paper by section 3112, Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3, placing one-year limitation on action against bank for payment of forged or raised check, does not apply to action to recover money paid on checks, indorsements of which were forged in violation of Pen. Code, §§ 470, 476.

3. Banks and banking 🔑148(2)—Depositor may assume that bank paid check on genuine indorsement, in absence of actual knowledge of forgery.

No duty is imposed on depositor to discover forged indorsements of his checks, but, in absence of actual knowledge that indorsement has been forged, he is entitled to assume that bank paid check only on genuine indorsement.

4. Constitutional law 🔑70(3)—Appropriateness of requiring depositor to detect forged indorsements or extending one-year limitation to actions for payments on forged indorsements is for Legislature (Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3).

Appropriateness of imposing duty on depositor to detect forged indorsements of his checks or extending one-year limitation of Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3, to include actions for payments by bank on forged indorsements, as well as of forged or raised checks, is a matter of legislative, not judicial, concern.

5. Banks and banking 🔑148(4)—Depositor, not discovering forgery of indorsements until nearly year after issuing checks, nor making formal demand and suing for amounts paid until several months after discovery, held not guilty of laches.

Depositor held not chargeable with laches in not discovering that indorsements of her checks for stock in corporation were forged until nearly a year after issuing checks, when advised at stockholders' annual meeting that she was not a stockholder, nor in not making formal demand and commencing action against bank for money paid on such indorsements for five or six months after discovering forgery, where she notified bank without delay.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by Lois A. Atwell against the Mercantile Trust Company of California. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Keyes & Erskine, Hartley F. Peart, and Charles V. Barfield, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Thornton Wilson, of Oakland, for respondent.

SPENCE, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff and respondent, a depositor in the defendant and appellant bank, brought this action by filing a "Complaint for Deposits." Respondent alleged a balance due and unpaid of $1,050, which appellant refused to pay upon demand.

Appellant denied that any balance was due or unpaid, and alleged the disbursement of the entire deposits upon order of the respondent. Appellant further alleged that the action was barred by subdivision 3 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure and that respondent was barred by laches.

Upon the trial, no question was raised by respondent concerning the payments made from her account except as to two checks totaling $1,050. These checks were both made payable to the Oakland Hospital Corporation; the first, in the sum of $500, being dated February 17, 1925, and the second, in the sum of $550, being dated February 18,

1925. Both of these checks were issued by respondent, and were thereafter paid by appellant bank upon forged indorsements. This action was commenced on August 13, 1926. The only defenses urged by appellant upon the trial were the defenses of the statute of limitations and laches. The trial court found against appellant on both defenses, and judgment was entered in favor of respondent for the sum of $1,050 and interest. Appellant appeals from this judgment and raises the same questions upon this appeal.

[1] Ordinarily there is no limitation upon the time within which a depositor may bring an action to recover money deposited with a bank. Section 348, Code of Civil Procedure. The Legislature, however, by amending subdivision 3 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure, placed a limitation of one year upon actions by "a depositor against a bank for the payment of a forged or raised check." This latter section covers a special class of cases and is an exception to the general rule. If, then, the gravamen of an action is the payment of a "forged or raised" check within the meaning of the latter section, such section and the limitation therein prescribed would apply despite the fact that a plaintiff draws the complaint in the form of a "complaint for deposits." Union Tool Co. v. Farmers', etc., National Bank, 192 Cal. 40, 218 P. 424, 28 A. L. R. 1417. The controlling question to be decided on the issue of the statute of limitations is whether the payment of a check upon a "forged endorsement" constitutes payment of a "forged check" within the meaning of subdivision 3, § 340, Code of Civil Procedure.

This question has been passed upon in other jurisdictions under statutes using the words "forged or raised check." Section 326 of the Negotiable Instruments Law of New York provided: "No bank shall be liable to a depositor for the payment by it of a forged or raised check, unless within one year after the return to the depositor of the voucher of such payment, such depositor shall notify the bank that the check so paid was forged or raised." Consol. Laws, c. 38. This section has been held to have no application to checks bearing forged indorsements. Kleinman v. Chase Nat. Bank, 124 Misc. Rep. 173, 207 N. Y. S. 191. The court there said (124 Misc. Rep. 174), on page 193: "The commonly accepted meaning of the words 'a forged check' in the commercial world is a check upon which the maker's name is forged. It is manifest by a consideration of the reason for the enactment of section 326 of the Negotiable Instruments Law, as well as the commonly accepted meaning of the words 'forged check,' that the Legislature intended to limit the requirement to give notice to cases where payment is made on a check upon which the maker's signature is forged, and did not intend to extend the statute to include forged endorsements."

In Iowa a similar section (section 9266, Code of 1924) provided that "no bank shall be liable to a depositor for the payment by it of a forged or raised check unless within six months after the return to the depositor of the voucher of such payment, such depositor shall notify the bank that the check so paid is forged or raised." This section was likewise held inapplicable to forged indorsements. McCornack v. Central State Bank, 203 Iowa, 833, 211 N. W. 542, 52 A. L. R. 1297.

Counsel for appellant argues that the foregoing cases interpret sections dealing with rules of substantive law and not statutes limiting the time for the commencement of actions. This may be conceded. The New York and Iowa statutes affect the right rather than the remedy. However, no good reason appears for giving the phrase "forged or raised check" a broader interpretation when found in a statute of limitations than the interpretation to be given to that phrase when embodied in a rule of substantive law.

[2] The execution of a check and the execution of an indorsement are distinct. The first is the act of the maker and the second is the act of the payee. A check is complete as a check without an indorsement. A check is defined as a "bill of exchange * * * payable on demand." Section 3265 (a), Civil Code. An indorsement "must be written on the instrument itself or upon a paper attached thereto." Section 3112, Civil Code. The history of the development of the law relating to the duties and obligations between banks and depositors, briefly referred to in the above decisions, leads to the conclusion that the words "forged or raised" check, as used in these statutes and in our own statute, do not refer to a "forged indorsement." In earlier years great uncertainty existed as to whether any duty or obligation whatever fell upon the depositor to examine his vouchers and notify the bank that a check had been forged or raised. As the depositor could easily detect or discover that his signature had been forged or that the check had been raised, the reasonableness of a rule imposing some such duty became apparent. A flexible rule was adopted in most jurisdictions requiring a reasonably careful examination by the depositor, and further requiring the depositor to notify the bank within a reasonable time. This rule did not fix a definite time for the termination of liability of the bank nor for the commencement of an action by a depositor upon a forged or raised check. Statutory enactments then appeared to definitely fix such time. Some statutes, such as those in New York and Iowa, dealt with the substantive rights, and terminated the liability unless notice was given to the bank within a specified time. Others, such as the California statute, did not deal with the substantive rights, but merely affected the remedy by limiting the time within which actions might be commenced. Both types of statutory enactments sought to fix a definite time, after which no claim could be asserted, based upon the alleged forging or raising of the check, which it was the duty of the depositor to detect.

[3] That no duty is or was imposed upon the depositor to discover forged indorsements is clear from the reasoning and authorities cited in the foregoing decisions. In the absence of actual knowledge of the fact that an indorsement has been forged, the depositor is entitled to assume that the bank has paid the check only upon a genuine indorsement. Our own Supreme Court has said on this subject:

"But a depositor is not bound to examine the endorsements on returned checks. He is bound within a reasonable time to ascertain the genuineness of the checks themselves (Janin v. London, etc., Bank, 92 Cal. 14, 27 P. 1100, 14 L. R. A. 320, 27 Am. St. Rep. 82), but as to endorsements, the rule and its reasons are correctly stated in Shipman v. Bank [126 N. Y. 318, 27 N. E. 371, 12 L. R. A. 791, 22 Am. St. Rep. 821], supra.

" 'The defendant's contract was to pay the checks only upon a genuine endorsement. The drawer is not presumed to know, and in fact seldom does know, the signature of the payee. The bank must, at its own peril, determine that question. It has the opportunity, by requiring identification when the check is presented, or a responsible guaranty from the party presenting it, of ascertaining whether the endorsement is genuine or not. When it returns the check to the depositor, as evidence of a payment made by his direction, the latter has the right to assume that the bank has ascertained the fact to be that the endorsement is genuine' [citing cases]." Los Angeles Inv. Co. v. Home Sav. Bank of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 601, 611, 182 P. 293, 297 (5 A. L. R. 1193).

In interpreting the Iowa statute above set forth, the court said: "Prior to the enactment of the statute, we had held, in German Savings Bank v. Bank [101 Iowa, 530, 70 N. W. 769, 63 Am. St. Rep. 399], supra, that a depositor was under no duty to the bank as to the genuineness of an endorsement. We said: 'The check was returned with an apparent genuine endorsement of Quinlan. The fact that intervenor had paid the money thereon, and presumably had satisfied itself that the endorsement of Quinlan was genuine, as it was in duty bound to do, was a further reason why plaintiff should not, in the absence of knowledge to the contrary, have concerned itself as to the genuineness of the endorsement of Quinlan's name thereon. Furthermore, the plaintiff owed no duty to the defendant, or to the intervenor, as to the genuineness of the endorsement of Quinlan' [citing cases]. The statute does not, we think, change this rule in respect to the genuineness of the signature of endorsers." McCornack v. Central State Bank, 203 Iowa, 833, 846, 211 N. W. 542, 548, 52 A. L. R. 1297.

With reference to the New York statute quoted above, the court said: "If the legislature intended to modify this common-law maxim to the extent of imposing upon the depositor the onerous and unreasonable duty to detect within a year forged endorsements, it would have stated it explicitly. Such intended modification cannot be found in the express words of the statute, nor can it be fairly implied from the text. (North British & Mercantile Ins. Co. v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 161 App. Div. 341, 146 N. Y. S. 720.) We are thus in accord with the view of the court below that section 326 had no application to payments made by a bank upon a forged endorsement, and the judgment against the defendant Chase National Bank is affirmed." Kleinman v. Chase Nat. Bank, 124 Misc. Rep. 173, 175, 207 N. Y. S. 191, 194.

[4] The enactment of the amendment of subdivision 3 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure did not purport to change the substantive law relating to the duties and obligations of banks and depositors. It merely fixed a definite time within which the depositor could bring an action in those cases where the substantive law already imposed upon him the duty to discover that the check was forged or raised. If it be deemed appropriate to impose new duties upon the depositor with respect to detecting forged indorsements, or to extend the limitation of subdivision 3 of section 340 to include actions for payment by banks upon forged indorsements, that is a matter of legislative concern.

Counsel for appellant urges that the unauthorized indorsement and cashing of the checks in this case constituted forgery under the provisions of sections 470 and 476 of the Penal Code. That the indorsements were forged is conceded by respondent, and the trial court made findings to that effect. The question, however, is not whether forgery was committed in the indorsing and cashing of the check, but rather whether this is a case of a "forged or raised" check within the meaning of subdivision 3 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Counsel further urges that the case of Union Tool Co. v. Farmers', etc., Nat. Bank, 192 Cal. 40, 218 N. W. 424, 28 A. L. R. 1417, conclusively determines the question here involved. That case is clearly distinguishable. There was an alteration of the payee's name on the face of the checks as well as forged indorsements. The alteration of the payee's name on the face of the checks constituted forgery under section 470 of the Penal Code, and that case, therefore, involved forged checks as well as forged indorsements. The duty was upon the depositor to discover such alterations on the face of the checks. Any reference in the decision to the forged indorsements was incidental and not necessary to the decision. That case was considered and the distinction clearly brought out in the case of McCornack v. Central State Bank, 203 Iowa, 833, 846, 211 N. W. 542, on page 548 (52 A. L. R. 1297), where the court said: "The endorsement is no part of the check as made by the drawer, although it is, of course, contemplated that the payee must endorse it. But, since the maker is not required to know the signature of the payee, and has a right to issue the check payable to the order of one unknown to him, relying on the bank to pay only in accordance with his direction, a forged endorsement does not make the check a 'forged check' within the meaning of the statute. In Union Tool Co. v. Bank, supra, cited by appellant, there was, in addition to a forged endorsement, an alteration on the face of the check. We are of the opinion the action is not barred by the statute in question."

[5] In addition to the defense of the statute of limitations, it is further urged that respondent's claim is barred by laches. Appellant alleged in its answer "that plaintiff unduly delayed presenting and prosecuting the claim asserted herein, and by reason of such laches is barred from recovery in this action."

Respondent issued the two checks in February, 1925. They were intended to apply as payment for stock in the Oakland Hospital Corporation. It appeared from respondent's testimony that she decided to purchase the stock more as a matter of community service than as an investment. Her vouchers, including these checks, were returned in March, 1925. She did not receive any stock certificate and gave no attention to the matter until about the time of the stockholders' meeting in the latter part of January, 1926. She was then advised that she was not a stockholder, and that the corporation had no record of any purchase of stock by her. The checks had been cashed by a man named Wise, being indorsed "Oakland Hospital Corporation, J. M. Wise." Wise had no authority to cash the checks, and had forged the indorsements and apparently kept the proceeds. The card of authorized signatures filed at the bank by the corporation did not show the signature or name of Wise. Respondent notified the bank of the unauthorized indorsements in the latter part of January or first part of February, 1926. The checks had originally been cashed by the Oakland Bank and forwarded to the appellant bank. In subsequent conversations with an officer of the appellant bank, the question of whether respondent should look to the Oakland Bank or appellant bank was discussed. Respondent made formal demand upon appellant by check for $1,050 payable to cash, dated July 28, 1926, which check was not honored, but returned with the notation "Not sufficient funds." The complaint was filed August 13, 1926.

In support of appellant's claim of laches, the case of California Vegetable Union v. Crocker National Bank, 37 Cal. App. 743, 174 P. 920, is cited. That case did not involve forged indorsements and is not in point. It involved forged checks where the maker's name was forged by an employee upon over one hundred checks at various times covering a period of many months. The defense of laches might well be urged in that case, in view of the duty imposed upon the depositor in relation to checks upon which his name is forged. The absolute failure of the depositor in that case to make any examination of its statements and vouchers to detect the forgery of its name was the basis of the decision. In the present case there was no duty upon respondent to detect the forged indorsement, as shown by the authorities cited. Consequently she cannot be charged with laches before she discovered that the indorsements were forged in the latter part of January, 1926. Upon discovery of the forgery, she did notify the bank without delay. Although formal demand and the commencement of the action did not follow for five or six months, we believe under the circumstances that the trial court properly found that respondent had not unduly delayed presenting and prosecuting her claim.

Under the facts as shown by the uncontradicted testimony, we are of the opinion that the findings and conclusions of the trial court, to the effect that the action was not barred by the statute of limitations and that respondent was not guilty of laches, were correct.

SCHMIDT v. CAIN. (Civ. 3503.)

District Court of Appeal. Third District, California. Dec. 10, 1928.

1. Evidence 🔑441(9)—Parol testimony as to warranty held not inadmissible as varying written contract, where writing specifically referred to prior verbal understanding.

In action for goods sold and delivered, oral testimony relative to verbal understanding as to warranty held admissible as against contention that it varied written contract, where writing relied on as containing all terms of agreement specifically referred to prior verbal understanding.

2. Evidence 🔑441(9)—Parol evidence cannot add warranty provisions to sale contract complete on face, but is competent to show contemporaneous agreement not varying written instrument.

Where contract for sale of goods is reduced to writing, and on its face purports to be complete expression of whole contract, and contains no warranty, no such provisions can be added by parol evidence, but parol evidence of contemporaneous oral agreement is competent, if it does not vary or conflict with specific provisions of written contract.

3. Evidence 🔑457—Testimony explaining expression "terms as usual—unless otherwise specified," as used in sales contract, held admissible.

In action for goods sold and delivered, admission of parol evidence as to meaning of expression "terms as usual—unless otherwise specified," used in letter claimed to constitute contract between parties, held not error.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Trial court's findings on conflicting evidence are conclusive, and reasonable inferences are indulged in support thereof.

Findings of trial court on conflicting evidence are conclusive, and all reasonable inferences are to be indulged in support thereof.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Reviewing court cannot interfere with trial court's findings, if supported by substantial evidence.

Where findings of trial court are supported by substantial evidence, reviewing court cannot interfere, even though it might be of opinion that greater weight of evidence supports contrary conclusion.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)—Failure to find on material issues is not reversible error, where findings, if made, would undoubtedly have been adverse to appellant.

Failure to find specifically on certain material issues raised by pleadings is not ground for reversal, where such findings, if made, would undoubtedly have been adverse to appellant, under uncontradicted evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by G. F. Schmidt against W. H. Cain, doing business under the name of the W. H. Cain Gas Radiator Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ward Chapman and L. M. Chapman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Spencer & Dennis, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff, G. F. Schmidt, brought this action to recover from defendant, W. H. Cain, the sum of $4,892.40, the purchase price of an article known as "No. 10 Glazed Back Walls," used in the manufacture of gas heaters, alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendant.

The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendant. From this judgment plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The amended complaint is in three counts. The first count alleges the making of a contract on May 11, 1922; the delivery of the "glazed back walls" by plaintiff to defendant and the acceptance thereof; the demand for payment; and the refusal of the defendant to pay. The second cause of action is based upon a common count for goods sold and delivered. The third cause of action is based upon an account stated.

The answer denies that a written contract was made; denies that the defendant accepted any of said back walls; but admits that 456 back walls were delivered by plaintiff to defendant between the 20th day of October, 1922, and the 1st day of January, 1923. The answer likewise denies the allegations of the second and third causes of action, and then alleges, as a separate defense, that the plaintiff and defendant, on or about the 11th day of May, 1922, entered into a contract, whereby the plaintiff agreed to manufacture for defendant back walls for use by defendant as component parts of the gas heaters manufactured by defendant; that at the time said agreement was made, plaintiff expressly guaranteed that said back walls would not, when used for the purpose for which they were manufactured, break or crack, and would be satisfactory in every way; that the back walls delivered under said agreement failed to perform the functions or serve the purpose for which they were manufactured; and that, when tested by defendant, broke and cracked; that thereafter defendant informed plaintiff that the back walls so manufactured did not perform the purposes for which they were manufactured and were unfit for use; and that defendant offered to return all of said back walls to plaintiff, and that plaintiff refused to accept the same. Said answer further contained an offer to return the same to plaintiff.

Under the issues thus joined, and the evidence offered by both sides, the court found the facts to be substantially as alleged by defendant, and rendered judgment accordingly.

[1] Appellant first contends that the court erred in admitting oral testimony as to the alleged warranty made by him.

Appellant offered in evidence the following letter, which he claims constitutes the written contract between the parties:

"Los Angeles, Calif., May 11, 1922.

"W. H. Cain Gas Radiator Company, 5217 Moneta Ave., Los Angeles, Calif.—Gentlemen: In accordance with my verbal understanding I had with you at your office on May 11th, I have entered your order for 500—No. 10 glazed back walls as per model left with you to be made in two colors from our brown and mottled green at a price of $10.00 apiece, f.o.b. my factory, Chicago, Ill. Crating to be done in most practical way and to be charged extra for same.

"Further 6,000 No. 3 radiants at 15c apiece to be packed in boxes of eleven (11).

"It is understood and agreed that as long as you buy from me annually at least 500 of said backs and 6,000 radiants, you will have the sole backs and bases now w—ed below right for selling these goods in the State of California. I have further used in connection with said backwall to be forwarded to you as quickly as possible for my pattern maker in Chicago—at a price of $275.00.

"Shipments of the back walls to be made within the next 90 days—the radiants to come forward with the pending shipment.

"Terms as usual—unless otherwise specified.

"Please return the enclosed copy with your signature for my records.

"Yours truly, G. F. Schmidt.

"Accepted:

"W. H. Cain Gas Radiator Co.
"W. H. Cain
"May 16/22."

Respondent was permitted, by way of defense, to introduce parol testimony of the terms and conditions of a "verbal understanding" between appellant and himself. This testimony was to the effect that appellant had guaranteed that the back walls to be manufactured and delivered would not crack or break, would in all respects be fit for the purposes for which they were manufactured, and would be satisfactory to defendant in all particulars, etc.; or, in other words, appellant warranted the back walls against cracking or breaking. Testimony was also introduced to the effect that said back walls did crack and break, and were unfit for the purposes for which they were manufactured.

We think that all this testimony was properly admitted.

In the writing itself, which appellant relies upon as containing all the terms of the agreement between the parties, their prior "verbal understanding" is specifically referred to. This language certainly indicates that there was another or additional understanding or agreement than that expressed in the writing between the parties, and the court had a right to know what that understanding or agreement was.

Appellant strenuously insists that the written instrument is a complete expression of the whole agreement, and that it contains no warranty that the back walls would not crack or break, and therefore no such warranty could be established by parol evidence.

[2] The law is, of course, well established that, where a contract of the character here involved is reduced to writing, and upon its face purports to be a complete expression of the whole contract between the parties, and contains no warranty, no such provisions may be added by parol evidence. Hogan v. Anthony, 52 Cal. App. 168, 198 P. 47; Remsberg v. Hackney Mfg. Co., 174 Cal. 799, 164 P. 792; American Steel Pipe Co. v. Hubbard, 42 Cal. App. 520, 183 P. 830; United Iron Works v. Outer H., etc., Co., 168 Cal. 81, 141 P. 917.

The law, however, is equally well settled that parol evidence of the terms and conditions of a contemporaneous oral agreement is competent and admissible, which does not vary or conflict with the specific provisions of the written instrument. Torrey v. Shea, 29 Cal. App. 313, 155 P. 820; Peterson v. Wagner, 52 Cal. App. 1, 198 P. 25; Greathouse v. Daleno, 57 Cal. App. 187, 206 P. 1019; Wolters v. King, 119 Cal. 172, 51 P. 35; Whittier v. Home Savings Bank, 161 Cal. 311, 119 P. 92; Jones on Evidence (3d Ed.) 668, §§ 439-440; Kellogg v. Snell (Cal. App.) 270 P. 232.

The testimony in question is not in conflict with any of the provisions of the writing. The writing is entirely silent on the question of a warranty, but refers to a "verbal understanding," as a contemporaneous agreement upon which they rely. Therefore the rule contended for by appellant has no application here, because there was a collateral contemporaneous oral agreement containing terms and conditions, upon which the written instrument is entirely silent.

[3] Appellant also contends that the court erred in admitting parol evidence as to the meaning of the expression "Terms as usual—unless otherwise specified." There is no merit in this contention. No one could tell by reading the contract what the parties intended by this language. In such cases parol evidence is admissible for the purpose of ascertaining the real intention of the parties. United Iron Works v. Outer H., etc., Co., supra.

[4, 5] Appellant next contends that the conduct of the respondent after delivery of the goods was such as to constitute an acceptance and a waiver by him of any defense as to the quality thereof. There is sufficient evidence in the record to sustain this contention, but the court made a finding contrary thereto. The court undoubtedly accepted the testimony of respondent as being a correct statement of the entire transaction, and his testimony amply supports the court's finding on this point. The findings of the trial court upon conflicting evidence are conclusive, and all reasonable inferences are to be indulged in support thereof. Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 228 P. 25; Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 1, 239 P. 332.

Appellant further contends that certain other findings are not supported by the evidence. We have examined the entire record, including all the evidence, with care, and we are of the opinion that all the findings are supported by substantial evidence. This being true, we cannot interfere with the conclusions reached by the trial court, even though we might be of the opinion that the greater weight of the evidence supports a contrary conclusion.

[6] Lastly, appellant contends that the trial court failed to find upon two material issues raised by the pleadings.

There does not appear to be any specific finding that respondent rejected the back walls, or that he offered to return them to appellant. However, we are at a loss to see how the court's failure to make these two specific findings can avail appellant anything, for the evidence is uncontradicted that respondent offered to return the back walls to appellant, and that appellant stated that he would not accept them, if returned. Therefore, if specific findings had been made, the same would undoubtedly have been adverse to appellant. Under such circumstances, failure to find specifically upon these two issues is not ground for reversal. Koblick v. Larson, 57 Cal. App. 462, 207 P. 929.

The judgment is affirmed.

ROYAL REALTY CO. et al. v. HARVEY INV. CO. et al. (Civ. 3643.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 7, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 4, 1929.

1. Appeal and error 🔑931(8)—Appellate court will construe findings so as to uphold, rather than defeat, judgment.

Appellate court must, in reviewing findings, give them a liberal construction so as to uphold, rather than defeat, the judgment.

2. Appeal and error 🔑931(8)—Findings, when reviewed, must be reconciled to prevent conflict on material points, if possible.

In reviewing findings, all the findings are to be read together, and must be reconciled to prevent any conflict upon material points, if such reconciliation is possible.

3. Appeal and error 🔑197(4)—Objection to testimony as not within the issues cannot be raised for first time on appeal, where case was tried on theory that testimony was within issues.

Where it appeared, in an action for specific performance of contract for exchange of real property, that case was tried on theory that any representations as to income of property exchanged were within the issues, irrespective of the amount of such income, objection to testimony as to income based on ground that it was not within the issues cannot be raised for first time on appeal.

4. Appeal and error 🔑931(1)—In absence of direct attack, appellate court assumes that finding is based on sufficient evidence.

In absence of direct attack on a finding, appellate court must and will assume that it was based on sufficient evidence.

5. Specific performance 🔑121(8)—Finding, in action for specific performance of representation as to income of property, held sufficiently supported by evidence.

In action for specific performance of a contract for exchange of real property, finding that it was represented to the defendant that the net income of property sought to be exchanged by plaintiff was $8,000 a year, whereas the property had been operated at a loss, held sufficiently supported by evidence.

6. Exchange of property 🔑3(1)—Representations as to net income, not true in fact, related to existing material facts, having reasonable tendency to induce parties to contract to exchange of property to rely on them as representations of such facts.

Representations that property sought to be exchanged had produced a net income of $8,000 a year, whereas the property was operated at a loss, related to existing facts material to the transaction, and which had a reasonable tendency to induce other parties to the contract to consider the same and rely on them as representations of such facts.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1009(1)—Whether defendant relied on representations as to income of property sought to be exchanged held for trial court.

In suit for specific performance of contract for exchange of real property, where issue was whether plaintiff's assignor had misrepresented income from property sought to be exchanged, whether or not defendant relied on representations of income as made held question for trial court.

8. Specific performance 🔑121(8)—Finding on question of acreage of ranch property, planted to almonds, held supported by evidence, in action for specific performance.

In action for specific performance of contract for exchange of real property, where issue was whether plaintiffs had misrepresented income from property sought to be exchanged, finding as to acreage of ranch property sought to be exchanged, planted to almonds, held supported by evidence.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

9. Appeal and error ⚷882(3)—Case having been tried below on theory that testimony was within issues, litigants cannot urge to the contrary for first time on appeal.

Where an examination of the record discloses that the parties introduced evidence on certain issues, and by their conduct plainly indicated that they considered the facts testified to as being legitimately within issues to be tried and found by the lower court, they will not be permitted to urge for the first time on appeal that such facts were admitted by the pleadings, and hence were not within the issues, and that no finding could be based on such testimony.

10. Trial ⚷397(5)—Findings of trial court necessarily defeating right of recovery, other findings were unnecessary.

Where trial court found for defendants on issues of misrepresentations made in entering into contract for exchange of real property, such findings necessarily defeated the right of recovery, and it was unnecessary that the findings dispose of any further issues, as all other issues thereby became immaterial.

11. Specific performance ⚷53—Fraudulent representations inducing person to enter into contract are defense in suit for specific performance.

Fraudulent representations by which person may be induced to enter into a contract constitute a defense, in an action for specific performance of the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by the Royal Realty Company and another against the Harvey Investment Company and others. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

McAdoo, Neblett & O'Connor, Haas & Dunnigan, and William H. Neblett, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Hickcox & Thomson, Shapiro & Shapiro and Dana R. Weller, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Andrews & Andrews and Harry W. Hanson, all of Los Angeles, for defendants.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem. This is an action for the specific performance of a contract for the exchange of real property, made between H. H. Helbush, assignor of plaintiffs, and defendant corporation, Harvey Investment Company. The contract consisted of a memorandum offer and acceptance. It provides for the exchange of a ranch at Paso Robles, Cal. (belonging to plaintiff York Realty Company) for two pieces of business property in the city of Los Angeles, belonging to defendant Harvey Investment Company. The said ranch was to be included in the transaction, subject to a $40,000 mortgage, due one year after date, at 7 per cent. In addition to putting in the ranch, Helbush was to pay the sum of $270,000 cash. Upon the conveyance of said ranch to defendant Harvey Investment Company and the payment to said defendant of the said sum of $270,000 cash, it agreed to convey to plaintiff Royal Investment Company, the parcel of Los Angeles realty at the corner of Washington and Flower streets, free and clear of all incumbrances, and another parcel in said city at the corner of Tenth and Flower streets, subject to a mortgage of $125,000, then of record. The parties agree that the consummation of the matter shall be handled through escrow instructions.

The complaint sets forth the contract and the escrow instructions delivered by each party to the bank, and describes in detail the steps taken by plaintiff in carrying out the terms of the said contract and which it is alleged show a full compliance with the terms and covenants thereof. It is further alleged that defendants Harvey Investment Company and Leo M. Harvey, with intent to trick, cheat, and defraud plaintiffs, made a pretended conveyance of the property at Tenth and Flower streets to Eugene L. Neustein and Rose Neustein on September 3, 1923, and that thereafter, and on September 12, 1923, said last-named parties conveyed said property to Joseph B. Dabney, and that all said parties paid nothing for the same, and each took the same with full knowledge of the rights of plaintiffs and their assignor, with intent to defraud them. Allegations of a similar tenor are made with reference to the lot at Washington and Flower streets; the grantees being George Ginsburg and Eva Ginsburg. It is also set forth that said last-named property was mortgaged by said grantees to one Murphy for $50,000, and that said Murphy took said mortgage in pursuance of said conspiracy. The said deed and mortgage were dated September 5, 1923. The relief asked is that defendant Harvey Investment Company be required to convey the said two parcels of land in the city of Los Angeles to plaintiffs, and that the various deeds and mortgages executed in furtherance of the said conspiracy to defraud be ordered delivered up and canceled.

The answer, after denying the allegation of the complaint, sets up by way of affirmative defense that the said contract was obtained through fraud. It is stated that plaintiff's assignor, H. H. Helbush, made false and fraudulent statements and representations in respect to the net annual income from the ranch property, and also concerning the acreage planted to almond trees. As the whole ground for appeal converges upon these two subjects claimed to have been misrepresented, we will quote the language of the amended answer in respect thereto:

"That defendants are informed and believe and upon such information and belief allege that the statement made by H. H. Helbush that 125 acres of said ranch were planted in almond trees of various ages was untrue, and that the total number of acres of said ranch planted in almond trees of any age, or all ages, was much less than 125 acres, to wit, 109.15 acres, and no more."

"He (H. H. Helbush) further stated and represented to said defendant that said ranch had been, for some years past, producing a net income annually in excess of ten thousand ($10,000.00) dollars."

"Defendants allege that the statement of H. H. Helbush that the ranch had produced a net income annually of ten thousand ($10,000.00) dollars for several years, were untrue, and allege that said ranch had been operated at a loss instead of profit during said years."

The findings of the trial court with reference to these allegations are as follows:

"That prior to the making of said contract of sale and exchange, both H. H. Helbush, the assignor of plaintiffs, and V. C. Simpson, as agent for said H. H. Helbush, stated and represented to said Leo M. Harvey as an inducement to the making and entering into said contract by said Harvey Investment Co. that said real property offered in exchange by said H. H. Helbush had from 120 to 125 acres thereof planted to almond trees; and that when Leo M. Harvey visited the ranch to inspect the same in company with Simpson that he was shown the almond orchard extending to the boundary fence of said property, but was not told that said boundary fence included 14 acres of said land planted to almond trees that lay within the limits of the Rancho Paso Robles, and were not included in the land described in said contract, and that said facts were known to said H. H. Helbush at the time and said 13 acres of land were expressly excepted from the deed executed by the plaintiff, the York Realty Co., purporting to convey the property to Harvey Investment Co., and deposited by said plaintiff in said escrow, as hereinbefore found; that said Leo M. Harvey believed said statements and representations as to the number of acres of said property offered to be conveyed to Harvey Investment Co. that were planted in almond trees and relied upon the same and reported the same and his belief therein to the board of directors of the defendant corporation Harvey Investment Co. and said board of directors believed said statements and representations and relied upon them and believing said statements and representations, and relying upon them authorized said Leo M. Harvey, as president of the corporation, to enter into said contract of exchange on behalf of said corporation; that believing and relying upon said statements and representations, and not otherwise, said Leo M. Harvey was induced to enter into and execute said contract of exchange; that the total acreage of said property, together with that part of the Rancho Paso Robles inside the fence line planted to almond trees, was 109.64 acres; that the total acreage of said property, as described in the deed executed by the plaintiff, York Realty Company to Harvey Investment Co., and deposited in said escrow and outside of the Rancho Paso Robles, planted to almond trees, was 96.64 acres; that said acreage planted to said almond trees that was excepted in said deed deposited in escrow by the York Realty Company had a market value at the time of the execution of said contract, of from $600.00 to $700.00 per acre.

"That said statements and representations made by said V. C. Simpson and H. H. Helbush to Leo M. Harvey as to the number of acres of said property that was planted in almond trees were false and untrue and said H. H. Helbush knew they were false and untrue when the same were made, and made them for the purpose of inducing said Leo M. Harvey to enter into and execute said contract of exchange on behalf of and as the president of the defendant, Harvey Investment Co. * * *

"That prior to the making of said contract of sale and exchange, both V. C. Simpson and H. H. Helbush, the assignor of plaintiffs represented and stated to Leo M. Harvey, as an inducement to the making and entering into said contract by said Harvey Investment Co., that said property offered to be conveyed to said Harvey Investment Co. by said H. H. Helbush in said proposed exchange, had an income of $8,000.00 per year and that said property had produced an income of $8,000.00 one year; that said Leo M. Harvey believed said statements and representations as to the income of said property and relied upon the same and reported the same and his belief therein to the board of directors of the defendant corporation, Harvey Investment Co., and said board of directors believed said statements and representations and relied thereon, and believing and relying upon said statements and representations, authorized said Leo M. Harvey, as president of the corporation, to enter into said contract of exchange on behalf of said corporation; that believing and relying upon said statements and representations and not otherwise, said Leo M. Harvey was induced to enter into and sign said contract of exchange, including said escrow instructions, on behalf of and in the name of said defendant, Harvey Investment Co.

"That said statements and representations were false and untrue, and said H. H. Helbush, plaintiff's assignor, knew they were false and untrue when they were made, and made them for the purpose of inducing said Leo M. Harvey to enter into and execute said contract of exchange on behalf of and in the name of said defendant, Harvey Investment Co. as the president thereof; that said property was acquired by the plaintiff, York Realty Company on or about the year 1920, and was owned, operated and controlled by said York Realty Company during the years 1921, 1922 and 1923; that during each and every of said years said property was operated at a loss, and the total net loss for said period was the sum of $14,138.19; that said H. H. Helbush knew said property had been operated and was being operated at a loss when said statements and representations were made by him and said V. C. Simpson, as aforesaid."

Judgment of nonsuit was entered as to defendants Dabney, Shapiro, and Murphy. This leaves only one parcel of Los Angeles realty before the court, to wit, the lot at the corner of Washington and Flower streets, and appellants urge that the trial court should have granted specific performance as to this lot, ordering the other party to pay $20,000 to balance the equities of the property left in the transaction.

The trial court entered judgment declaring the said contract of sale void, and this appeal is prosecuted from said judgment.

[1-3] The attack made by appellants is one directed solely at the findings, and the first contention is that the finding relative to the net income from the ranch is (1) not sufficient to support the judgment, and (2) that there is no evidence to support it. It is argued that, while the complaint alleges that it was represented that the net income was in excess of $10,000, the trial court finds that it was represented that the said ranch had a net income of $8,000 per year, and that the said property had produced a net income of $8,000 one year. The court further found that said ranch was operated at a loss during each year that it was owned by plaintiff York Realty Company, of which corporation one H. H. Helbush was president, and there is a further finding that the total amount of such loss, during said period (1920–21–22) was $14,138.19. Succinctly stated, appellants' position is that the finding of the court that the representation was made that the income was $8,000 for one year is a finding in favor of plaintiffs and does not support the judgment, because this finding expressly negatives and establishes the untruth of the allegation in the answer that Helbush made, and Harvey relied upon a representation that the annual net income from the ranch was in excess of $10,000. It is further contended that this finding is outside the issues, and is not raised by the pleadings.

It is the duty of an appellate court, in reviewing the findings, to give them a liberal construction so as to uphold, rather than defeat, the judgment. All the findings are to be read together, and must be reconciled to prevent any conflict upon material points, if such reconciliation is possible. Hotaling v. Hotaling, 193 Cal. 368, 224 P. 455, 56 A. L. R. 734. Appellant has apparently overlooked a further finding upon this subject, to the effect that the ranch was operated at a loss, as stated above. This finding is directly responsive to the allegations of the complaint, quoted supra. Giving a liberal construction to the finding questioned, it would appear that the issue presented to the trial court was the ultimate fact whether or not Helbush falsely represented to Harvey that the ranch produced a material income, when he knew it had been operated at a substantial loss during all the time it was operated by appellant York Realty Company, of which Helbush was manager. Furthermore, it does not appear that any objection was made at the trial to the testimony as to an $8,000 income, based upon the ground that it was not within the issues. As the case stands, it was tried upon the theory that any representations as to income were within the issues, irrespective of the amount of such income. Under such circumstances, this objection cannot be raised for the first time in this court. Horton v. Dominguez, 68 Cal. 642, 10 P. 186. If this objection had been made at the trial, the answer could readily have been amended to conform to the proofs. The contention of appellant presents, if we concede it has any force at all, an objection which is formal only, and lacking in merit so far as the substantial rights of the parties are involved.

[4] Is there any evidence to support the finding that it was represented to defendant Harvey Investment Company that the net income was $8,000 a year, and that the property had produced a net income of $8,000 one year? The trial court found that certain representations were made by H. H. Helbush, assignor of plaintiffs, and V. C. Simpson, his agent. No attack is made upon the finding as to the said agency, though appellant asserts that such agency did not exist. In the absence of a direct attack upon this finding, this court must and will assume that it was based upon sufficient evidence. There is testimony in the record upon this question of income. The witness Harvey, testifying to a conversation between him and Simpson, agent for Helbush, stated: "A. He told me it was a good income property; that the ranch produced about $10,000.00 a year, and when the young almond orchard would come into bearing it would produce more than that and it would be a good thing to get income property because I have the corner of 10th and Flower hardly bringing in anything. Q. What did he say about the income? How much was the income? A. He says it would net about $10,000.00 a year. He figured on a valuation of about $100,000.00. He said it will bring you in about 10 per cent. on your money."

There is also in the record a conversation between Harvey and Helbush, as follows: "Q. What else was said at that time about the ranch? The Court: By whom? Q. By Mr. Helbush? A. He said the income of the ranch was about $10,000.00. Q. For what year? A. He mentioned the year 1922."

In another place Simpson testified the income from the ranch had been $8,000 during any one year.

[5, 6] As we have before stated, the real question at issue was, Did plaintiffs' assignor misrepresent the income from said property to such an extent that defendant Harvey Investment Company was, by fraud, induced to enter into the contract of purchase? No question is raised as to the finding that the ranch was operated for years at a loss, during which time Helbush was manager of said corporation, and the further finding that Helbush knew this to be true.

We are satisfied that the record shows that the finding attacked is sufficiently supported by the evidence, and that the representations involved therein were asserted as existing facts, material to the transaction, and which had a reasonable tendency to induce defendant Harvey Investment Company to consider the same and rely upon them as representations of such facts. Harris v. Miller, 196 Cal. 8, 235 P. 981.

[7] The court found that defendant Harvey Investment Company entered into the contract believing the statements and representations to be true, and relying upon them to be true. It is urged that the evidence showed that these were not the facts. While it is true that Harvey visited the ranch and stayed there an hour or two, it was, after all, a question of fact for the trial court to decide, under all the facts and circumstances of the case, whether or not this defendant relied upon the representations made, and we do not feel disposed to disturb such a finding. The view we take of this contention is well expressed in the case of Quarg v. Scher, 136 Cal. 406, 69 P. 96, where the court says: "It is next insisted that the defendant saw the land and inspected it before making the contract, and having every opportunity to learn of the quantity of the land, he had no right to take the word of plaintiffs on the question of quantity; in other words, that the rule of caveat emptor applies to the case. This contention is not well founded; the defendant had a right to rely on plaintiffs' representation as to the quantity of land. The acreage of land is a thing that cannot be seen with the eye at a glance, but can only be ascertained with accuracy by scientific measurement, and when a vendor states to a vendee the amount of land in the tract which is the subject of the sale, such vendor will not thereafter be heard to say in a court of equity, the vendee had no right to believe him."

[8] It is next contended by appellant that the finding, quoted supra, upon the question of the acreage of the ranch property planted to almonds, is not supported by the evidence. In this connection witness Simpson, agent for Helbush, testified that Helbush made a written memorandum of the variety of trees to which the ranch was planted. Harvey, president of defendant Harvey Investment Company, testified that Simpson informed him that the ranch contained the following almond trees: "20 acres about two years old and 40 acres four years old and 65 acres twelve years old." This witness also testified that Helbush, at a conversation had in his office, made the statement that "there is about 123 to 125 acres of almonds." Witness Davis, for defendants, testified that he made a survey of the ranch, and that the acreage in almonds was 96.94, and that the parcel planted to almonds and lying within the Paso Robles ranch grant was 12.31 acres, and that the total of such planting lying within the fence lines of plaintiffs was 109.64 acres.

In explanation of the matter of discrepancy in the acreage planted to almonds, the following facts appear to be undisputed: Included within the fence lines of the ranch property there were 13 acres planted to almonds, to which neither of the plaintiffs nor their assignor ever had record title. These 13 acres were within the limits of another property, known as the "Rancho de Paso Robles Grant." The deed deposited in escrow by plaintiffs in pursuance of the contract of exchange expressly excepted this 13 acres in describing the property to be conveyed. At the trial, plaintiffs attempted to prove title by adverse possession to this 13-acre parcel. Assuming that the establishment at the trial of such title could be of any assistance to plaintiffs, we are at a loss to understand how such a title could be proved, when the record owners of the same were not before the court. They were not named as defendants in the action, nor served with process. Title to real property cannot be adjudicated in that manner, as there must not only be jurisdiction over the subject-matter, but jurisdiction over the person as well. The court further found that this 13 acres had a market value of $600 to $700 per acre, and this finding is not questioned.

We have carefully examined the record in connection with this finding as to the representations made upon the matter of acreage planted to almonds, and are of the opinion that the finding assailed is supported by the evidence.

[9, 10] It is finally urged by appellant that there is no evidence to support the finding on adequacy of consideration and on the justness and reasonableness of the contract, and that the finding upon these issues does not support the judgment. Typical of the argument relied upon by appellant as a ground for reversal in this connection is the following: "As can be seen from the above quoted paragraph from the complaint, the various values of the property were alleged as being those stated in the contract. The answer merely denies that these values stated in the contract constitute a just and adequate consideration. Therefore, it is denied that $100,000 is the value of the ranch. * * * The denial is in the form of a negative pregnant and admits the value of the ranch to be $99,999.99. * * * Such a finding (first referred to in this paragraph) cannot be considered and will be disregarded." Numerous witnesses testified to the value of the ranch. One testified that it was worth between $45,000 and $50,000. No objection was raised to this testimony upon the ground that the facts were admitted by the pleadings, and the point is now raised for the first time. Where an examination of the record discloses that the parties introduced evidence upon certain issues, and, by their conduct, plainly indicated that they considered the facts testified to as being legitimately within the issues to be tried and found by the lower court, they will not be permitted to urge, for the first time here, that such facts were admitted by the pleadings and hence were not within the issues, and that no finding could be based upon such testimony. These final contentions of appellant do not, in our opinion, merit further discussion. Appellant, in the first paragraph of his argument of his opening brief, states his position as follows: "We contend that the judgment must be reversed because it depends for its support wholly upon these two findings of fraud (referring to the misrepresentations made as to income and acreage), which we further contend are not supported by the evidence." Furthermore, the trial court having found for defendants upon the issues of misrepresentations made in the entering into of the contract, such findings necessarily defeat the right of recovery, and it was unnecessary that the findings dispose of any further issues, as all other issues thereby become entirely immaterial. Smith v. Dubost, 148 Cal. 622, 84 P. 38; Sharp v. Pitman, 166 Cal. 501, 137 P. 234; Pyle v. Fossler, 200 Cal. 204, 252 P. 599.

[11] The conduct of defendants in proceeding to dispose of and incumber their property, before the time for performance of the contract had expired, is subjected to severe criticism at the hands of appellant. If the contract was in fact obtained through fraud, as it appeared to have been, respondents were within their rights in so treating it. While the action was for a specific performance, it is well settled that fraudulent misrepresentations by which a person may be induced to enter into a contract constitutes a defense in such an action. 23 Cal. Jur. 422. When the trial court found this defense to be sustained, all other issues raised by the pleadings became immaterial. (See authorities cited supra.) This disposes of the contention of appellant that, under the rule that a vendor need only deliver title at the time when he is called upon to perform, the misrepresentations made as to the acreage were not a defense. If the contract were obtained through fraud at its inception, no subsequent act of appellants alone could restore its validity. If fraud in the entering into the contract were not an issue, and there were no affirmative defense, the contention of appellants as to the question of performance would be of greater weight.

SYFERT v. SOLOMON. (Civ. 3636.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 3, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 2, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 31, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ⟹891—In action for breach of marriage promise, tried before jury, appellate court cannot receive additional evidence showing plaintiff was married or make finding thereon.

Where action for breach of contract to marry was tried before jury, appellate court was not permitted to receive additional evidence to show plaintiff was married woman during period mentioned in her complaint, or to make finding thereon.

2. Breach of marriage promise ⟹14, 30—Action for breach of marriage contract, as regards damages, is tort action, in which exemplary damages may be recovered.

Action for breach of contract of marriage is classed as tort, as regards damages, and exemplary damages, if properly pleaded, may be recovered therein.

3. Breach of marriage promise ⟹30—Action for breach of marriage promise is "action for breach of obligation not arising from contract," within Code authorizing exemplary damages (Civ. Code, §§ 1572, subd. 4, 3294).

Action for breach of marriage promise, as regards damages, within discretion of jury, under Civ. Code, § 3319, is "action for breach of obligation not arising from contract," within provision of section 3294, authorizing recovery of exemplary damages for malice or fraud, as defined in section 1572, subd. 4.

4. Breach of marriage promise ⟹35—Instruction following complaint for breach of marriage promise on question of fraud, and authorizing additional damages, if jury found defendant deceived plaintiff, held proper.

In action for breach of contract of marriage, instruction following language of complaint on question of fraud, and authorizing additional damages if jury found defendant made promises of marriage without intent to perform them, and that he deceived and trifled with plaintiff's feelings, was proper.

5. Damages ⟹91(1)—"Malice," as basis for punitive damages, is wrongful act done intentionally, without just cause or excuse.

"Malice," as basis for recovery of punitive damages, is wrongful act done intentionally, without just cause or excuse.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Malice.]

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

6. Damages 🔑151—Exemplary damages cannot be recovered, unless alleged.

No recovery of exemplary damages can be had, unless damages are alleged in complaint.

7. Breach of marriage promise 🔑35—Instruction on malice, and punitive damages based thereon held error, in action for breach of marriage promise, not involving issue of malice.

Where complaint for breach of marriage promise did not allege any facts which would constitute malice, which was not made issue through pleadings or otherwise, it was error for court to instruct jury on question of malice, and to instruct them that they might base verdict for punitive damages thereon.

8. Damages 🔑215(1)—Instruction that malice is state of mind held improper, since legal malice requires wrongful act.

Instruction that malice is state of mind, importing wish to vex, annoy, or injure another, held improper, since legal malice requires act done without legal right.

9. Breach of marriage promise 🔑35—Instruction conforming to complaint for breach of marriage promise, authorizing consideration of injury to feelings, length of engagement, loss of chance to become otherwise engaged, and good faith of defendant, in determining damage, held proper.

In action for breach of contract of marriage, instruction in conformity with charge of fraud in complaint, authorizing recovery of compensation for injury, if any, to plaintiff's feelings, and consideration of length of time engagement continued between parties, probable loss of chance to become engaged to third party, and general loss and damage to plaintiff, and whether defendant acted in good faith, intending to carry out contract, or whether he intended to induce plaintiff to give defendant her time and companionship for his own satisfaction, held proper.

10. Breach of marriage promise 🔑18—Complaint for breach of marriage promise, alleging sequent promises and breach on certain dates, stated one cause of action.

Complaint for breach of contract of marriage, alleging number of sequent promises to marry, but alleging that breach occurred on certain date and was repeated on subsequent date, contained but one cause of action, and hence it was error for trial court to instruct jury that they might predicate verdict on any of several promises mentioned in complaint, since jury was led to believe that at least four breaches of contract may have been committed, while complaint and evidence showed there was but one contract and one breach.

11. Limitation of actions 🔑46(6)—Time for commencing action for breach of marriage promise runs from date of breach, and action commenced within two years from breach was timely.

Under complaint for breach of contract of marriage, alleging several promises to marry, if considered together as constituting one contract, time for commencing action would run from date of breach, though statute of limitations may have barred recovery on one or more of promises, and action commenced within two years from date of breach was within time allowed by law.

12. Breach of marriage promise 🔑35—Instruction that contingent contract of marriage was void, referring to one promise under complaint alleging several promises constituting but one contract, was error.

Where complaint for breach of contract of marriage alleged several promises of marriage, which constituted but one contract, instruction referring to one promise, and stating contract was void if jury found parties entered into contract, performance of which was contingent on death of defendant's mother was error.

13. Limitation of actions 🔑200(1)—Requested instruction that limitations would not run until reasonable time to perform marriage contract alleged to be breached had elapsed, where no time was fixed held proper.

In action for breach of contract of marriage, composed of several promises of marriage constituting one contract, requested instruction, not singling out any particular promise, but stating that statute of limitation would not commence to run until reasonable time to perform contract had elapsed, where no time was fixed for performance, held proper.

14. Breach of marriage promise 🔑35—Instruction referring to particular promise as basis for verdict, under complaint alleging various promises of marriage constituting one contract, held incorrect.

In action for breach of contract of marriage, composed of several promises constituting one contract, instruction referring to particular promise as basis for verdict held incorrect.

15. Breach of marriage promise 🔑18—Complaint for breach of marriage promise, alleging several promises and breach on certain dates, and defendant's intention not to carry out promise, held not demurrable.

Complaint for breach of contract of marriage, alleging several promises to marry on different dates, and alleging refusal to marry on certain date, which was renewed on subsequent date, and charging that defendant made promises without any intention of carrying out same, but to gratify his desires, held not demurrable.

16. Breach of marriage promise 🔑18—Cross-examination of defendant, sued for breach of marriage promise, concerning sexual intercourse with plaintiff, held inadmissible, in absence of allegations constituting seduction.

In complaint for breach of marriage promise, cross-examination of defendant relating to various acts of sexual intercourse with plaintiff held inadmissible for any purpose, in absence of allegations in complaint constituting seduction.

17. Appeal and error 🔑930(1)—Jury will not be presumed to have disregarded improper testimony held competent by court.

In action for breach of marriage promise, jury will not be presumed to have disregarded improper testimony concerning defendant's acts of sexual intercourse with plaintiff, especially where court held such testimony competent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Action by Glena Syfert against Fred H. Solomon. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court: CURTIS and PRESTON, JJ., voting for a hearing.

Warren L. Williams, Seymour S. Silverton, and Anderson & Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jones, Hoyt & Rifkind and Bicksler, Smith & Parke, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem. This is an action to recover damages for breach of contract on the part of defendant to marry plaintiff. The trial was had before a jury, and damages in the sum of $40,000 awarded plaintiff. The appeal is from the judgment upon the verdict.

[1] Upon the oral argument appellant moved the court for permission to offer proof that respondent herein was a married woman during all the times mentioned in her complaint. The trial was had before a jury, and under such circumstances an appellate court is not permitted to receive additional evidence of this character, or to make any finding thereon. The complaint, filed March 2, 1924, alleges, in substance, the following facts:

That plaintiff, respondent herein, and defendant, appellant herein, became acquainted on or about September 8, 1916; that on or about October 5, 1916, there was a mutual promise and acceptance of marriage, no definite time therefor being fixed at that time. It is further alleged that, at all times since the making of said agreement of marriage, respondent herein, plaintiff below, was manager of appellant's dance hall; that she directed the affairs of said dance hall, and had charge of the finances thereof, and managed and looked after the same, during which time appellant, defendant below, realized therefrom a net profit of $500,000.

It is further alleged in said complaint that during the month of January, 1917, plaintiff requested defendant to carry out his agreement to marry her to which defendant replied that they would go to Santa Ana, Cal., and be married, but later said to plaintiff that they had better wait; that said parties discussed their marriage from time to time; that during the early part of November, 1918, when defendant's mother was ill and not expected to live, defendant stated to plaintiff that, if his mother died, he would immediately marry her.

Plaintiff further alleged that on November 30, 1918, in addition to her work as manager of appellant's place of business, she also took charge of the affairs and management of his home, and continued so to do until the 2d day of December, 1924; that defendant's mother died on or about April 19, 1920, and on May 1, 1920, plaintiff asked defendant to marry her, to which he replied that he would do so before long, but would not agree upon a definite date; that while respondent, plaintiff below, was ill, and on or about the 26th day of July, 1924, in the California Hospital in Los Angeles, California, the defendant, appellant herein, promised to marry her as soon as she was able to leave the hospital; that on the 17th day of September, 1924, and again on December 6, 1924, respondent demanded of appellant that he marry her, and that appellant did for the first time decline and refuse to marry her.

It is further averred in said complaint that the plaintiff, respondent herein, is now able, ready, and willing to marry the defendant, appellant herein; that she has given to him all of her love, care, attention, and services, and looked after, managed, and cared for his business and home. It is further averred, on information and belief, that defendant made such promises to marry the plaintiff without any intention on his part of performing or carrying out the same, and to gratify his desires and to induce the plaintiff to manage his home and business; further, that plaintiff was deprived of an opportunity to marry anybody else during the period of time she kept company with the defendant, and that defendant is worth a sum of money in excess of $500,000, and judgment was prayed for in the sum of $50,000 actual damages and $25,000 punitive damages.

Defendant below interposed a demurrer to and motion to strike from said complaint, which demurrer was overruled and the motion to strike denied; defendant answered, specifically denying said allegations, and pleaded, by way of affirmative matter: (1) Unchastity of plaintiff; (2) statute of frauds; (3) statute of limitations.

It will be observed that the complaint sets forth five separate promises to marry. The first promise is October 5, 1916, and the alleged breach was on December 6, 1924 (over eight years from the date of the first alleged promise). The respondent, at the time she first met appellant in 1916, was 28 years of age. She testified that she had previously lived in St. Louis; that, from the time she was 20 years of age until she was 28 years of age, she had been frequently in the company of one Zieggenheim; that she had had frequent sexual relations with him, and that he had provided her with clothing, jewelry, and had paid her board for a portion of said period; that, after said party had transferred his affections to another, she had left him and come to California. She also testified that she informed appellant of such facts at the time he asked her to marry him on or about October 5, 1916.

Plaintiff further testified that she had sexual relations with defendant a few days after they first met, and that this conduct persisted intermittently for almost eight years. She also testified that she was intimate with defendant prior to the first promise of marriage set forth in her complaint. During all this time defendant made her numerous presents, including a $900 fur coat and other wearing apparel.

The following instructions were given at the request of plaintiff:

"If you find from the evidence in the case that the plaintiff is entitled to recover and has sustained actual damages then the amount of such actual damages rests in the sound discretion of the jury, subject to the limitations contained in the other instructions given you and to the further limitation that the actual damages, if any found by you, are not to exceed the sum of fifty thousand dollars, as alleged in plaintiff's complaint; and if you further find that the defendant made the promises of marriage to the plaintiff, as alleged in plaintiff's complaint, not intending to keep the same, and that he deceived and trifled with plaintiff's feelings, then you in your discretion may allow such additional damages in favor of the plaintiff by way of aggravation or damages for any such conduct on his part in an amount to be determined by you, but not exceeding the sum as alleged in plaintiff's complaint."

"If you should find for the plaintiff under the evidence and these instructions, you must find some compensatory damages, but the matter of punitive damages is entirely in your discretion. You may allow them in case you find malice as heretofore defined, or you may refuse to find them, no matter how much malice you may find there was in the acts of the defendant complained of."

"In the event your judgment is in favor of plaintiff, then, in fixing the amount of damages you may give to the plaintiff compensation for injury, if any, to her feelings, affections and wounded pride as elements of damages sustained by her on account of the breach of said contract to marry; also the length of time the engagement continued between the parties, the probable loss, if any, of a chance to become engaged to a third party, and the general loss and damage, if any, sustained by plaintiff by reason of the fact that defendant did not carry out his contract. And in estimating the amount of damages to be allowed to plaintiff in the event you find she is entitled to recover, you may take into consideration the question as to whether or not the defendant in promising to marry her acted in good faith, intending at the time to carry out his contract, or whether such promise was made for the purpose of trifling with the plaintiff and enjoying her company and inducing her to give him her time and companionship, to the exclusion of other men for his own satisfaction and enjoyment without at the time intending to live up to such agreement; and if you find that the defendant did, under promise of marriage, so deceive and trifle with the feelings of the plaintiff, you may in your discretion award additional damages therefor; also the extent, if any, of plaintiff's devotion to and love of defendant, her lack, if any, of independent means, her loss of marriage, and her altered social condition, if any, caused by defendant's breach of contract."

It is contended by appellant that these instructions are erroneous, for the reason that they submit to the jury the question of exemplary damages, and that, under the pleadings in the action, such damages cannot be recovered. The only allegation of the complaint which could be a basis for the introduction of evidence and instructions upon the subject of punitive or exemplary damages is the following:

"That plaintiff is informed and believes and on such information and belief alleges that the defendant at the time he made said promises and agreements to marry this plaintiff, as herein set forth, the same were fraudulently made without any intention on his part of performing or carrying out the same and for the purpose of gratifying his own desires and to induce this plaintiff to look after, manage and care for his business and home interests, as hereinbefore set forth."

No attempt is made by plaintiff to allege seduction, nor is there any averment of malice upon the part of defendant. Actual fraud consists in "a promise made without any intention of performing." Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 4. The definition of exemplary damages and the cases in which they are allowed are set forth in the Civil Code as follows: "In an action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, express or implied, the plaintiff, in addition to the actual damages, may recover damages for the sake of example and by way of punishing the defendant." Civ. Code, § 3294. It is also provided in section 3319 of the same Code that "the damages for the breach of a promise to marry rest in the sound discretion of the jury."

In our own jurisdiction there is one case where the matter seems to have been discussed. Lanigan v. Neely, 4 Cal. App. 760, 89 P. 441. That case involved the question as to whether allegations in the complaint for breach of promise, which showed seduction, were a statement of a separate cause of action ex delicto; it being contended by defendant that such was the fact, and that the causes of action, ex delicto and ex contractu, had been improperly united. The appellate court, through Mr. Justice Hart, held that the allegations as to seduction were made for the purpose of showing aggravation of damages, and that only one cause of action for breach of contract was stated. In discussing the nature of an action for breach of contract, Mr. Justice Hart said: "It is said in some of the early cases that, although an action upon a breach" of contract "of promise of marriage is assumpsit in form, it has always, as to measure of damages, been classed with actions of tort. * * * And it must be admitted that the effect upon the complaining party resulting from the injury in cases of breach of promise, unaccompanied by seduction, although the wrong arises primarily through the breaking of a contract, so nearly approximates that resulting from acts of strictly a tortious character, that the former are differentiated from actions of tort more in the degree and extent of the injury than from any actual or intrinsic distinction."

While matters disposed of in the foregoing quotation may not have been strictly necessary to the decision, we are of the opinion that the essential principles therein stated are sustained and supported by the weight of authority found in the text-books, encyclopedias and cases from other jurisdictions. It is stated in 9 C. J. p. 381, § 100, on the subject of punitive or exemplary damages, that "an action for breach of promise is an exception to the rule that exemplary or punitive damages should not be allowed in actions on contract, and with regard to the measure of damages it has always been classed with actions of tort." In Sutherland on Damages, volume 3, p. 2897, describing the nature of this action, the author says: "While it is in form upon contract, and in truth based upon it and its breach, the damages are governed by principles which apply to actions for personal torts." Ruling Case Law, volume 4, states the rule to be "an action for a breach of the contract to marry, though in form an action of assumpsit, is in fact and always has been, since it was sustained at common law, in respect to an action for damages, really in the nature of tort. The weight of judicial opinion seems to be that this particular action forms an exception to the general rules which cover contracts, and that damages are not limited to the consequences of the breach."

The rule in New York is laid down in McKane v. Howard, 202 N. Y. 181, 95 N. E. 642, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 960, as follows: "As to the measure of damages, the action [breach of contract to marry] has always been classed with actions of tort, as libel, slander, seduction, criminal conversation," etc. In Illinois, the court states that "the general rule that exemplary or vindictive damages cannot be recovered in actions ex contractu does not apply to an action to recover damages for the breach of a contract to marry." Jacoby v. Stark, 205 Ill. 34, 68 N. E. 557. The case of Hivley v. Golnick, 123 Minn. 498, 144 N. W. 213, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 757, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 295, is a well-considered and exhaustive opinion in strict harmony with the foregoing authorities.

[2, 3] We conclude, therefore, that this action is, so far as the matter of damages is concerned, to be classed as a tort and that exemplary damages, if properly pleaded, may be recovered therein and that it is, in the matter of damages, an action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, as such words are used in section 3294 of the Civil Code.

[4] The first instruction quoted, supra, was correct. It merely follows the language of the complaint upon the question of fraud, and authorizes additional damages if the jury found those facts to be true.

[5-7] The second instruction quoted involves a more serious question. It authorizes the jury to find punitive damages in case they find malice. We have pointed out that the complaint alleges no facts which would constitute malice, which is a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse. Tingley v. Times Mirror Co., 151 Cal. 1, 89 P. 1097. No recovery of exemplary damages can be had unless such damages are alleged in the complaint. Tingley v. Times Mirror Co., supra; Bailey v. Dale, 71 Cal. 34, 11 P. 804; 8 Cal. Jur. p. 892, § 129. As malice was not made an issue in this case, either through pleadings or otherwise, it was error for the court to instruct the jury upon that question, and to instruct them that they might base a verdict for punitive damages thereon.

[8] The court also defined malice in an instruction to the jury as follows: "Malice is a state of mind, and imports a wish to vex, annoy or injure another person." As we have pointed out, legal malice is far more than a state of mind. There must be a wrongful act on the part of the person against whom the charge is made, and that act must have been done without legal right. One may have malice in his mind, but unless that malice is evidenced by some overt act, no recovery of damages can be had. One cannot be penalized for harboring evil thoughts.

These two instructions undoubtedly led the jury to believe that the issue of malice was before them. It was prejudicial to defendant for the court to intimate to the jury, as it did, that they might find punitive damages based upon this issue.

[9] The third instruction quoted in the first part of this opinion was correctly given, and it was based upon and followed substantially the charge of fraud as set forth in the complaint.

The following instruction is complained of: "If you find that the plaintiff and defendant became acquainted about the year 1916 and that commencing during that year and continuing until the month of December, 1924, the plaintiff and defendant on numerous occasions and continuing during said period made mutual promises and agreements to marry each other, then each or either of said agreements, if found to be valid by you under the instructions given in this cause, is sufficient for the purpose of supporting plaintiff's cause of action except the one which it is alleged was made that defendant would marry the plaintiff immediately after the death of his mother; and if you should find on account of any defense pleaded by the defendant that any or either of the earlier promises to marry as alleged in plaintiff's complaint were not binding because they were barred by the statute of limitations or because of uncertainty or alleged unchastity of the plaintiff the fact that any or either of such defenses might be good as against one or more of said earlier promises would not affect plaintiff's right to recover on account of a breach of a later promise of marriage which was not affected by either or any of said defenses, provided you believe said later promise was made as alleged."

It will be noticed that the plaintiff's complaint contains five separate promises of defendant to marry her. It is alleged that on October 5, 1916, the plaintiff and defendant mutually promised and agreed to marry each other, no definite date therefor being agreed upon at that time; in 1917, a renewal of the promise to marry, with no definite date being agreed upon; a promise to marry in the early part of November, 1918, upon the death of defendant's mother; a promise of marriage in May, 1920, said promise to be "before long," and a promise to marry on July 26, 1924, "as soon as plaintiff was able to leave the hospital." It will be noticed that with the exception of the promises of November, 1918, to wit, conditional upon the death of defendant's mother, and of July 26, 1924, upon plaintiff being able to leave the hospital, no definite date for the marriage was ever agreed upon.

It is claimed that the said instruction is faulty, because three of said promises to marry were void as a matter of law, and the jury should have been so instructed, and that the court erred when it instructed the jury that each or either of said agreements (except the one which was contingent upon the death of deceased's mother) is sufficient to support the cause of action. The only valid promise, appellant asserts, is the one of October, 1916.

[10] While the complaint alleges a number of sequent promises to marry, it will be observed that the breach is alleged to have occurred upon September 17, 1924, and to have been repeated upon December 6, 1924. We are inclined to the view, and here hold, that a reasonable construction of the complaint would be that it contains but one cause of action. "Although a contract to marry is evidenced by several promises made at different times, there is but a single contract and a breach thereof is but one breach of one contract." 9 C. J. 330. As stated in Garmong v. Henderson, 112 Me. 383, 92 A. 322: "A contract to marry is evidenced ordinarily by many promises at many different times. Such is the nature of it." "So that if defendant on March 10, 1910, and again on November 6, 1910, promised to marry plaintiff, to show that he also made the same promise in August, 1909, does not, on the face of it, show a separate and independent contract." "If these parties ever promised to marry each other, no matter how many times the promises were repeated, * * * altogether they constitute but one contract. If, then, the defendant finally refused to perform his part of the contract, it was but one breach and constituted but one cause of action." "Sometimes causes of action are confounded with the facts and circumstances which give rise to them."

Respondent quotes with approval from the case last cited, and states that "we believe that there could be but one valid and existing contract of marriage between the parties at the same time, but, as is also stated in said case, 'a contract to marry is evidenced ordinarily by many promises at many different times.'" It was error, therefore, for the trial court to instruct the jury that they might predicate a verdict upon any of the several promises mentioned in the complaint, as the jury were led to believe that at least four breaches of contract may have been committed by defendant, while the complaint and the evidence show there was but one contract and one breach.

[11] It is unnecessary to decide the question of the sufficiency of each of said promises. While one of said promises, considered alone, might not justify a verdict, it might still be evidence of the contract sought to be proven. So, even though the statute of limitations may have barred a recovery upon one or more of said promises, if they are considered as together constituting one contract, the time for commencing the action would run from the date of the breach. The complaint shows that the action was commenced within two years from the date of the breach, and within the time allowed by law.

What we have said with reference to the several promises constituting but one contract is based entirely upon the proper construction to be given to the complaint herein. The learned trial judge took what we hold to be an erroneous view of the complaint, when he instructed the jury that they might find for plaintiff upon any one of the alleged promises. If we accept his construction of the pleading, the instructions would still be error, because action upon one of the promises, at least (that of October, 1916), was barred by the statute of limitations.

[12] The court instructed the jury as follows:

"If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff and the defendant herein did enter into any contract of marriage, but that the performance of such or any such contract was contingent upon, the death of defendant's mother, then such contract, if any such was made upon any such contingency, was void and of no effect, and no recovery can be had by plaintiff upon any such contract even though you should find that any such was made."

The foregoing instruction, referring obviously to the promise of January, 1917, should not have been given. As we have pointed out, the pleadings clearly indicate, and counsel for respondent, who drew them, admits, that the several promises set forth therein constitute but one contract, and should not be considered separately.

[13] The instruction set forth on page 148 of appellant's brief correctly stated the law. No one promise was singled out by the court. The jury was simply told that, if they found that defendant had agreed to marry plaintiff, as set forth in the complaint, the statute of limitations would not commence to run until a reasonable time to perform the contract had elapsed, where no time was fixed for performance.

[14] The instruction found on page 149 of said brief was not correct, in that a particular promise was referred to as the basis for a verdict; whereas, as we have pointed out, the various promises should have been considered, in effect, as one. The same is true of the instruction found on page 152 of said brief.

[15] The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled, and the motion to strike correctly denied, for the reasons we have indicated.

[16, 17] While defendant was upon the witness stand and under cross-examination, he was compelled, over proper objection, to relate various acts of sexual intercourse with plaintiff. The questions asked were not cross-examination. Such acts were committed in privacy and secrecy. In the absence of allegations in the complaint constituting seduction, such evidence is not admissible for any purpose. Smith v. McPherson, 176 Cal. 144, 167 P. 875, L. R. A. 1918B, 66; Wrynn v. Downey, 27 R. I. 454, 63 A. 401, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 615, 114 Am. St. Rep. 63, 8 Ann. Cas. 912. We cannot say how much effect this improper testimony had upon the minds of the jurors. It will not be presumed that they disregarded it, and the fact that it was held competent by the court would, at least, lead the jury to believe that they might consider the same in arriving at their verdict. "Innate chivalry of most jurors often prompts them to find in favor of a woman in an action of this kind, but they ought not to base the measure and recovery of damages sustained upon evidence of sexual intercourse alone, when she has not testified that her consent to the intercourse was induced by her reliance upon the defendant's promise" to marry. Stamm v. Wood, 86 Or. 187, 168 P. 73.

Numerous other assignments of error are made with respect to rulings upon evidence. We have examined these, and conclude that the trial court disposed of them correctly.

In view of the fact that certain testimony, prejudicial to defendant, was admitted, and certain instructions were erroneously given, we do not deem it would serve any useful purpose to pass upon the question of the excessiveness of the verdict. The record of another trial, if there is such, must necessarily differ from this one.

We are impelled to the conclusion that, through the errors we have pointed out, defendant was not afforded a fair trial, and that the judgment must be reversed; and such is the order.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

PEOPLE v. BURDG et al. (Cr. 1482.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 5, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑1159(3) — Conclusions reached by jury on conflicting evidence are controlling.

Conclusions reached by jury on conflicting evidence are controlling on appeal.

2. Homicide 🔑250, 254—Evidence held to sustain conviction of manslaughter and murder in the second degree of two defendants.

Evidence held to sustain conviction of wife of deceased for murder in the second degree and of her codefendant of manslaughter.

3. Criminal law 🔑877—That jury found one defendant guilty of murder in second degree and other of manslaughter only did not authorize setting aside convictions.

In prosecution for murder of two defendants, that one was found guilty of second degree murder and the other of only manslaughter did not authorize setting aside the verdict of second degree murder rendered against one defendant, where evidence was sufficient to sustain verdict against both defendants for the higher degree of crime had such verdict been rendered.

4. Indictment and information 🔑37—Information in prosecution for murder following statutory form held not defective (Pen. Code, § 951, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043, and § 971).

Information in prosecution for murder, drawn in form prescribed by Pen. Code, § 951, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043, held not defective because failing to show whether crime charged was alleged to have been committed by the joint act of defendants or whether one was charged as accessory and, if so, which one, especially in view of section 971.

5. Criminal law 🔑622(2)—Denying separate trial in murder prosecution held not abuse of discretion (Pen. Code, § 1098).

In prosecution of two defendants for murder, denying defendants separate trial held not shown to be an abuse of discretion under Pen. Code, § 1098, though prosecution introduced evidence of extrajudicial declarations made by respective defendants out of presence of the other, where court instructed that rights of absent party were not thereby affected.

6. Criminal law 🔑1144(15)—Presumption is that jury followed court's instructions.

Reviewing court must presume, in absence of contrary showing, that jury followed court's instructions.

7. Criminal law 🔑808½—Instructions on circumstances of mitigation in murder prosecution, in language of statute, held proper (Pen. Code, § 1105).

In prosecution for murder, giving instruction relating to burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, worded in language of Pen. Code, § 1105, held proper.

8. Criminal law 🔑829(10, 11)—Refusing instructions relating to extrajudicial statements and accomplices held not error, where covered by instruction given.

Refusing instruction relating to law of extrajudicial statements and law of accomplices held not error, where covered in substance by instruction given.

9. Criminal law 🔑699—Much is left to trial court's discretion in determining whether attorney improperly argues to jury.

Much must be left to discretion of trial court to say whether an attorney oversteps the boundaries of legal propriety in making argument to the jury.

10. Criminal law 🔑730(6)—District attorney's argument as to unsolved murder held not reversible error, in view of court's instruction to disregard.

In murder prosecution, district attorney's reference to unsolved murder held not to require reversal, where he was promptly restrained by trial court and jury was instructed to disregard all remarks relating to it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

Clifford Burdg was convicted of manslaughter, and Mollie Trau was convicted of murder in the second degree, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Edmond Chevalier, of San Francisco, and J. O. Traber, of Fresno, for appellant Burdg.

Julius Hansen and J. C. Saylor, both of Fresno, for appellant Trau.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KNIGHT, J. The appellants, Clifford Burdg and Mollie Trau, were charged jointly with having murdered the latter's husband, Philip Trau, and upon trial the jury found Burdg guilty of manslaughter and Mrs. Trau guilty of second degree murder. The appeals, which are taken from the judgments of conviction, are separately presented.

[1, 2] Insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdicts is one of the grounds urged for reversal by both appellants. As will hereinafter appear, however, the evidence is sharply conflicting, and, such being the case, the conclusions reached thereon by the jury are controlling. The following are the facts: Trau, the deceased, and appellant Mollie Trau lived in Fresno, and up to the date of the alleged homicide had been married less than six weeks. Trau was a special patrolman and worked nights. Mollie Trau and Burdg had known each other for upwards of 15 years, testimony having been introduced to the effect that at one time they lived together as husband and wife; also that since her marriage Mrs. Trau had been meeting Burdg at the home of her sister, Stella Moore, in the absence of her husband. Burdg was connected with an illegal liquor enterprise operating just outside of Fresno, and during the evening preceding the homicide had been drinking in company with Mrs. Moore and her husband and Trau and his wife. Later, all five drove out to Burdg's place to obtain a gallon of liquor Trau had purchased from him, and while there Trau invited Burdg to spend the night at his house. On returning to town Trau got out of the machine where he worked and at his request the others drove to his house to await his return at 11:30 o'clock, when he would be home for supper. While they were waiting for Trau more liquor was consumed, and at 10:30 o'clock the Moores went home, leaving Burdg and Mrs. Trau in the house alone. Trau arrived about an hour later, and after eating supper and having a few drinks with Burdg, returned to work. His house consisted of a front bedroom, a dining room, and a kitchen, the doorway between the bedroom and the dining room being closed with curtains; and before leaving Trau stated that Burdg could sleep on the couch in the dining room, and that he would be home at the usual time, about 5 o'clock in the morning. However, he returned unexpectedly about 2:30 o'clock and soon after he entered the house was instantly killed. Admittedly, the only persons present at the time were the appellants. The immediate cause of his death was a gunshot wound in the neck. There were no traces of powder marks on his body, and testimony was introduced to the effect that the wound he received could not have been self-inflicted. On the same day that the homicide was committed the officers searched an alley on which Trau's home abutted, and the vicinity adjacent thereto, and found in the alley three loaded cartridges and a pint flask of whisky; and about a month after the shooting the revolver with which the homicide was doubtless committed was found by a neighbor under on ash can in a back yard adjoining the alley. The revolver when found was "broken," and contained two shells, one loaded and the other discharged. The three cartridges previously found were of the same caliber as the revolver. The identity of the revolver was established as being one given to Trau by a friend about two months prior to the shooting, and Mrs. Trau admitted having kept it in a graphophone in the dining room. It had a black fiber handle, and when found under the ash can one side of the handle was broken and part of the barrel was "bulged out."

Immediately following the shooting Burdg fled to the home of a friend, named Williams, about three miles distant from Trau's house, arriving there a little before 4 o'clock. He told Williams that Trau had committed suicide, and phoned to his employer to the same effect. Soon afterwards Williams' hired man drove Burdg back to town, where he ate breakfast, and was then driven to the Moores. He told the Moores also that Trau had shot himself, and Moore accompanied Burdg back to Trau's house. Burdg waited outside while Moore went in the house, saw Trau's body lying on the floor, came out and told Burdg what he had seen, and then both drove back to the Moores. Soon afterwards Moore again accompanied Burdg back to Trau's house. Meanwhile Williams had notified the police, and they were at Trau's when Moore and Burdg arrived.

The police questioned Mrs. Trau and Burdg separately, and both declared that Trau had shot himself, but their respective stories were self-contradictory and differed materially from each other as to the particulars in which each claimed the act was committed. Finally, after further questioning by the police, Mrs. Trau, whose mind at first seemed bewildered, changed her story completely and made a statement, which, in substance, she repeated at the trial, wherein she charged Burdg with having shot her husband during a drunken quarrel over her. At the trial Burdg also flatly contradicted his former statement as to the circumstances attending the shooting and gave testimony indicating that Mrs. Trau had shot her husband.

In this regard Mrs. Trau stated to the police upon their arrival at the house that night, and before Burdg returned with Moore the second time, that Trau had shot himself with a pearl-handled pistol which she said was somewhere on the floor; but no such weapon was found. She stated also that no one besides herself and husband was present at the time of the shooting, but a little later said that a man named Burdg was there. She claimed, however, that she could give no description of Burdg nor tell of his whereabouts because, as she said, she had met him only once or twice. At the trial she admitted that she knew when Burdg fled from the house where he intended going. When questioned further by the police, however, Mrs. Trau changed her story entirely and declared that the circumstances leading up to and attending the shooting were as follows: She stated that a heated argument took place between the two men when Trau returned for supper at 11:30 o'clock, because he found Burdg seated beside her on the couch with his arm around her, during which argument Burdg told Trau that if he wanted to get his wife away from him he could do so by killing him; that after her husband went back to work she and Burdg resumed drinking, and that a little later Burdg forced her to an act of sexual intercourse; that she threatened to tell her husband and Burdg declared: "You won't get the chance to tell him; if you do I will kill him." Continuing, she said that when her husband arrived unexpectedly about 2:30 o'clock she was lying on the bed in the front room and Burdg was reclining on the couch in the dining room; that as her husband entered the front door she told him she wanted to speak to him, but he proceeded on through the house without stopping, and was followed into the kitchen by Burdg; that the two men began drinking and quarreling; that they cursed each other and scuffled, and she heard Burdg tell Trau that he loved her and "would have her, by God, if he had to kill him," immediately following which a shot was fired and Burdg rushed out of the kitchen through the house, past her, and out of the front door, concealing something under his coat. She said that thereupon she ran to the kitchen and found her husband lying on the floor wounded and unable to speak; that she dragged him into the dining room, but, being unable to lift him on to the couch, placed a pillow under his head, in which position the police found the body upon their arrival. She admitted, however, that she made no effort whatever to call help or summon medical aid before the police arrived. While questioning her the police searched the bed in the front room, and underneath the mattress they found Trau's pistol, cartridge belt, and flashlight, which he carried on his person when he entered the house. The presence of these articles in the bed tended to dispute her assertion that upon entering house her husband walked directly through to the kitchen where the shooting took place.

Burdg's two versions of the shooting were, in substance, as follows: When first questioned by the police he stated that he had seen Trau commit suicide under the following circumstances: That Trau was standing in the dining room near a sewing machine, when suddenly he reached over and took his pistol from underneath his coat, which he had previously laid on the sewing machine, and shot himself; that immediately following the shot blood spurted from a wound in his neck, and he fell to the floor. Thereupon Burdg said, he became frightened and fled. Later, during the same day, however, when taken back to the scene of the shooting by the police, it was clearly demonstrated to Burdg that his story of the shooting having taken place in the dining room could not be true because no blood stains whatever were found on the dining room floor near where he said Trau had fallen, but that there was much blood on the floor of the kitchen where Mrs. Trau said the shooting had occurred; moreover, as stated, there were no powder marks on Trau's body, and his pistol, which was found in the bed in the front room, had not been discharged.

At the trial, Burdg retracted the former statements made by him as to the shooting, and testified that he had not seen Trau commit suicide; and that the shooting had not taken place in the dining room, but had occurred in the kitchen under the following circumstances: He stated that twice during the night Trau and his wife had quarreled, first when Trau came home to supper, over the possession of the liquor, at which time Trau had taken his wife in the front room and spanked her; secondly, shortly before the shooting occurred, over the refusal of Mrs. Trau to go to bed, at which time Trau was in the kitchen, and Mrs. Trau and himself were in the dining room; that during this latter quarrel Mrs. Trau arose from the couch on which she had been reclining, and walked over to and stood by a graphophone in the dining room; that while she was standing there he saw Trau, who was still in the kitchen, reach over to a chair and grab his pistol from underneath his coat; that as he did so Mrs. Trau rushed toward the kitchen, saying: "Pinky (meaning her husband), drop that! Si (meaning Burdg), get out of the way;" that as she neared the kitchen a shot was fired; and that Trau fell to the kitchen floor with blood spurting from a wound in his neck.

Mrs. Trau claimed that when she made the false statements hereinabove set forth to the police she was intoxicated, and there is evidence tending to show that during the night she had been drinking. Burdg's explanation for changing his story was that at first he actually thought Trau had shot himself; that he "saw him grab for his gun and everything"; but that he had forgotten "about her running to him, or anything like that, until several days after." Continuing, he stated, "After I got back to the jail there and they showed me the graphophone and told me there was a gun in the graphophone and everything and I got to thinking it over and thinking the way she was talking about me, that I did it, when she absolutely knew I did not do it, and the way her sister was saying what she has said in the way it came out in the paper, I just got to wondering why they would get up and lie about it like that unless they had a cause for lying, and then I remembered her being at that graphophone, and the story I have told now. * * * At the time I didn't know she had a gun or anything else in the house, and I didn't believe for several days that there actually was a gun there until I got to figuring it over." He was then asked by his counsel: "Did you think of this last story that you have related on the witness stand here * * * all at one time?" To which he replied, "No, I was quite a while studying it out, that is what I meant; it come to me along gradually, just the way it was, I remember her at the graphophone and everything, and I remember her shoving me to the side and hollering for him to drop that gun, and I actually did think the man had shot himself when it happened." In addition to the foregoing facts and circumstances Burdg admits having run through the alley in his flight from the house, and that he may have "ditched" the flask of whisky which was later found there; and although he denied having had any quarrel with Trau, the evidence shows that following the shooting he bore a number of scratches and bruises about his forehead.

[3] It would appear, therefore, from the testimony of appellants themselves, as well as from the surrounding circumstances established independent thereof, that Trau was shot and killed unlawfully by either one or the other of the appellants, and because of the many contradictory and obviously false statements in which both apparently entangled themselves, the jury, in our opinion, was justified in concluding that neither told the whole truth about the matter, and that therefore, irrespective of the question of which of them actually fired the fatal shot, the other participated in the homicidal act, either actively or by aiding and abetting therein, and consequently was also guilty. And even though, as both appellants contend, it is not readily discernible from the evidence upon what theory the jury found one guilty of second degree murder and the other guilty of only manslaughter, it does not follow that the verdicts rendered are contrary to the evidence and the law, for the reason that manifestly the evidence would have been legally sufficient to sustain verdicts against both for the higher degree of crime, had such verdicts been rendered, and therefore the fact that the jury may have dealt more leniently with Burdg than the evidence would seem to warrant does not furnish legal grounds for setting aside the verdict of second degree murder rendered against Mrs. Trau, and certainly gives Burdg no just cause to complain.

[4] Appellant Burdg contends that the information is defective. It was drawn in conformity with the short form prescribed by section 951 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1043), and appellant argues that it should have set forth circumstances from which it could be ascertained whether the crime charged was alleged to have been committed by "the joint act" of appellants or whether one was charged as an accessory, and, if so, which one, citing section 950 of said Code. We find no merit in the point. The form of information here followed was approved by the Supreme Court in the recent case of People v. Coen, 271 P. 1074 [Crim. No. 3139, decided November 26, 1928]; and, furthermore, section 971 of said Code in terms abrogates all distinction between accessories before the fact and principals, and declares that all persons concerned in the commission of a felony, whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense or aid and abet in its commission, although not present, "shall hereafter be prosecuted, tried, and punished as principals, and no other facts need be alleged in any indictment or information against such an accessory than are required in an indictment or information against his principal"; and in harmony therewith the courts have held that allegations of the kind here contended for are unnecessary. People v. Rozelle, 78 Cal. 84, 20 P. 36; People v. Nolan, 144 Cal. 75, 77 P. 774; People v. Plum et al. (Cal. App.) 265 P. 322. Some suggestion is also made that said section 950, as amended, is violative of certain constitutional provisions, but appellant advances no argument to support such suggestion, and the constitutional provisions he cites apparently have no bearing upon the issue. In any event, the decision in the case of People v. Nolan, supra, effectively disposes of any such question.

Further contention is made that the court erred in refusing to direct the district attorney to elect whether he would proceed against appellants as principals or accomplices. But, as already pointed out, under section 971 of said Code, irrespective of what their status in law may be, they must be "prosecuted, tried and punished" as principals; consequently, in such cases no election by the district attorney is required or permitted.

[5, 6] Appellants requested and were denied separate trials; and both assign the making of the order of denial as error. Section 1098 of the Penal Code provides, however, that where two or more defendants are jointly charged, "they must be tried jointly, unless the court orders separate trials"; and in conformity therewith the courts have constantly held that on appeal the result of the exercise of such discretionary power will not be disturbed unless it clearly appears that such discretion has been abused. People v. Erno, 195 Cal. 272, 232 P. 710; People v. Perry, 195 Cal. 623, 234 P. 890; People v. Remington, 74 Cal. App. 371, 240 P. 526; People v. Booth, 72 Cal. App. 160, 236 P. 987; People v. Anderson, 59 Cal. App. 408, 211 P. 254. We find no circumstances in the present case from which it could be reasonably concluded that the ruling complained of amounted to an abuse of discretion. It is true, the prosecution was allowed to introduce in evidence at the joint trial extrajudicial declarations made by the respective appellants out of the presence of the other, but this situation of itself does not give defendants jointly charged the absolute right to separate trials, because if such were the rule then in no case could there be a joint trial when part of the evidence against the joint defendants consisted of extrajudicial statements; furthermore, in the present case, the record discloses that in admitting said declarations the trial court in each instance carefully and properly instructed the jury to the effect that the rights of the absent party were to be in no way affected thereby; and we must presume, in the absence of a contrary showing, that the jury followed those instructions. People v. Prather, 134 Cal. 436, 66 P. 589, 863. And answering the complaint that on joint trial one appellant was allowed to testify against the other, it is sufficient to say that if they had been separately tried a like condition could have arisen.

[7, 8] Nor do we find any error in the giving or the refusal to give the instructions enumerated by appellants. The one relating to the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation was worded in the exact language of section 1105 of the Penal Code and therefore was proper. People v. Caballero, 41 Cal. App. 146, 182 P. 321; People v. Grill, 151 Cal. 592, 91 P. 515; People v. Wilt, 173 Cal. 477, 160 P. 561; People v. Miller, 177 Cal. 404, 170 P. 817. Appellants' proposed instructions upon the law of extrajudicial statements were unnecessary because, as stated, during the course of the trial, whenever the court admitted such statements, the jury was fully instructed as to the law upon the subject. A number of instructions were also proposed by appellant Burdg and by the court refused, dealing with the law of accomplices, but such refusal was not error, for the reason that the substance of the proposed instructions was substantially covered in those given.

[9, 10] The making of certain statements by the district attorney during the course of his argument to the jury is assigned as misconduct; but we think the matters objected to are not of sufficient importance to require special attention. The range of discussion and argumentation of counsel before a jury is wide (People v. Molina, 126 Cal. 505, 59 P. 34), and much must be left to the discretion of the trial court to say whether an attorney is overstepping the boundary of legal propriety. Most of the matters complained of related to inferences which, in our opinion, could be fairly drawn from the evidence, and therefore constituted proper subject for argument; and when the district attorney started upon a discussion of an "unsolved murder," which he claimed had once taken place in the county, he was promptly restrained by the trial court and the jury instructed to disregard all remarks relating to it.

Finding no substantial error in the record, the judgments of conviction are affirmed.

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank Jan. 17, 1929.

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑180(3)—Evidence held sufficient to support finding that lessee was unlawfully evicted from premises by lessor.

In action to recover damages for alleged eviction from land owned by defendant and leased to plaintiff, evidence held sufficient to support finding of unlawful eviction.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑136—Notice by lessor that, unless lessee began work upon land within certain time, lease would be canceled, held to support inference that lessor waived provision requiring lessee to live on land.

Written notice by lessor to lessee that lease would be canceled unless lessee began active work upon leased land within certain time held to support inference that lessor waived provision of lease requiring lessee to live upon the tract.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑136—Provision of lease requiring lessee to cultivate land as lessor directs must be reasonably construed.

Provision in lease requiring lessee to plow and cultivate land as lessor may direct must be given a reasonable construction.

4. Landlord and tenant 🔑180(4)—Value of crop that lessee could have grown on premises less cost of raising and harvesting held proper measure of damages for eviction.

Value of crop that might have been grown on leased premises during term of lease, less cost of raising and harvesting the same, held proper measure of damages in action by lessee for alleged eviction.

5. Landlord and tenant 🔑136—Lessee required to live on land need not be actually present on property during all of residence thereon.

Lessee required to live on leased premises need not actually be present upon the property during all the time of his residence thereon.

6. Trial 🔑397(5)—Findings on issues made by affirmative allegations of answer held unnecessary; findings upon issues made by amended complaint and denials of answer inconsistent with allegations of affirmative defense being sufficient.

Where findings of court upon all the issues made by amended complaint and denials in answers were inconsistent with allegations of affirmative defense, they were sufficient so as to make it unnecessary that particular findings as to issues made by affirmative allegations of answer be made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Action by Jack Wells against the B. E. Porter Estate, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

★Hearing denied in bank.

Denis & Griffith, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Alonzo D. Hitchcock, of Van Nuys, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This action was brought to recover damages for an alleged eviction of the plaintiff from 190 acres of land owned by defendant and held by plaintiff under lease from defendant. The lease was in writing, and covered a term of one year beginning November 1, 1923, and ending with the cropping season of the following year. It provided that defendant was to receive as rental of the leased premises one-third of all crops produced on the leased land. Plaintiff alleged that he was wrongfully evicted from said premises on the 14th day of February, 1924, and that he was thereby damaged in the sum of $12,500, which sum he alleged was the value of plaintiff's share of the crop of baby lima beans, which would have been produced upon said land during the term of said lease had he been permitted to continue in possession of the leased premises during the term of the lease. In its answer, the defendant denied specifically all the foregoing allegations, and affirmatively alleged the abandonment of said premises by the plaintiff and also the violation of the terms of the lease requiring him to live upon the leased property or to hire somebody to live thereon or take charge of the same during his absence. Defendant further alleged in its answer that plaintiff violated said lease by his failure at proper times and in a proper manner to cultivate said land in a good and husbandlike manner and by his failure to follow, as required by the terms of the lease, defendant's direction in that respect. The action was tried by the court without a jury. The facts were found substantially as alleged by plaintiff except as to the amount of the latter's damage, which the trial court found to be the sum of $1,994.96. The defendant has appealed.

[1] The main contention of appellant is that the evidence is not sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that the respondent was wrongfully evicted from said premises by the appellant. Immediately upon the execution of the lease, the respondent was let into the possession of a portion of the leased premises, but did not get possession of the entire tract until December 10, 1923. He removed his stock and farming implements upon the land and began work upon the same for the purpose of putting in a crop of baby lima beans. He plowed in some ditches that were upon the land and about 6 acres of the land itself which had been previously planted to kaffir corn, and disced about 60 acres of ground upon which the year before tomatoes had been grown. This work consumed about a month. There had been but a slight rainfall during the season, and it was difficult to work the land advantageously in the condition in which it was before the rains. It was not customary to begin planting beans in that locality until about the 1st of May. The officers of the appellant were urging the respondent to expedite the plowing of the land and the preparation of it for the planting of the season's crop. There were no buildings on the premises, and respondent had not occupied the premises as provided by the lease. His cookhouse was upon the premises leased from the appellant and located about 3 miles from the 190-acre tract, covered by the lease in question. His tools were upon the 190-acre tract, and his hay and livestock were kept across the road from the leased premises. No rain of any substantial amount fell until March 15, 1924. After said rain there was sufficient time in which to prepare said land for the planting of baby lima beans for that season. The respondent held possession of the property until February 14, 1924. On that day he left the premises for a few days, and on his return on February 19, 1924, he found them in the possession of a third person to whom the appellant had leased them. He also found a note from appellant dated February 14, 1924, reading as follows: "You are hereby notified that unless active work is commenced within forty-eight hours from date your lease will be automatically cancelled." In conversation the next morning after his return with the superintendent of appellant, he was told that he had no lease.

It was also shown that baby lima beans were generally grown in that section, and that, had respondent been permitted to carry out the terms of the lease regarding said real property, he would have planted the same to baby lima beans, which crop of beans when sold, according to the prices prevailing during that year, would have brought an amount of money which, after deducting all expenses incurred in raising and producing said crop, would exceed the judgment in this action.

[2, 3] We think this evidence sufficient to support the finding of the court that the respondent was unlawfully evicted from said premises by the appellant. There might be some question whether the respondent complied with that provision of the lease requiring him to live upon the leased premises. While his tools and farming implements were upon the leased land and he was personally in possession thereof and was clearing and plowing the same, his hay and live stock were kept across the street, and he resided upon premises owned by the appellant situated some 3 miles away from the leased premises. It does not appear, however, that the appellant ever objected to this departure by respondent from the terms of the lease. In fact, it might be inferred from the evidence that, as respondent was then living upon premises belonging to appellant and leased by it to respondent, appellant waived the provision of the lease requiring him to live upon the 190-acre tract. This is borne out by the written notice left by appellant at the home of respondent, notifying him that his lease would be canceled unless be began active work upon the leased land within 48 hours from the date of the notice. No complaint was made in this notice that respondent was not then living upon the leased premises. As the appellant took possession of the property soon after leaving this notice at respondent's home, it may well be assumed that appellant was acting thereunder and for the reason therein stated when it repossessed itself of the leased premises. As to the claim that respondent failed to comply with the terms of said lease requiring him to cultivate the leased land in a good and husbandlike manner, the evidence, to say the least, is conflicting. As recited above, the evidence shows that respondent began to plow and disc said land immediately upon being let into the possession thereof; that it was difficult to properly prepare said land for a crop until after the rains came. Before the rains came, the appellant evicted respondent and thereby prevented him from the further cultivation of the land. The rains came in March, and there was evidence that there was time after that date in which to prepare the land and make it ready for a crop of beans to be grown during that season. Some reliance is made by appellant upon that provision of the lease which requires the respondent at his own expense to "plow, culticate, seed, irrigate and hoe said land as lessor may direct." Appellant insists that this provision of the lease was breached by the respondent prior to the time the appellant repossessed itself of said land, and therefore that it was justified in its eviction of respondent. The evidence shows that officers and representatives of the appellant had on numerous occasions requested and urged the respondent to be more expeditious in the preparation of said land for the season's crop to be planted thereon, and in one instance at least had warned him that, if he was not more prompt in carrying out the terms of his lease, they would cancel it and lease the property to other parties. At the same time there was evidence which at least tended to show that respondent was doing all that could be reasonably required of him under the lease, and that, had he not been interfered with by appellant in the possession of said premises, he would have prepared the same and would have planted and grown a crop of beans thereon as contemplated and agreed by the parties at the time of the execution of the lease. The provision in the lease requiring the respondent to plow and cultivate the land as the lessor may direct is to receive a reasonable construction. It is not to be understood as giving to the lessor an arbitrary right to direct every act of the lessee in the raising of a crop upon said lands, and then for a violation of such direction give to it the right to terminate the lease and thereby deprive the lessee of all the fruits of his labor performed under the lease. The trial court evidently determined that the respondent had performed all the reasonable directions given by appellant regarding the plowing and cultivation of said land, and in our opinion there was sufficient evidence before it to justify such a determination.

[4] A further contention is made by appellant that the trial court erroneously adopted as the measure of damage the value of the crop that might be grown on said premises during the term of said lease, less the cost of raising and harvesting the same. This method of measuring damages sustained by a tenant by reason of a breach of the lease by the landlord has been frequently approved and adopted by this court. Rice v. Whitmore, 74 Cal. 619, 16 P. 501, 5 Am. St. Rep. 479; Schumann v. Karrer, 184 Cal. 50, 57, 192 P. 849. We have been cited to no instance in which this court has refused to follow the rule enunciated in these cases. The case of Crow v. San Joaquin, etc., Irr. Co., 130 Cal. 309, 62 P. 562, 1058, cited by appellant, does not apply, as that action was not to recover damages under a lease of real property, but was brought under the Act of March 12, 1885 (Stats. 1885, p. 95), making it the duty of a company administering water as a public use to supply any one with water from its system making a demand therefor and tender in money of the established rates. Just why the rule should be different in a case of that character from that following in actions under a lease of real property may not be apparent, but it is clear that the latest enunciation of this court, as shown by the case of Schumann v. Karrer, supra, supports the action of the trial court in the present action in following the rule of prospective profits.

[5, 6] It was not error on the part of the trial court to overrule appellant's demurrer for uncertainty to respondent's amended complaint. The respondent may have been absent from the leased premises when the appellant took possession of them and still have been residing upon said premises. Residence upon property by a person does not necessarily imply that such person is actually present upon the property during all of the time of his residence thereon.

Appellant claims that the findings do not cover all the issues made by the pleadings, and particularly those arising under its affirmative defense. The court found expressly upon all the issues made by the amended complaint and the denials of the answer. These findings are inconsistent with the allegations of appellant's affirmative defense. They therefore were sufficient, and it was unnecessary to make particular findings as to the issues made by the affirmative allegations of the answer. Saxon v. Buckeye Mfg. Co., 34 Cal. App. 200, 207, 167 P. 174; Kendrick v. Gould, 51 Cal. App. 712, 716, 197 P. 681.

THOMAS et al. v. TOPPINS. (L. A. 9628.)

Continuance ⟹20(1)—Judgment ⟹143(15)—Refusal of continuance for attorney's illness, and refusal to set aside default subsequently entered, held not abuse of discretion.

Refusal of trial court to grant application for continuance, on ground of illness of defendant's attorney, and refusal to vacate default judgment entered by default, after the refusal of continuance, held not abuse of discretion, where application for continuance was not made until the morning of the trial and defendant, after attorney's illness began and after refusal of plaintiff's counsel to allow continuance, appeared to have had sufficient time to provide for attendance of other counsel.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; B. West, Judge.

Action by P. K. Thomas and another against Maggie Toppins. Judgment was entered for plaintiffs by default. From an order denying defendant's motion to vacate judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Bruns & Mooney, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clyde Bishop, of Santa Ana, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This appeal was submitted to the court upon a hearing to show cause, the respondents having presented and filed no brief. The appeal is from an order denying a motion to vacate and set aside a judgment rendered and entered by the trial court upon the failure of the defendant and her counsel to appear at the time fixed for the trial thereof. The facts, as disclosed by the record, show that on August 11, 1926, the date fixed for the trial, the secretary of defendant's attorney appeared to request a continuance thereof, upon the ground of the illness of defendant's said attorney, which request the trial court, under the circumstances then presented to it, refused. The cause then proceeded to trial without the presence of defendant or her attorney, and, upon evidence then taken, the trial court proceeded to render judgment in the plaintiffs' favor. Thereafter, and on the 3d day of September, 1926, the defendant moved to vacate and set aside said judgment, upon the ground of the excusable neglect of the defendant and her counsel, upon the hearing of which motion it was made to appear that on July 19, 1926, and after said cause had been set for trial, the attorney for defendant had become ill, and that thereupon he had caused a request to be made of counsel for the plaintiffs that the trial of the cause be continued to a later date, which favor the plaintiffs' counsel refused to grant. The application for a continuance was not made to the court until the morning of the trial, and was denied by the trial court apparently for the reason that defendant or her counsel had ample time after the latter's illness began, and after the latter was advised that plaintiffs' counsel would not consent to a continuance by reason thereof, to provide for the attendance of other counsel at the trial. We are unable to say, upon the face of the record before us, that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the defendant's belated application for a continuance, or that it was in error in refusing to vacate and set aside its judgment upon the defendant's motion therefor, based upon no other or further facts and circumstances than those which were present at the time the defendant's motion for a continuance of the cause was denied.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

JONES v. BALBOA MOTOR CORPORATION. (L. A. 9508.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 27, 1928.

Purchaser could rescind contract for purchase of stock, where one of conditions of sale was that seller would obtain bona fide subscriptions for 12,500 shares of stock, and should have paid on account thereof the sum of $125,000 in cash or notes on or before four months from date, and seller obtained subscriptions for not more than 600 shares within time agreed upon.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action to rescind contract for the purchase of corporate stock by H. O. Jones against the Balboa Motor Corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. H. Harris, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hill, Morgan & Bledsoe and A. S. Montague, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against it for $10,473.25, in an action brought by plaintiff to rescind a contract for the purchase and sale of certain shares of stock in the defendant company.

The evidence presents some conflicts, but the findings of the trial court are supported by the evidence, and are to the following effect: That on or about the 25th day of August, 1924, plaintiff agreed to buy, and defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff, 1,000 shares of the capital stock of the Balboa Motor Corporation for the sum of $10,000, payable by the delivery by plaintiff to the defendant of five certain bonds, described in the findings and of the par value of $10,473.25. These bonds were delivered to the defendant on August 25, 1924, in full payment for said shares of stock. It was also agreed as one of the conditions of said sale that, unless bona fide subscriptions for 12,500 shares of said stock should have been obtained from responsible subscribers, and there should have been paid on account thereof the sum of $125,000 in cash and notes on or before four months from date, that said agreement between plaintiff and defendant should be deemed to have been canceled and rescinded, and then, and in that event, the said bonds or the par value thereof should be returned to the plaintiff on demand, and it was further agreed that, until said subscribers were so obtained and the said cash and notes so received, the said consideration so agreed to be paid by the plaintiff should be impounded as required by the terms of the permit issued by the corporation commissioner of the state of California to the said defendant.

The said defendant did not receive bona fide subscriptions for 12,500 shares of its capital stock from responsible subscribers, and there was not paid on account thereof the sum of $125,000 in cash or notes within said four months from the said 25th day of August, 1924, and the total bona fide subscriptions received by defendant during said period did not exceed 600 shares, and the said consideration so paid by the plaintiff was not impounded by the defendant.

The sale of said stock was made by the defendant to the plaintiff under and in accordance with a permit issued by the corporation commissioner of the state of California on the 7th day of April, 1924, and the requirements of said permit were in part as follows:

"Each subscription for said shares shall be upon the express condition that unless bona fide subscriptions for 12,500 shares shall have been obtained from responsible subscribers, and there shall have been paid on account thereof the sum of $125,000 in cash and notes, on or before the 15th day of October, 1924, such subscription may by such subscriber be, and thereupon shall be, deemed to have been rescinded.

"That the full amount of each cash payment shall be paid and all notes delivered to said applicant; and that each cash payment, less the commission authorized herein, and the notes, and a statement showing the full name and address of each subscriber, and the number of shares subscribed for by each subscriber, shall immediately be paid and delivered by the applicant to, and held as an escrow by, a depositary to be first selected by the applicant and approved by said commissioner. If on or before the date set forth on paragraph 1 of this condition there shall have been deposited with such depositary from such subscriptions the net sum of $100,000 in cash and notes, it shall be paid and delivered by the depositary to the applicant upon its demand therefor and the written order of said commissioner; otherwise, all rights of applicant to sell and issue shares under paragraph 2nd hereof are suspended, and each note executed by a subscriber and the amount of cash paid by him, less the commission herein authorized and paid, being the amount of cash so deposited with said depositary, shall be returned to him upon his demand therefor and his subscription shall be cancelled."

On or about the 26th day of November, 1924, the plaintiff notified the said defendant of his intention to rescind said agreement of purchase, and demanded the return of said bonds, or the par value thereof, and at the same time tendered to said defendant the certificates representing the 1,000 shares of the capital stock of the defendant corporation previously issued to the plaintiff, and subsequent to the 25th day of December, 1924, the plaintiff made a similar tender of said capital stock, and demanded the return of said bonds, or the par value thereof, but the defendant refused to deliver said bonds to plaintiff, and refused to pay to said plaintiff the par value thereof.

It is contended that the plaintiff did not deal with the Balboa Motor Corporation, but that he bought privately owned stock. While there is some testimony in the record to sustain this contention, the preponderance of the evidence is clearly in accord with the findings of the trial court upon this subject.

[1, 2] It is also urged that while the permit granted by the corporation commissioner allowed only until October 15, 1924, for the completion of the sale of the stock mentioned therein, the contract of the plaintiff was conditioned upon the sale of said amount of stock within four months from the date thereof (August 25, 1924), and under such contract the defendant was not in default in November, 1924. However, the court has found that the plaintiff tendered back the stock subsequent to December 25, 1924, and it is clear that at that time the defendant was in default under its contract with the plaintiff, for it could take no legal subscriptions of stock after October 15, 1924, the date set forth in the permit, and it appears from the evidence and from the findings of the trial court that only about 600 shares had been sold at that date.

The plaintiff, therefore, recovers, under his pleadings and proof, because of the breach of the contract between himself and the defendant company. He is not relying upon any breach of the conditions of the corporation commissioner's permit, and the case of Domenigoni v. Imp. Live Stock & Mortgage Co., 189 Cal. 467, 209 P. 36, relied upon by appellant, is not in point.

SACRE v. IMPERIAL WATER CO. NO. 3 et al. (L. A. 9894.) ★

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 22, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 21, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ⚷907(3)—Appeal being on judgment roll, Supreme Court assumes that evidence sustained finding on which judgment was based.

Appeal being on judgment roll, where it was found that certain defendants, sued to determine ownership of shares of capital stock in mutual water company, were owners thereof, and that stock was not appurtenant to plaintiff's land, Supreme Court must assume that evidence in case fully sustained the findings on which judgment was based, that such defendants were purchasers of stock in question, and that plaintiff had no interest other than that which might inferentially arise from fact that he was owner of the land to which the stock certificate referred.

2. Appeal and error ⚷907(3)—Appeal being on judgment roll, Supreme Court assumes lower court had before it evidence sufficient to support more explicit finding than made, where necessary to support judgment.

Appeal being on judgment roll, Supreme Court must assume, where necessary to support judgment for defendants, not only that evidence fully sustained findings that plaintiff, suing to determine ownership to shares of capital stock in mutual water corporation, was not the owner thereof, but that trial court had before it stated facts which would have justified more explicit finding that severance had been created between said stock certificate and land to which it referred, or that the plaintiff, while remaining owner of land, had either failed to acquire or had ceased to have any interest in the stock certificate.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Lou M. Sacre against the Imperial Water Company No. 3 and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Harry W. Horton, of El Centro, for appellant.

H. H. Myers, of Calipatria, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This appeal was submitted upon an order to show cause, the respondents having presented and filed no brief. The appeal is on the judgment roll. The action was instituted by the plaintiff to determine the ownership of 150 shares of the capital stock of the defendant Imperial Water Company No. 3, as represented by stock certificate No. 423. The plaintiff alleged that the Imperial Water Company was at all the times mentioned in said complaint a mutual water company organized for the purpose of owning and operating a system of irrigation canals and distributing water for irrigation and domestic purposes to its stockholders upon lands irrigable from its canals, upon which said stockholders have located sufficient stock of said company entitling them to water; and that by the by-laws of the corporation it was provided that water should only be furnished and sold to owners of its capital stock, and that such stock shall be appurtenant to the land described in the certificate. The plaintiff further alleges that the real property of which he alleges himself to be the owner is described in said certificate No. 423, and that it is, therefore, appurtenant to plaintiff's said land, and, as a consequence, he is entitled to have his title thereto quieted. The defendants Chalupnik and Sharon deny that the plaintiff is the owner of said shares of capital stock of said corporation, or that the same is appurtenant to the plaintiff's said land or any portion thereof. The trial court found that the said corporation was a mutual water company, and that its by-laws contained the provision set forth in plaintiff's complaint, and that the plaintiff was the owner of the tract of land referred to in the certificate for said shares of stock. The court, however, further found that said stock was purchased and paid for by the defendants Chalupnik, and that they were the owners thereof, and that the aforesaid stock was not appurtenant to plaintiff's said land. Judgment was thereupon ordered and entered in favor of the defendants, and from such judgment this appeal was taken.

[1, 2] The appeal being upon the judgment roll, we must assume that the evidence in the case fully sustained the findings of the trial court, to the effect that the defendants Chalupnik were the purchasers and owners of the stock in question, and that the plaintiff had no interest therein other than that which might inferentially arise from the fact that he was the owner of the land to which said certificate of stock referred as being the land to which the water right represented thereby was appurtenant. We must assume, therefore, that the trial court had before it a state of facts which would have justified a more explicit finding that a severance had been created between said stock certificate and the land in question, whereby the plaintiff, while remaining the owner of the land, had either failed to acquire or had ceased to have any interest in said stock certificate. This being so, and the plaintiff having chosen to rely upon the judgment roll, we are unable to say therefrom that the aforesaid finding of the trial court was not justified by the evidence before it. If so justified, said finding is sufficient to uphold the judgment in the defendant's favor.

COLEY v. HECKER et al. (Sac. 3992.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 26, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑916(3)—Allegations of complaint must be taken as true on appeal from order denying demand for change of place of trial.

On appeal from order denying demand for change of place of trial, allegations of complaint must be taken as true.

2. Libel and slander 🔑139—Owner of slandered title may sue in county where realty is situated as involving determination of interest in property and injury to property (Code Civ. Proc. § 392).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 392, owner of slandered title may bring action in county where real property is situated on theory that action is one in which determination of owner's right or interest therein is properly adjudicated, and since slander of title is injury to real property.

3. Venue 🔑5(4)—Venue of action to recover damages for filing judgment after obtaining stay bond on appeal and to remove lien created held properly brought in county of realty (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 392, 674).

Where defendant filed abstract of judgment after enforcement of judgment had been stayed by giving of undertaking on appeal prior to filing judgment which became lien on realty of plaintiff in county of realty under Code Civ. Proc. § 674, action for damages for slander of title by filing of judgment, essence of which was the removal of lien, was properly brought in county in which realty was situated under section 392.

4. Quieting title 🔑50—Damages for injury to realty held incident to action to remove cloud wrongfully cast on property by filing judgment after enforcement was stayed.

Damages for injury to real property are incident to action to remove cloud cast on plaintiff's property by filing of abstract of judgment, enforcement of which had been stayed by giving of undertaking on appeal prior to filing of judgment; damages being proximate result of alleged wrongful act.

5. Action 🔑53(1)—Action for damages for malicious conduct is not split because dual relief may be properly or improperly sought.

That damages are demanded for maliciously doing act from which injury is necessary consequence does not split action into separate causes of action merely because dual relief may be properly or improperly sought, especially in actions sounding in trespass.

6. Libel and slander 🔑130—"Slander of title" includes both spoken and written means by which right of property may be invaded.

Term "slander of title" includes both spoken and written means by which right of property may be invaded, and right of action exists, irrespective of means by which title is traduced.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Slander of Title.]

7. Libel and slander 🔑130—Property right may be invaded by language concerning it, and such language is actionable.

Right in property may be invaded by language concerning property, and, when invasion occurs, language which affects property is actionable.

8. Venue 🔑5(5)—"Injury to property," action for which may be brought in county in which property is situated, is not limited to physical injury to realty (Code Civ. Proc. § 392).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 392, term "injury to property," action for which may be brought in county in which real property is located, is not limited to physical interference with or physical injury to real property.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Injury to Property.]

9. Trespass 🔑10—Trespass to realty may be committed by indirect injuries as well as by direct and forcible injuries.

Trespass to realty may be committed by consequential and indirect injuries as well as by direct and forcible injuries.

10. Libel and slander 🔑130—Libel to property by malicious recording of judgment held continuing, permanent notice to world of judgment lien against property.

In action involving libel of title to property by malicious recording of abstract of judgment falsely asserting interest in property and decreasing its value, libel constituted continuing, permanent notice to world that judgment lien rested on property, and was communicated to entire purchasing public.

11. Libel and slander 🔑139—Petition for damages by malicious recording of judgment held to state action for slander of title and not abuse of process.

Petition to recover damages for malicious recording of abstract of judgment falsely asserting interest in property after enforcement of judgment had been stayed by giving undertaking on appeal held not to state action for abuse of process rather than slander of title, and did not require venue of action in county of defendant's residence rather than in county in which property was located.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Action by J. A. Coley against Barbara Hecker and another. From an order of the Supreme Court of San Joaquin County denying demand for change of place of trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

For former opinion, see 268 P. 626.

Dean Cunha, of San Francisco, for appellants.

George F. McNoble, Stanley M. Arndt, and McNoble & Arndt, all of Stockton, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. A hearing in bank was ordered in this cause after a decision thereof by department 1 of this court. Upon a further consideration of the cause upon such hearing we are satisfied with the decision of the department, and hereby adopt the same as the decision of the court in bank. Said decision reads as follows:

This appeal is from an order denying the demand of appellants for a change of the place of trial from the county of San Joaquin, in which county the action was commenced, to the place of the residence of the respective appellants, to wit, the city and county of San Francisco. It is the contention of respondent that the action is one to remove a cloud upon his real property and for the determination of an interest in said real property, situate in said county of San Joaquin, and that the venue is, under the provisions of section 392, Code of Civil Procedure, where said real property is situated.

The only papers offered upon the hearing in support of the motion were the complaint and the demurrers of the respective appellants, general and special.

[1] In considering the appeal, the allegations of the complaint must be taken as true. The allegations of the complaint are to the effect that respondent was the owner of a large number of lots, pieces, and parcels of land situate in said county of San Joaquin; that on May 18, 1925, and while he was and continued to be such owner, one Barbara Hecker recovered in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco a judgment in the sum of $12,925.73 and costs against him and his cosurety, J. L. Craig, upon an appeal bond jointly executed by them, with one Walter F. Hogan as principal. On May 19, 1925, respondent and said Craig took an appeal from said judgment by filing in the office of the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco a notice of appeal, and entering into a written undertaking on appeal in the sum of $26,000 to stay the execution of said judgment with two sureties, and on said day notified appellants herein that said undertaking had been filed. On May 21, 1925, said appellants served upon respondent, J. A. Coley, and his cosurety, J. L. Craig, notice of exception to said sureties. Five days thereafter, to wit, May 26, 1925, said respondent, Coley, and Craig served upon appellants notice of justification of sureties, and filed said notice on the same day in the office of the county clerk of said city and county of San Francisco. The time therein fixed for justification was May 28, 1925. On the day last above mentioned one of the original sureties and a third person, who was substituted in place of the other original surety, appeared and justified before a judge of the superior court of said city and county of San Francisco upon a written undertaking, as required by law, in the sum of $300 for costs, and in more than double the amount named in said judgment, to wit, the sum of $26,000. Said undertaking was then and there, in the presence of Harry I. Stafford, the agent and attorney for appellant Barbara Hecker, regularly approved by said judge of the superior court. Said appellants were, on said May 28, 1925, regularly notified that said undertaking staying execution had been filed, and that said sureties had justified, and that said bond had been approved by said judge of the superior court.

It is next alleged that on the day following the filing of said stay bond, to wit, May 29, 1925, appellants, acting maliciously, and with the evil purpose of vexing and annoying respondent, and slandering the title to all lands owned by him in the county of San Joaquin, and clouding the title thereto, recorded in the office of the county recorder of San Joaquin county an abstract of judgment in said action, well knowing that said abstract of judgment was inoperative, and of no legal effect, by reason of the filing of said undertaking in said city and county of San Francisco, and that said appellants well knew said abstract of judgment, when filed by them, would be a cloud upon, and a slander against, all the lands owned, or which might thereafter be owned, by respondent situate in said county of San Joaquin. It is further alleged that the recordation of said abstract of judgment decreased the value of said real property and rendered it unmarketable to the damage of respondent in the sum of $26,000.

As an additional damage, respondent alleged that appellants, in recording said abstract of judgment, were moved by malice and a desire to oppress him, and as a penalty therefor he prayed for punitive and exemplary damages in the sum of $25,000. The prayer of the complaint is that appellants be required to set forth the nature of their claims; that it be decreed and adjudged that appellants have no interest or estate in said lands situate in San Joaquin county, and that respondent's title be decreed to be valid in all respects; that appellants be enjoined from asserting any title thereto adverse to respondent; that the recordation of said abstract of judgment recorded in the county of San Joaquin be canceled, and declared null and void, and for general relief.

The first and principal point presented by appellants is that, respondent having joined a real and personal action, to wit, an action to quiet title to real property with an action to recover for slander of title, did thereby lose his right to hold the case in the county where the real property was situate. This contention is based upon the claim that an action for the recovery of damages for slander of title sounds in personal action, and does not bring the venue within the purview of section 392, Code of Civil Procedure. Said section provides:

"Actions for the following causes must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial, as provided in this code:

"1. For the recovery of real property, or of an estate or interest therein, or for the determination in any form, of such right or interest, and for injuries to real property; * * *

"3. For the foreclosures of all liens and mortgages on real property."

[2, 3] We think the language of the section clearly justifies the construction that the owner of the slandered title is given the right to bring and maintain the action in the county where the real property is situated, upon the theory that the action is one in which the determination of the owner's right or interest therein is properly adjudicated, and for the additional reason that slander of title is an injury to real property. It is difficult to discern a single consideration which may be assigned as the legislative reason for the adoption of the Code section as to the venue of actions affecting the ownership of an interest in real property that may not with equal force be applied to actions to recover damages for injury for the false and malicious disparagement of the owner's title by another, a wrong which has by use become a recognized phase of the law known as "slander of title." By the filing of the abstract of judgment, duly certified by the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco, said judgment became a lien upon all the real property of the respondent, not exempt from execution, situate in said county of San Joaquin. Section 674, Code Civ. Proc. The enforcement of the judgment had been stayed by the giving of an undertaking on appeal prior to the time said abstract of judgment was filed by appellants, a fact, according to the allegations of the complaint, well known to them, and which was not stated in said abstract of judgment. Prima facie a lien exceeding the sum of $26,000 at once fastened itself upon respondent's San Joaquin county real property. As another ground supporting the intention of the Legislature to cover by said section 392, supra, and fix the venue of all actions wherein title to real property may be affected, it is provided that an action to foreclose liens upon real property must be tried in the county in which the real property is situate. To remove the lien, which constitutes the essence of the injury complained against, the venue of the action would necessarily be in the county in which the real property affected thereby is situate.

[4, 5] Damages for injury to the real property are but an incident to the action to remove the cloud wrongfully cast upon respondent's real property by the filing of said abstract of judgment. It is the proximate result of an alleged wrongful act. The fact that damages are demanded for maliciously doing an act from which an injury is the necessary consequence does not split the action into two separate causes of action merely because dual relief may be properly or improperly sought. And this is especially true where the cause of action sounds in trespass. Gomez v. Reed et al., 178 Cal. 759, 174 P. 658.

[6, 7] The phrase "slander of title" is a figure of speech in which the title is personified. In the instant case, the phrase seems to be an anomaly as applied to a situation which, strictly speaking, is a libel upon the title, inasmuch as the damage was accomplished by the recordation of a written document, and no spoken words were uttered. However, the term "slander of title" includes both spoken and written means by which the right of property may be invaded and a right of action exists, irrespective of the means by which the title is traduced. This is so because a property right has been invaded—an injury to real property has been sustained. "Persons may have a right in or to a thing—the right of property—and this right may be invaded by language concerning the thing. When this invasion occurs the language which affects a thing is actionable." Edwards v. Burris, 60 Cal. 157, and authorities cited; Fearon v. Fodera et al., 169 Cal. 370, 148 P. 200, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 312.

[8] It is appellants' contention that, by the term "injury to property," as used in section 392, supra, it was intended to include only physical interference with, or physical injury to, real property, such as waste, or some sort of physical trespass committed upon the lands, and that the term was not intended to be as broadly applied as its meaning would seem to imply. In addition to the construction which we feel constrained to place upon said section, and which is supported by the construction given to practically the same language by the Supreme Court of Louisiana in Labarre v. Burton-Swartz, etc., Co., 126 La. 982, 53 So. 113, to the effect that slander of title is an actual intrusion upon one's property, and is in the "nature of a trespass, a real action to protect property," our conclusion is further fortified by eminent authority holding that a libel written or published in disparagement of title is in the nature of an action to trespass on the case. "The term 'injury to real property' is in itself a wider and less technical term than 'trespass to real property.' As applied to questions of venue, it has been declared to embrace every wrong which in legal contemplation is an injury to real property, not only the direct and forcible injury, but consequential injuries, and threatened injuries to land, and even a mere nonfeasance, as permissive waste." 40 Cyc. 74; 17 R. C. L. 454.

[9] The trend of decisions of this court is generally in accord with the doctrine, whenever the question has come before it, that trespasses may be committed by consequential and indirect injuries as well as by direct and forcible injuries. Appellants cite Monk v. Ehret, 192 Cal. 186, 219 P. 452, as a case supporting by analogy the view that the term "injuries to real property" should be interpreted as affecting a physical injury to real property only. Monk v. Ehret had to do largely with "injuries to persons," considered with reference to a Code amendment adopted to meet a situation brought about by the increasing use of motor vehicles, as in said case pointed out, and was intended to apply to a trespass based upon false imprisonment. We are satisfied that the Monk Case is not in conflict or inconsistent with the conclusion reached in the instant case.

[10] Burkett v. Griffith, 90 Cal. 532, 27 P. 527, 13 L. R. A. 707, 25 Am. St. Rep. 151, liberally quoted from by appellants, cannot be regarded as an authority ruling the facts of the instant case. In Burkett v. Griffith, supra, the slander consisted of false and malicious statements made by the defendant concerning certain property of the plaintiff. It is therein said that:

"In order to show that the words uttered have caused injury to the plaintiff, it is generally necessary to aver and show that they were uttered pending some treaty or public auction for the sale of the property, and that thereby some intending purchaser was prevented from bidding or competing. * * * If the plaintiff has merely a general intention to sell, or if the words uttered do not reach any intending purchaser, or if they do not prevent any sale, * * * the plaintiff does not suffer any damage from their utterance."

There the words were merely spoken and were transitory, but in the instant case the libel was recorded in the office of the county recorder where the land was situate, and constituted a continuing, permanent notice to the world that a judgment lien to the extent of more than $12,000 rested upon respondent's real property. In the instant case the libel or slander was communicated to the entire purchasing public. The allegation of the complaint that the malicious recording of said abstract of judgment falsely asserting an interest in said property decreased the value of said real estate and rendered it less marketable is obviously true.

[11] Appellants further contend that the recording of the abstract of judgment, if it gives rise to any cause of action, is one for malicious abuse of process, and consequently is a personal action, the venue of which is at appellants' place of residence. We think there is no merit in the contention that the facts alleged state an action for the abuse of process rather than slander of title. It was the filing, maliciously and falsely, of a document which clouded the title of respondent that caused the injury. The effect would be the same had said document been a forged deed, rather than an unauthorized abstract of judgment. In either event, no question of abuse of process would be involved.

The order is affirmed.

BLALOCK v. DUNGER. (Sac. 4106.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1928.

1. Trial ⚷397(1)—Issue as to recovery of possession of real property held triable before jury as matter of right, making findings regarding issue unnecessary (Code Civ. Proc. § 592).

Where trial by jury as to recovery of possession of property was not waived, that issue was triable before jury as matter of right, under Code Civ. Proc. § 592, making findings as to that branch of case unnecessary.

2. Judgment ⚷201—Findings of referee, order of reference as to accounting being general and unlimited, were sufficient upon which to base judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 644).

Where order of reference as to accounting in action to recover possession of real property and for an accounting involving accounting of merchandise business conducted on property was general and unlimited, findings of referee under Code Civ. Proc. § 644, were sufficient upon which to base judgment of court.

3. Appeal and error ⚷1037—That affidavit of service did not aver residence of plaintiff's attorneys if irregular held harmless, where it raised inference as to residence.

Affidavit of service not making specific averment where attorneys for plaintiff resided, if irregular, held to work no harm, where it was sufficient to raise inference that they resided in certain city.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by Ugene U. Blalock against Walter L. Dunger, also known as W. L. Dunger, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

C. W. Braswell, of Long Beach, for appellants.

Ugene U. Blalock, of Porterville, pro se.

SHENK, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover possession of certain real property and for an accounting involving the conduct of a merchandise business on the property. The issue of the right to the possession of real property was submitted to a jury, which returned a verdict for the plaintiff. The court made a general order of reference as to the issues involved in the accounting. Thereafter the referee made and submitted his report to the court, finding that all of the defendants were indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $226.21. No exceptions were taken to the findings of the referee, and judgment was entered on the verdict for the possession of the real property and for the plaintiff against all of the defendants for the amount found by the referee to be due to the plaintiff. All of the defendants appeal from the judgment.

[1, 2] It is contended by the defendants (1) that no findings of fact and conclusions of law were made and filed by the court; (2) that the judgment is a departure from the pleadings; and (3) that the proof of service of the cost bill was insufficient.

Trial by jury as to recovery of possession of the real property was not waived. Consequently that issue was triable before the jury as matter of right (section 592, Code Civ. Proc.), and no findings were necessary as to that branch of the case. Reiner v. Schroeder, 146 Cal. 411, 80 P. 517. The order of reference as to the accounting was general and unlimited. Under this state of the record the findings of the referee were sufficient upon which to base the judgment of the court. Section 644, Code Civ. Proc.; Weavering v. Schneider, 52 Cal. App. 181, 198 P. 418.

The plaintiff concedes that the judgment is erroneous and unsupported in so far as it orders a recovery of the sum of $226.21 as against all of the defendants. The judgment as to that sum should be had from the defendant Walter L. Dunger only. Modification of the judgment in that respect, therefore, becomes necessary. The judgment for costs in the trial court should, however, run against all of the defendants.

[3] Service of the cost bill in the sum of $571.20 was by mail. The affidavit of the service was made by a stenographer in the office of the attorneys for the plaintiff at Porterville. The then attorneys for the defendants resided at Lindsay. There was no specific averment in the affidavit of service that the attorneys for the plaintiff resided at Porterville. But there was sufficient in the affidavit upon which to infer that the attorneys for the plaintiff resided at Porterville. It is not claimed by the defendants that the memorandum of costs was not received by them in due course of mail, and the irregularity, if any, worked no harm to the defendants.

The judgment is modified by limiting the recovery of the sum of $226.21 to the defendant Walter L. Dunger, the costs in the trial court to be recovered from all of the defendants. As so modified, the judgment is affirmed, each party to bear his own costs on appeal.

DARROW v. HOULIHAN et al.

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1928.

1. Brokers ⚷63(1)—Broker securing acceptance of exchange offer was entitled to commission, where defendants abandoned transaction, unless exchange agreement was secured by fraud.

Under defendants' agreement to pay broker commission upon his securing acceptance of proposition to exchange, and under agreement that if either party failed to carry out his part in contemplated exchange broker should receive commission on aggregate exchange value of property from defaulting party, broker was entitled to commission on securing written acceptance of defendants' offer, where defendants abandoned transaction, unless agreement of exchange was secured by fraud.

2. Evidence ⚷434(11)—Parol evidence that written exchange agreement was induced by fraudulent representations held admissible in broker's action for commission.

Parol evidence that agreement of exchange in its inception was tainted with fraud, and that its execution was induced by fraudulent representations, held admissible in broker's action for commission, despite written contract.

3. Brokers ⚷65(1)—Broker's false representations regarding incumbrances on property to be exchanged did not preclude recovery of commission, where defendants abandoned transaction before time specified for the other's conveyance.

That broker falsely represented to defendants that property to be exchanged was incumbered with mortgage of $2,000, due in about six months, did not preclude recovery of commission, where exchange agreement provided that the other party had 60 days to comply with its provisions and defendants abandoned transaction on day following acceptance of exchange agreement without giving broker 60 days in which to procure necessary incumbrances to be executed.

Action by M. F. Darrow against J. P. Houlihan and another for real estate broker's commission. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Superseding opinion, 268 P. 455.

Duckworth & Harrison, T. W. Duckworth, and Ben Harrison, all of San Bernardino, for appellant.

W. F. Lewis, of Redlands, for respondents.

WASTE, C. J. Plaintiff prosecutes this appeal from an adverse judgment entered in an action brought to recover $600 broker's commissions alleged to be due him for his services in attempting to effect an exchange of properties between defendants and W. S. and Lillian M. Little. On August 19, 1924, the defendants in writing authorized the plaintiff to negotiate an exchange of their property for that of the Littles, the offer to remain open for a period of ten days. It was stipulated in the agreement that each of the exchanging parties was to assume an "indebtedness" of $2,000 on the property received in the event the exchange was consummated. The exchange value of the respective properties was fixed at $6,000. A period of 60 days from the acceptance of the offer was to be allowed the Littles for the furnishing of a deed and certificate of title. The writing provided for the payment to plaintiff of the regular brokerage commission when he had secured an acceptance of the proposition to exchange on the specified terms. It was further provided that plaintiff might act as agent for and receive a commission from the Littles. The final stipulation of the writing was that in the event defendants' offer of exchange was accepted by the Littles, and either party should thereafter fail to comply with the terms of the agreement, the regular brokerage commission on the aggregate exchange value of the properties was to be paid by the defaulting party. Plaintiff seasonably secured the Littles' written acceptance of and consent to the terms and conditions of the offer. On the day following such acceptance the defendants refused to consummate the exchange, though the Littles had, in the meantime, placed their papers in escrow.

By way of defense to this action for commissions on the aggregate exchange value of the properties, defendants aver that plaintiff, prior to the making of their written offer of exchange, falsely represented to them that the property of the Littles was incumbered with a mortgage of $2,000, due in about six months, when in truth the incumbrance was in the form of a trust deed, payable at the rate of $25 a month, upon which there remained $1,000 unpaid.

[1] Unless the agreement of exchange was secured by fraud, the plaintiff was entitled to the agreed commission upon securing the Littles' written acceptance of defendants' offer, even though the exchange were never actually consummated. Jauman v. McCusick, 166 Cal. 517, 522, 137 P. 254; Backman v. Guadalupe Realty Co., 78 Cal. App. 347, 352, 248 P. 296; Watson v. Duarte, 62 Cal. App. 52, 55, 215 P. 1039; Kells v. Pearson, 56 Cal. App. 502, 506, 205 P. 888; Goodrich v. Turney, 44 Cal. App. 516, 520, 186 P. 806; Jennings v. Jordan, 31 Cal. App. 335, 337, 160 P. 576. This conclusion flows from the agreement to pay plaintiff a commission upon his securing the Littles' "acceptance" of the "proposition to exchange." The parties by the employment of this particular language, as well as that appearing in the final paragraph of the written offer, wherein it is provided that plaintiff in the event either party should fail to carry out his part in the contemplated exchange was to receive the agreed commission on the aggregate exchange value of the properties from the defaulting party, very clearly and definitely gave expression to their intention that plaintiff was not to lose or forfeit such compensation by virtue of the failure of the parties to consummate the transaction. As stated in Jauman v. McCusick, supra, defendants "agreed to pay a commission for securing a specific agreement. Such agreement having been secured [they were] liable under the precise terms of [their] contract."

[2] The trial court permitted the defendants to introduce parol evidence in support of their separate defense in which it was alleged that the agreement of exchange, in its inception, was tainted with fraud, and that its execution was induced by fraudulent representations. Such evidence was admissible in support of that theory despite the written contract. Watson v. Duarte, supra, page 55 of 62 Cal. App. (215 P. 1039); Colt v. Freitas, 76 Cal. App. 278, 284, 285, 244 P. 916; Mooney v. Cyriacks, 185 Cal. 70, 80, 195 P. 922; Whiting v. Squeglia, 70 Cal. App. 108, 114, 232 P. 986; Odson v. Swanson, 70 Cal. App. 279, 282, 233 P. 354; Blackwell v. Thomasson (Cal. App.) 258 P. 724; American Nat. Bank of San Francisco v. A. G. Sommerville, Inc., 191 Cal. 364, 371, 216 P. 376.

[3] It is equally well settled, however, that fraud, unproductive of injury, "will not justify a rescission, nor support an action either for rescission or damages. * * *" Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 388, 92 P. 1011, 1014. Although the trial court found, upon substantial evidence, that the plaintiff, by virtue of certain false representations, had induced the defendants to sign the written offer of exchange, such finding does not necessarily prove fatal to the plaintiff's recovery. It is not shown, nor have the defendants attempted to show, that had the 60-day period allowed to the Littles by the exchange agreement to comply with its provisions been permitted to elapse the defendants would not have received that for which they had bargained and upon the exact terms and conditions specified. The respondents assert in their brief that "appellant as broker was to adjust the values by procuring the necessary incumbrances to be executed before the exchange was actually to be consummated." How, it may be asked, was plaintiff to perform these services asserted to have been required of him when the defendants by their immediate and premature abandonment of the agreement to exchange put it beyond his power to do so? It is no sufficient answer to say that plaintiff should have alleged in his complaint an excuse for nonperformance rather than performance upon his part of all conditions precedent. It cannot now be said that the Littles' property would not have come to the defendants within or at the expiration of the period fixed in the agreement, subject to a mortgage incumbrance in the sum of $2,000. The plaintiff, if he had not been precluded by defendants' abandonment of the transaction, might have made, with the assistance of the Littles, all necessary adjustments prior to the expiration of the period fixed by the exchange agreement.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is reversed.

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1928.

Mechanics' liens 🔑281(3)—Evidence held to support finding that purchaser of materials was owner's agent (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183).

In action for foreclosure of mechanic's lien, evidence held to support finding that plumbing company purchasing supplies from plaintiff was contractor or subcontractor and owner's agent, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Action by the George H. Tay Company against M. H. Bremser and others for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant M. H. Bremser appeals. Affirmed.

Ralph H. Lewis, of Sacramento, for appellant.

John C. March, of Sacramento, and Walton C. Webb, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff in an action for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien.

At the time mentioned herein the plaintiff was in the plumbing supply business. The defendant Bremser was the owner of the real property located at 2908 G street in the city of Sacramento. Shortly prior to January, 1926, Bremser entered into a contract with one Pattiani for certain repairs and improvements on said property. From January 2 to April 8, 1926, the plaintiff sold to one Hardt certain plumbing fixtures and supplies, which it is conceded were installed in the building of the defendant Bremser. Hardt was transacting business under the name of General Plumbing Company. Two issues were presented to the trial court. The first was whether the lien of the plaintiff was filed in time, and the second whether Hardt purchased the plumbing material as the agent of the owner. The court resolved both issues in favor of the plaintiff.

On the appeal it is not contended that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding that the notice of lien was timely filed. The sole question for our determination is whether the evidence was sufficient to support the finding that Hardt was the agent of the owner as contemplated by section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is conceded by the parties that if Hardt was merely a materialman, who was not in law the agent of the owner, the purchase by Hardt of plumbing material and supplies from another, such as the plaintiff in this case, would give the latter no right to a lien. It is also conceded that if Hardt was in the position of a subcontractor the lien of the plaintiff would be effectual.

We think the evidence was sufficient to support the finding that Hardt was either a contractor or a subcontractor. The permit issued by the city authorizing the work and labor to be done was taken out under the name of F. T. Hardt, as plumbing contractor, and A. W. Pattiani, as building contractor. An assistant plumbing inspector of the city testified that during the progress of the plumbing work he went upon the job and directed one of Hardt's employees who was then and there engaged in plumbing work to do certain work in a manner satisfactory to the inspector. There was additional evidence that Hardt was the plumbing contractor and not merely a materialman. Under this showing the finding of the court that Hardt was the agent of the owner may not be disturbed.

During the course of the trial the court was endeavoring to ascertain, by questions propounded to counsel, the relationship of the several parties to the action. The appellant has singled out an answer of counsel for the plaintiff, in response to a question by the court, from which it is sought to show that the plaintiff, through its counsel, admitted that Hardt was a "material jobber" and was not engaged to install the plumbing. The concession that Hardt was a "material jobber" would not alone, when the entire record is considered, be sufficient upon which to base the conclusion that the plaintiff had stipulated itself out of court on this vital point. The trial court obviously did not deem the answer of counsel as having such effect. Counsel for the plaintiff has at all times disclaimed any such intention, and we cannot ascribe to his so-called admission any such disastrous result.

Bicksler, Smith & Parke, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hardy, Elliott & Aberle, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] This appeal was submitted upon an order to show cause, no respondent's brief being on file and none having been presented or filed pursuant to said order. The action was for divorce. The cause was tried upon its merits. At the conclusion of the trial the court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law in the plaintiff's favor, wherein it awarded her the custody of the minor children, and in so doing directed the defendant to pay to the plaintiff for the support of said children the sum of $60 per month "subject to the further order of this court to modify, diminish or increase the allowance as the needs of said children may require." The trial court in a further finding directed an allowance of alimony to plaintiff in the sum of $40 per month "until the 1st day of January, 1928, on which last named date the payment of said alimony for the support of the plaintiff shall forever cease." The plaintiff appealed from this latter order as to alimony which was in terms carried into the interlocutory decree. The appeal is taken from the judgment roll alone and is based solely upon the ground that the limitation which the trial court imposed upon the payment of alimony to the plaintiff was one which it had no power to make. There is no merit in this contention nor in this appeal based solely thereon. The discretion of the trial court to award or refuse to award alimony in a divorce action is one which is to be exercised in view of the evidence presented in each particular case. In this case no evidence is presented, the appeal being upon the judgment roll. We must therefore assume that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court, and it is evident that the findings were sufficient to support the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

ANDREWS et al. v. WALDO.

STEINBERG v. SAME.

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1928.

1. Brokers 🔑57(2)—Acceptance providing cash payment 30 days after notice of owner's readiness to convey and mortgage payable "on or before" date specified held variance from offer requiring cash payment and custom requiring payment at expiration of period.

Where brokers were given exclusive agency to sell land at specified price, payable half in cash and balance secured by first mortgage, and brokers' evidence showed that it was customary to cause mortgages to run for full period specified therein, but acceptance of proposed purchaser provided that term of mortgage should be for "on or before three years" from date thereof, and gave purchaser 30 days after notice from owner of ability and readiness to convey by delivery of deed and certificate of title to make required cash payment, brokers were not entitled to commissions, since they failed to procure purchaser on terms specified.

2. Brokers 🔑49(1)—"Sales deposit receipt" held mere "counter offer" and not "acceptance" of owner's terms as respects brokers' right to commission.

"Sales deposit receipt," procured from proposed purchaser by brokers, not purporting on its face to be acceptance of owner's written offer embodied in exclusive brokerage contract nor to be contract executed by brokers under their power of attorney to sell property for owner, but contemplating that owner should sign it before it became operative, held mere counteroffer as respects brokers' right to commission for procuring it.

3. Customs and usages ⚷14—Contrary provisions of contract prevail over known usage (Civ. Code, § 1655).

Under Civ. Code, § 1655, parties who contract as to a subject-matter concerning which known usages prevail incorporate such usages into their agreement by implication only if contract manifests no contrary intention.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; T. A. Norton, Judge.

Separate actions by Charles G. Andrews and other against C. L. Waldo and by Jacob Steinberg against C. L. Waldo. Judgment of nonsuit rendered by the superior court in the first case was reversed with instructions by the District Court of Appeal (265 P. 532), and judgment granting defendant's motion for nonsuit in second case was affirmed (265 P. 536). On hearing in the Supreme Court en banc. Judgments of superior court affirmed.

S. T. Hankey, Wood, Janeway & Pratt, and Janeway, Beach & Pratt, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

William B. Brown, Edmond Nichols, Franklin J. Cole, Walter H. Sprague, and Cole & Sprague, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit in an action for a real estate commission.

On April 17, 1923, the defendant was the owner of certain real property on South Flower street in the city of Los Angeles. On that day he signed what is called an "Exclusive Agency Contract," wherein he listed said property with the plaintiffs and employed them as his exclusive agents for a period of 30 days to negotiate for sale and to sell said property at the price of $60,000, payable "30,000 cash; balance evidenced by a note for $30,000 secured by a first mortgage, interest at 7% per annum, payable quarterly." By this written instrument the defendant further agreed "to sell said property to such purchaser as the agent may procure within the time, for the price and upon the terms aforesaid, and to convey said property to such purchaser by good and sufficient grant deed and to furnish guarantee or continuation guarantee of title thereon," showing title to be in the defendant free and clear of incumbrance except current taxes not yet payable. In the event the plaintiffs should procure a purchaser "as above provided," written notice thereof was to be given to the defendant on or before May 17, 1923, and the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiff the sum of $2,000 as a commission on account of such sale. The last paragraph of the agreement is as follows: "Said agent is hereby appointed the attorney in fact of the undersigned owner, with full power to execute, in the name and on behalf of the undersigned, an agreement of sale of said property with any purchaser obtained within the time, for the price and upon the terms aforesaid, and said agent may retain its said commission out of moneys coming into its possession on account of the purchase price."

On May 17, 1923, the Charles G. Andrews Company, plaintiffs herein, as agents, signed a document called "Sale Deposit Receipt," which in part stated: "Received from Jacob Steinberg the sum of Five Hundred Dollars ($500.00) as deposit and part payment on account of the purchase from C. L. Waldo of the following described property [describing it] this day sold to said Jacob Steinberg which said property said purchaser agrees to buy for the sum of Sixty Thousand Dollars ($60,000), payable as follows: Thirty Thousand Dollars ($30,000) cash (including the amount herein receipted for), upon the execution and delivery of good and sufficient deed covering said property to Jacob Steinberg," together with certificate of title, etc. The receipt then provided that the balance of the purchase price should be evidenced by a note in the sum of $30,000 payable "on or before 3 years from its date" and secured by a first mortgage on the property. Time was made the essence of the contract, and it was further "understood and agreed that the sale of the property, upon the terms herein set forth, shall be agreed to, and accepted by the owner within five (5) days from this date, or the deposit herein receipted for shall be refunded to said purchasers immediately thereafter upon demand. If the price and terms herein set forth are accepted by the owner of said property within said specified time, said owner shall have reasonable time for having guarantee of title to said property made or brought down to date. * * * If the purchaser does not complete the purchase as hereinbefore provided within 30 days after notice from the owner of his ability and readiness to convey said property as herein provided, then the said deposit at the election of said owner shall be forfeited, and it shall thereupon be paid, less the commission of the undersigned agents, to the owner." Insurance and rents were to be prorated and interest credited to close of escrow. The paper was signed by the plaintiffs as "agent." Below the plaintiffs' signature was the following: "I hereby agree to purchase the real property above mentioned and described upon the terms and conditions above set forth. Dated May 17, 1923. (Signed) Jacob Steinberg, purchaser." Below Steinberg's signature was the following: "I hereby agree to sell the real property above mentioned and described at the price and upon the terms set forth in the foregoing instrument and agree to execute and deliver a good and sufficient deed conveying said property to said purchaser in accordance with the provisions thereof. * * *" Immediately thereafter was a line provided for the signature of the owner.

On May 17, 1923, the plaintiffs by letter notified the defendant that they had sold the property to Mr. Steinberg "in accordance with the terms of the agency contract." On the same day the agent of the plaintiffs exhibited to the defendant the "Sales Deposit Receipt" and requested him to sign it on the line provided for the signature of the owner. The defendant refused to sign the contract on the ground that the terms embodied therein did not comply with the terms of the "Exclusive Agency Contract" theretofore signed by him. His refusal to accept or sign the contract was confirmed by him by letter dated May 19, 1923, on the ground that said contract did not comply with the requirements of the listing contract. Again on May 28 the defendant notified Steinberg that the "Sales Deposit Receipt" did not comply with the terms of the contract signed by the defendant and that particulars wherein it did not comply would be received from the defendant's attorney, whose name and adress were given.

Thereafter and on May 24, 1923, the plaintiffs brought this action against the defendant for $2,000 commission. On July 9, 1923, Steinberg brought an action against the defendant for $10,000 damages for breach of contract to sell and convey the property. After issue joined, the causes came on for trial at the same time. Counsel for the parties were the same in both cases. It was stipulated that both causes should be tried together and that all evidence received should be considered as received in either or both where material or relevant to the issues involved therein. Evidence was produced on behalf of the plaintiffs. When the plaintiffs in both cases had rested counsel for the defendant in the present case moved for a nonsuit on the ground that the plaintiffs had failed to prove their case. A ruling on the motion was reserved by the court. Thereafter further evidence was produced both on behalf of the plaintiffs and the defendant. Whereupon the defendant renewed his motion for a nonsuit in the present cause and also moved the court for a nonsuit in the Steinberg Case. The court denied the motion in the Steinberg Case. Findings of fact and conclusions of law and judgment for the defendant were signed and filed in that case. The motion for a nonsuit in the present case was granted. Appeals were taken by the plaintiffs in both cases. In the Steinberg Case, the court found that the terms of the contract known as the "Sales Deposit Receipt" signed by the Andrews Company were not in compliance with the terms of the contract called the "Exclusive Agency Contract," and further found on sufficient evidence as to the value of the property that Steinberg had not been damaged by the defendant's alleged breach of contract, and further found that the defendant was not guilty of bad faith in the transaction. On appeal, the judgment in the Steinberg Case was affirmed on the ground that the finding of the court with reference to the value of the property and consequent failure to prove damage was sustained by the evidence. Steinberg v. Waldo (Cal. App.) 265 P 536. Concurrently the District Court of Appeal (265 P. 532) reversed the judgment in the present case on the ground that the terms of the "Sales Deposit Receipt" were in compliance with the terms of the "Exclusive Agency Contract"; that under the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff in the present case, the defendant was guilty of bad faith in refusing to conclude the transaction, and directed the trial court on the record presented on appeal to prepare findings in favor of the plaintiff in accordance with the views expressed by the District Court of Appeal and to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum prayed for, with interest from May 17, 1923, and costs, referring in its action to the authority granted to courts on appeal by section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, as added by St. 1927, p. 583.

[1] We think the motion for a nonsuit was properly granted. The contract signed by the defendant was a definite offer in writing to sell the property and authorizing the plaintiffs to enter into a binding contract of sale with a purchaser in the name of the defendant. There was much evidence on the part of the plaintiffs as to custom and usage in real estate transactions, and it was endeavored to prove that the terms of the "Sales Deposit Receipt" not found in the "Exclusive Agency Contract" were in accordance with such usage and custom. But in this respect the proof failed of its purpose in at least two respects: First, the evidence showed that it was customary to cause a mortgage such as the one here to be executed to secure the balance of the purchase price to run for a full period of three years and that the definiteness of the period operated to the benefit of the mortgagee in the salability of the note and mortgage. By the terms of the "Sales Deposit Receipt," the term of the note and mortgage to be executed by Steinberg was to be "on or before three years" from their date. Secondly, the contract signed by the defendant specified payment of "$30,000 cash." The contract signed by Steinberg as the proposed purchaser was intended by its terms to give him 30 days from and after notice from the defendant of the latter's ability and readiness to convey the property by delivery of a deed and certificate of title. In other words, Steinberg was to have 30 days after notice from the defendant that the escrow was ready to be closed within which to make the cash payment. There was no evidence that it was customary to allow the purchaser 30 days after notice from the owner that the escrow was ready to be closed to put up the cash payment. The defendant testified, when called as a witness by the plaintiffs under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that the provision of the "Sales Deposit Receipt" delaying the cash payment was the principal reason why he refused to sign that document. Steinberg did not offer to make the cash payment except as specified in the "Sales Deposit Receipt" until many days after the time limit fixed by the "Exclusive Agency Contract" had expired. The reasons advanced by the defendant at the time for his refusal to sign the "Sales Deposit Receipt" were sufficient, we think, to justify the conclusion that he was acting in good faith in the matter and to negative any inference of bad faith which might arise from the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff or from the evidence as a whole.

[2] Further, the "Sales Deposit Receipt" was not, and did not purport on its face to be, an acceptance of the written offer of the defendant as embodied in the "Exclusive Agency Contract." Nor did it purport to be a contract executed by the plaintiffs under their power of attorney and binding on the defendant. In effect it constituted a counter proposition which by its terms was to be agreed to and be signed by the defendant before it should become operative.

[3] When the trial court granted the motion for a nonsuit in the present case, it also granted the motion of defendant's counsel to strike from the record certain evidence relating to custom and usage as to the terms of real estate sales contracts. This ruling is assigned as reversible error. It may not be disputed that parties who contract as to a subject-matter concerning which known usages prevail incorporate such usages into their agreements by implication. Luckehe v. First National Bank of Marysville, 193 Cal. 184, 223 P. 547; Brown v. Central Land Co., 42 Cal. 257, 260; 25 Cal. Jur. p. 420. But by express Code provision stipulations which are necessary to make a contract conformable to usage are implied only in respect to matters concerning which the contract manifests no contrary intention. Section 1655, Civ. Code. In other words, where the known usage and the contract are in conflict the contract prevails. The court was in error in striking out all evidence of usage as to matters not covered by the written contract, but the error will not justify a reversal of the judgment. All of the evidence stricken is in the record before us. If the motion to strike had been denied, the court would have been warranted in granting the motion for a nonsuit by reason of proof of terms in the "Sales Deposit Receipt" which were contrary to usage and because of failure of proof justifying the inclusion in said contract of the provision with reference to the delay in the cash payment.

From a careful examination of the record we are satisfied that the plaintiffs failed to prove that they provided a purchaser ready able, and willing to purchase the property within the time and upon the terms specified by the defendant in his written contract.

After the hearing was granted in this court briefs were filed by the respective parties especially bearing upon the scope and effect of section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1927. This discussion became pertinent because of the conclusion expressed by the District Court of Appeal, with reference to the facts found on the trial, reversing the judgment and directing the trial court to make findings in accordance with the facts found by the District Court of Appeal and to enter judgment for the plaintiffs on such findings.

Our determination of the appeal removes from the case the question of the power of the court on appeal under section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The judgment is affirmed.

VINCENT v. BERRY et al. (Sac. 4081.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 15, 1928.

1. Waters and water courses ⚿152(11)—Judgment precluding taking of water from streams emptying into "or feeding" stream held objectionable, in view of stipulation.

In action to establish prescriptive rights to water, where stipulation provided that defendants should not take water from named creek or any water course emptying into it, judgment restraining defendants from taking water from any water course emptying into "or feeding" the named creek held improper as to defendant whom it was not intended to prevent from taking subsurface or percolating waters.

2. Waters and water courses ⚿152(11)—Judgment restraining defendant from using water, except on land specified, when stipulation permitted use on his lands or elsewhere, should have been made more certain.

Where, in action to establish prescriptive rights to water, stipulation provided that particular defendant might use water on his land or elsewhere, and judgment so provided, but also restrained defendants from using water on real property other than that specified, it should have been more certain as to such defendant's right to use the water elsewhere than on his own land.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by H. C. Vincent against Mrs. Belle Berry and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant A. E. Stegeman and others appeal. Judgment modified as against named defendant, and appeals of other defendants dismissed.

Siemon & Garber, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Guy Knupp, of Porterville, Power & McFadzean, of Visalia, and C. L. Claflin, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. Plaintiff brought this action to establish his prescriptive rights to the use for nonriparian purposes of a certain quantity of the waters of Poso creek, Tulare county, and he named as defendants some 20 or more persons who either owned riparian lands or claimed as appropriators, both above and below his property. A number of the defendants defaulted. The rights of all parties who appeared were finally fixed and determined by a written stipulation filed in the action. Judgment was entered either pursuant to such defaults or to the terms of the stipulation, and, as far as the appealing defendants are concerned, respondent concedes that said judgment must find its support solely in said stipulation of the parties. Three of the four appealing defendants have failed to urge their claims, as they concede that as to them the judgment has sufficient support in said stipulation. Hence there is here before us only the contention of appellant Stegeman that as to him certain provisions of the judgment are broader and more extensive than the terms of the stipulation, and consequently the judgment should be modified to conform to the provisions of the stipulation. The parties do not differ as to the intent and purport of the stipulation as to appellant, but they differ only on the question as to whether the judgment faithfully follows the agreement of the parties.

[1] First, appellant complains that whereas the stipulation provides: "None of said defendants * * * shall * * * take from said Posey Creek, or from any branch thereof, or from any creek, spring, or natural water course emptying in said Posey Creek, any amount of water in excess of the quantities hereinbefore specified * * *," the judgment prohibits and restrains him from so taking water from any creek, spring, or natural water course emptying into or feeding said Poso creek. In other words, in the judgment appear the words "or feeding," which are not contained in the stipulation. Appellant fears that this clause in the judgment might be so construed as to deprive him of the right to use any subsurface or percolating waters which find their way into Poso creek or its tributaries. Respondent concedes that no such restraint was intended by the prohibition placed upon diversion from said creek, and submits that the judgment would not support such a construction of the clause. That is, respondent claims that the words "emptying into" and "feeding" are synonymous as used in the judgment, and the addition of the word "feeding" adds nothing to its injunctive force, nor does it in any way extend its terms or make it more inclusive or burdensome than the stipulation. But we think appellant's fears under this situation may be well founded, for other defendants specially surrendered their rights to claim subterranean and percolating waters in said watershed of Poso creek, and, in defining such surrender, these underground waters were referred to as waters "feeding" said stream.

[2] Secondly, appellant complains that, whereas the stipulation permits use of the water on the land of appellant, or "elsewhere," the judgment contains two clauses restraining him from using the water for any purpose or upon any real property other than that therein specified, thus prohibiting him from changing the place of use of said water. Respondent here likewise concedes that there was no intention of the parties that appellant should be limited in the place of use of said diverted water, and denies that the judgment could be so construed, as the provisions complained of contain the qualifying clauses "other than herein provided" and "other than the use herein specified," and it is therein specified that appellant may use the water upon the said real property, or elsewhere, even though other of the defendants are limited in their use to certain described parcels of land. We can see little reason for confusion on this score, as the judgment follows the stipulation. But no reason exists for not making the meaning doubly certain.

The two following provisions are therefore subjoined to the last paragraph of said judgment, and are hereby made a part thereof and a limitation thereon, to wit: "Provided, that as to the defendant, A. E. Stegeman, his heirs, successors and assigns, nothing herein shall be construed to restrict or curtail any right or claim he may or might otherwise have as the proprietor of the land herein described in or to the underground or percolating waters which drain into said Poso Creek or into any of its branches or tributaries; provided, also, that nothing herein shall be construed to restrict any right the said defendant may or might have to change the place or method of diversion or the place or manner of use of said waters decreed him in as full and ample a manner as any prescriptive owner thereof might lawfully do."

The appeals of defendants A. E. Guhl, J. F. Burton, and Anna M. Burton are hereby dismissed.

The judgment as modified is affirmed, appellant to recover costs.

We concur: CURTIS, J.; SEAWELL, J.

HESTER v. O'DARA. (L. A. 9201.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 21, 1928.

Costs ⚷260(4)—Appeal from $26 judgment for trespass in removing garden plants and digging sewer trench held spite appeal, warranting $100 penalty.

Appeal from judgment awarding $26 damages, for trespass in removing garden plants from, and digging sewer trench across, plaintiff's land, held so evidently a spite appeal as to warrant imposition of $100 penalty, in view of amount involved and sufficiency of evidence quoted in appellant's brief to justify court's findings as to value of plants and damage by digging of trench.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Charles W. Hester against Mary O'Keefe O'Dara. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. R. McCarty and Frank C. Scherrer, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hugh E. Macbeth, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This appeal was submitted upon an order to show cause, the respondent having presented and filed no brief. The action was one for damages for trespass, based upon two causes of action set forth in the plaintiff's amended complaint. By the first cause of action the plaintiff complained of a trespass on the part of the defendant upon property of which the plaintiff was in peaceable possession, consisting in the invasion of said premises by the defendant and the taking up and removal of certain garden plants therefrom, to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $500. The other count alleged a like invasion of said premises upon a different date, resulting in the digging of a hole or trench for sewer pipe across the same, without the consent of plaintiff and to his damage in the sum of $500. The answer of the defendant consisted in a denial of the foregoing averments of the complaint. The trial court found in favor of the plaintiff upon the first cause of action, but found that his damage amounted to but the sum of $25. Upon the other cause of action the trial court also found in plaintiff's favor, but assessed the damage at $1. From the judgment for these two amounts, the defendant has prosecuted this appeal. The sole question presented is as to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the foregoing findings of the trial court. The whole burden of the appellant's contention seems to be that there was no sufficient evidence of the value of the plants destroyed. The evidence which the appellant quotes in her brief sufficiently negatives this contention, and also sufficiently negatives the appellant's contention as to the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings of the trial court as to the plaintiff's damage in the sum of $1, caused by the digging of the sewer hole. This appeal, in view of the total amount involved therein is so evidently a spite appeal, resulting from a neighborhood quarrel, that it should be penalized, and all other similar appeals discouraged, as frivolous and entirely lacking in substantial merit.

The judgment herein is affirmed, and a penalty of $100 is imposed upon the appellant for taking and prosecuting a frivolous appeal.

RAWSON v. J. C. FORKNER FIG GARDENS, Inc. (L. A. 9626.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 21, 1928.

1. Venue ⚷7—As regards venue, contract was made where last act required for completion of execution was performed (Const. art. 12, § 16).

As regards venue of suit on contract under Const. art. 12, § 16, contract must be held to have been made where last act required for completion of its execution was performed.

2. Venue ⚷7—Where contract sued on was made and was to be performed in F. county and defendant corporation was located there, defendant could have venue changed to F. county (Const. art. 12, § 16).

Where last act required for completion of execution of contract was performed in F. county and contract was by its terms to be performed in F. county, and it was in that county where its obligation or liability arose and where its breach occurred, and defendant corporation's present place of business was located in F. county, but plaintiff commenced action on contract in L. county, defendant was entitled to change of venue to F. county, under Const. art. 12, § 16.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action to recover broker's commission on sale of real property by W. D. Rawson against J. C. Forkner Fig Gardens, Inc. From an order denying a motion for a change of venue, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hill, Morgan & Bledsoe, and A. S. Montague, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred Mansur, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This appeal was submitted upon an order to show cause; the respondent having failed to present or file a brief herein. The order appealed from was an order denying a motion for change of place of trial from the county of Los Angeles to the county of Fresno; the motion therefor having been based upon the ground that the action had been commenced in the wrong county and having been duly made at the time of the presentation and filing of the defendant's demurrer. The action was one for money claimed to be due from the defendant corporation to plaintiff as commissions for the sale of certain real property under a written contract executed between the parties to this action, a copy of which contract was attached to the complaint. The property in question was located in the county of Fresno. The principal place of business of the defendant corporation was in the county of Fresno. The contract in question related to services to be performed by the plaintiff in the county of Fresno, and when the same was to be executed it was signed by the president of the defendant corporation and also by the plaintiff in the city of Los Angeles, and was thereupon delivered to a bank in Los Angeles for transmission to a branch of said bank in the city of Fresno for the purpose of having said contract further executed, as required by the by-laws of said corporation through the attestation thereof by the secretary of said corporation and the affixing of the corporate seal. These latter acts, completing the execution of the contract, were performed in the city of Fresno and at the office and principal place of business of said corporation located therein. The provisions of the contract not having been performed, according to the averments of the plaintiff's complaint, he commenced this action, for the commissions claimed to be due thereon, in the county of Los Angeles; whereupon the defendant duly moved for a change of place of trial to the county of its residence, and it is from the denial of said motion that this appeal is taken.

[1, 2] The law with relation to the place of trial of actions of this character, wherein a corporation or association is made defendant, is set forth in section 16 of article 12 of the state Constitution, which declares that "a corporation or association may be sued in the county where the contract is made or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises or the breach occurs; or in the county where the principal place of business of such corporation is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as in other cases." The contract in question must be held to have been made where the last act required for the completion of its execution was performed. Hammond v. Ocean Shore Development Co., 22 Cal. App. 167, 133 P. 978; Fitzhugh v. University Realty Co., 46 Cal. App. 198, 188 P. 1023. This, as we have seen, was in the county of Fresno. The contract was, by its terms, to be performed in the county of Fresno, and it was in that county also where its obligation or liability arose and where its breach occurred. The principal place of business of the defendant corporation was also located in the county of Fresno and not elsewhere. It thus appears that every condition set forth in the foregoing provisions of the Constitution was complied with in so far as these related to the commencement of an action of this character against a corporation. The defendant was thus entitled upon the face of his motion and demand therefor to a change of place of trial to the county of Fresno, and the trial court was in error in its denial of the defendant's motion for such change of venue.

The order is reversed.

MONTGOMERY v. BECK et al. (L. A. 10047.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 24, 1928.

1. Quieting title ⚷30(1)—Default of named defendant does not bar intervention, in action to quiet title, by one claiming title adverse to all parties.

One claiming title adverse to both plaintiff and defendants, in action to quiet title, cannot be deprived of right to intervene by default of one or all of named defendants.

2. Quieting title ⚷30(1)—Denial of leave to intervene in action to quiet title, after permitting amended cross-complaint setting forth judgment against defaulting defendant, held reversible error.

Where trial court granted applicant, for leave to intervene in action to quiet title, leave to present amended cross-complaint definitely setting forth, as basis of right to intervene, judgment against defaulting defendant decreeing applicant to be owner of premises, and plaintiff presented no objection to form or sufficiency of such amended pleading, trial court's denial of application was abuse of discretion requiring reversal.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Action by Ernest Montgomery against S. Beck and others, in which W. D. Ashbaugh applied for leave to intervene. From an order denying the application, the applicant appeals. Reversed.

Winslow P. Hyatt, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Everett Brown, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This appeal was submitted upon an order to show cause, the respondent having presented and filed no brief herein. This action was one to quiet title to certain real property. One of the defendants named therein was the Los Angeles Realty Syndicate, a defunct corporation, jurisdiction over which was obtained by service of process upon one of the former directors and then existing trustees thereof. The trustees were not made parties to said action, and they permitted said defunct corporation to be in default, and the default thereof upon the proof of such service was entered in the action. Thereafter the appellant W. D. Ashbaugh made application for leave to intervene in the action, alleging himself to be the owner of the premises in question as the successor in interest of said defunct corporation, and in his amended complaint, in support of his application, he set forth the foundation of his title and ownership of said premises as consisting in a judgment obtained by him against said Los Angeles Realty Syndicate prior to the institution of the present action, decreeing him to be the owner of said premises.

[1] The plaintiff's opposition to said application for intervention was twofold, consisting, first, in the contention that the default of said defunct corporation, having been duly entered before the making of said application for leave to intervene constituted a sufficient ground for the denial of the same. There is no merit in this contention. An intervener claiming title to property adverse to both the plaintiff and the defendant named in an action to quiet title cannot be prevented, as to his right, to intervene therein by the fact that one or all of the named defendants may have suffered a default. Morgan v. Bonynge, 157 Cal. 295, 107 P. 312; Townsend v. Driver, 5 Cal. App. 581, 90 P. 1071.

[2] The second ground of opposition to the appellant's asserted right to intervene was based upon certain affidavits filed in opposition thereto, based upon the rather insufficient averments of the applicant's original cross-complaint in intervention. Upon the presentation thereof, however, the trial court granted the said applicant leave to present an amended complaint, which definitely set forth, as the basis of his right to intervene, the judgment obtained by him against the Los Angeles Realty Syndicate prior to the institution of the present action, decreeing him, as against said defunct corporation, to be the owner of the premises in question. No objection having been presented by the plaintiff as to the form or sufficiency of said amended complaint in intervention, it is apparent that it sufficiently stated such an adverse interest in, and ownership of, the premises as should have entitled the applicant to an order permitting him to intervene in this action, and the denial by the trial court of his right so to do must be held to be such an abuse of discretion as will compel a reversal of its order made herein in so far as the same purported to deny to the appellant leave to file his answer and cross-complaint in intervention. It is not necessary to consider that portion of said order which consisted in a denial of the application for an order setting aside the default of the Los Angeles Realty Syndicate, since, irrespective of the entry of such default, the applicant had, as we have seen, a right as an adverse claimant of said premises to appear and intervene herein.

The order is reversed.

HESS et al. v. SAUSSER et al. (L. A. 10060.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 22, 1928.

1. Landlord and tenant ⚷184(1)—Assignees of lease on building, furnishings of which were mortgaged to secure rent, could not avoid foreclosure on ground original lease was not transferred.

In suit against assignees of lease for foreclosure of mortgage given on furnishings for purpose of securing rent, defendants who received assignment of lease under separate instrument held not entitled to avoid foreclosure, though assignment was accomplished without delivery of original lease.

2. Pleading ⚷126—Denial in pleading that notice was served on particular day admits service upon any other day which would allow sufficient time.

Mere denial in pleading that notice was served on particular day amounts to an admission of service upon any other day which would allow a sufficient time for compliance with its terms.

3. Landlord and tenant ⚷184(1)—That assignee of lease did not remember receiving notice of default held insufficient proof of denial of receipt thereof, in suit to foreclose mortgage for rent.

Evidence that assignee of lease did not remember receiving notice of default in payment of rent held not to constitute sufficient denial of receipt of notice, in suit by lessor to foreclose chattel mortgage on furnishings, which was given as security for rent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Hess and another against A. F. Sausser, Hal Sausser, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants named appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. H. Adkins, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Chas. G. Young and William Gilroy, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This appeal was submitted upon an order to show cause, the respondents having presented and filed no brief herein. The action was one to foreclose a chattel mortgage upon certain furnishings of an apartment house building which had been leased by plaintiffs to certain lessees named Brown, who had executed a chattel mortgage to secure the payment of rent. The Browns sold the furnishings and assigned their interest in the lease to one Mrs. Hennessey, who in turn sold the furnishings and assigned her interest in the lease to Mrs. Aspinwall, but did not deliver the original lease to her for the reason that it had been pledged by Mrs. Hennessey as collateral security for the payment of a note. Mrs. Aspinwall sold the furnishings and executed an assignment of the lease to the defendants and appellants herein, but also did not deliver the original lease for the reason above stated. The defendants and appellants took possession of the property and held the same up to the time of the commencement of this action, and it is admitted that at the time of the institution thereof the defendants and appellants were in default in the payment of rent in the sum of $2,350. They filed an answer containing certain denials, and the cause came on for trial upon March 11, 1927, when judgment was rendered for plaintiffs and against the appellants for the aforesaid amount of overdue rent and for the foreclosure of the mortgage; whereupon the defendants Sausser appealed from such judgment.

The first point made by the appellants is that their demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained for the reason that the complaint failed to set forth the terms and conditions of the chattel mortgage or the substance thereof. The complaint does not contain the chattel mortgage in full, but refers to the record thereof for a full statement of its terms. The complaint purports to set forth sufficient of the terms and conditions of the chattel mortgage to support an action for the foreclosure thereof, and we are satisfied that it does so sufficiently to avoid a demurrer.

[1] The second contention of the appellants is that the original lease, though admittedly assigned to the appellants by a separate instrument, was not delivered to them, and that for that reason they were not liable for the terms and penalties thereof, which provide for a foreclosure of said chattel mortgage on default in the payment of rent. There is no merit in this contention, nor do the authorities which are cited by the appellants in any degree sustain it. Admittedly, the assignment of said lease was delivered to the appellants, and this would suffice for a transfer of whatever interest in the original lease was covered by the assignment, without the delivery of the original document.

[2, 3] The third and final contention of the appellants is that the plaintiffs failed to sufficiently prove the service of a sufficient notice to pay rent in order to place them in such default as would entitle the plaintiffs to a foreclosure of their mortgage. There is no merit in this contention for two reasons: First, that the answer of the defendants to the averments of the complaint alleging the service of such notice constitutes on its face an insufficient denial thereof, since a mere denial that a notice was served upon a particular day amounts to the admission of its service upon any other day which would allow a sufficiency of time for their failure to comply with its terms; and the second reason is that the evidence offered on the part of the appellants fails to constitute a sufficient denial of the receipt of such notice, the testimony of the appellant Sausser amounting to no more than a statement that he did not remember receiving the written notice, a copy of which was exhibited to him. We therefore find no merit in the several contentions of the appellants upon this appeal.

In re KELLEHER'S ESTATE.

POMEROY v. McAULIFFE et al.

(S. F. 12846.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1928.

1. Wills 🔑671—Provision of will giving executors equal shares in residue of estate "for carrying out bequests" held to mean as remuneration for services and not in trust.

Provision of will giving to executors thereof equal shares in residue of the estate "for carrying out of the foregoing bequests" held to mean as remuneration for carrying out the directions contained in the other portions of the will, and not to create a trust to pay legacies, debts, and expenses.

2. Wills 🔑523, 862—Bequests to executors given equal share in residue of estate held not to class, and, one executor dying before testator, half of residue was intestate.

One of executors, who was given equal share in residue of estate by testator's will, having died before testator did, held that, the bequest not being to executors as a class, the testator died intestate as to one-half the residue of the estate, so that testator's next of kin were entitled thereto.

3. Executors and administrators 🔑271—Debts and expenses of administration held properly charged to intestate half of residue.

Debts and expenses of administration of estate held properly charged to intestate one-half of the residue of the estate.

4. Wills 🔑858(1)—Lapsed legacies fell into residue; bequest to executors of residue of estate not being circumscribed or limited to definite amount.

Though testator listed in his will all of the property he then owned and gave to executors residue for services rendered under the will, held that certain lapsed legacies fell into residue; bequest of residue to executors not being circumscribed by clear expressions in the instrument limiting legacies to executors to certain amounts.

5. Executors and administrators 🔑292—Executor given half of residue of estate for services need not complete administration before asking for partial distribution of property to him (Code Civ. Proc. § 1616).

Where executors were given the residue of the estate for their services after payment of certain bequests, executor administering the estate after the death of other executor held not required to complete administration before asking for partial distribution of property to him, since, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1616, it is provided that partial allowance may be made on account of statutory fees of an executor; fact that fees were fixed by will itself making no difference.

6. Executors and administrators 🔑111(1)—Fees for attorneys' services in administration of estate, not being personal charge against executor, are payable like other administration expenses.

Fees for attorneys' services being a proper expense of administration of the estate are payable like the other expenses of administration, and are not a personal charge against executor.

Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Petition by Richard T. Pomeroy, individually, and as executor of the will of Mathew Kelleher, deceased, for a partial distribution of the estate, opposed by Nano Dennehy McAuliffe and others. Order granting the petition in part, and all parties appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 259 P. 437, 54 A. L. R. 913.

George E. Stoker and McNair & Stoker, all of San Francisco, for appellant Pomeroy.

Livingston & Livingston, John C. Quinlan, and Coffey & Coffey, all of San Francisco, (Mathew Tobriner, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent and heirs at law.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal from an order granting in part, the petition of Richard T. Pomeroy, individually and as executor of the will of Mathew Kelleher, deceased, for partial distribution of said estate. Said petition was opposed by certain persons claiming to be the next of kin and heirs at law of said decedent.

All parties, the petitioner and the various persons who opposed his petition, have appealed from said order. They have stipulated that their appeals may be consolidated and heard upon one record.

[1] The main controversy centers about the construction to be placed upon the following residuary clause of the will of deceased: "I appoint as my executors Richard T. Pomeroy Millstreet Co Cork and William Reardon Millstreet Co Cork and I give them in equal shares the residue of my property for the carrying out of the foregoing bequests."

William Reardon, one of the executors named, predeceased the testator. Richard T. Pomeroy, the other executor named, came to San Francisco from Ireland to have the will admitted to probate and to procure his appointment as executor thereof. The will was admitted to probate, and Mr. Pomeroy was appointed executor and qualified as such on September 26, 1921.

By the aforesaid decree of partial distribution, the probate court construed the above-quoted residuary clause to mean that decedent gave the residue of his property to the named executors as a recompense for their services in acting as executors. This construction was in accord with the contention of petitioner, Pomeroy. The next of kin have appealed from this part of the decree; their contention being that decedent intended by said clause to give the residue of his property to his executors in trust to pay legacies, debts, and expenses of administration.

In its construction of the residuary clause, we are in accord with the trial court. We think that, when the will, as a whole, is considered, it is clear that the phrase, "for the carrying out of the foregoing bequests," means as a remuneration for carrying out the directions contained in the other portions of the will. The testator did not give the entire estate to the executors "for carrying out the foregoing bequests," but he gave them only the residue after provision had been made out of his property for certain specific legacies, monuments, etc. The contention of the heirs implies that the will made a double provision for the payments of the legacies and other expenses directed to be incurred by the executors—one in the specific clauses pertaining to these matters and the other in the residuary clause.

[2] By its decree, the probate court also held that, by reason of the death, prior to the death of decedent, of the named executor William Reardon, decedent died intestate as to an undivided one-half of the residue of his estate, that decedent's next of kin were entitled to take such intestate half, and that petitioner Pomeroy was entitled to take the remaining half as compensation for his services as executor.

In so holding, the probate court accepted the contention of the next of kin. Petitioner, Pomeroy, has appealed from this part of the decree, his contention being that the residuary bequest was a gift to a class, to two persons jointly, as compensation for their services in performing the duties of an office which was necessarily joint; that he is the survivor of that class and alone has performed the duties and therefore is entitled to the entire residue. In this holding we are also in accord with the ruling of the probate court. The question involved seems to be governed by the rule announced in Estate of Murphy, 157 Cal. 63, 106 P. 230, 137 Am. St. Rep. 110. In that case the court construed the following residuary clause in a will: "All the rest of my property * * * shall go to, and be equally divided among the four children of my late sister * * * that is to say: I give, devise and bequeath all the rest of my * * * property * * * share and share alike, to Timothy J. Flynn, William D. Flynn, Mary Jane Logan and Kate I. Prendergast." In that case, as in the instant case, the residue was to persons in a designated class, but the persons were specifically named. The court there said:

"As to a gift to a class the rule is stated as follows: 'In legal contemplation a gift to a class is a gift of an aggregate sum to a body of persons uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time, who are all to take in equal or some other definite proportions, the share of each being dependent for its amount upon the ultimate number.'"

"Tested under this rule there is nothing in the devise which would indicate that the intention of the testator was that the devisees should take as a class, or in any other way than as individuals, and under our code provision as tenants in common. There is nothing on the face of the devise indicating any uncertainty in the number of persons who were to take the property, or that they were to be ascertained at a future time, or that the share of the residuary estate which the devisees were ultimately to have was to be determined as to the amount by the number of those who would survive the testator. All the persons who are to take were specifically named and the share of each was designated. * * * It is true that the testator uses language in the clause of his will which would, if it stood alone, amount to a devise to a class. This would be the result if the devise had been to 'the four children of my late sister Catherine' without further words. But here the terms of the bequest—the designation of the number of the children, followed by a repeated and express devise to them by name and in an equal share, cannot be ignored so as to make the other words in the will constitute a class."

[3] The probate court further held, by its decree, that all debts of decedent and all expenses of administration of his estate should be charged against the intestate half of the residue, giving to the executor his one-half undiminished by any debts or expenses. The next of kin have appealed from this part of the decree.

While the rule would seem to be otherwise in many jurisdictions, in California, because of certain statutory provisions, it has been held, in Estate of Hall, 183 Cal. 61, 190 P. 364, that it is not necessary to deduct the charges against the estate before the residue is ascertainable, and that portions of the residue undisposed of by the will must be used for the payment of charges before resort may be had to the residuary legacies effectually devised or bequeathed.

[4] It is also contended by the next of kin that certain lapsed legacies do not fall into the residue of the estate in this case, contrary to the usual rule, because of the peculiar language of the will. It is argued that, because the testator listed in his will everything he then owned, that his act in listing his assets indicates he had a specific fund in mind which he intended for his residuary legatees, and consequently such fund could not be augmented by lapsed legacies. We cannot agree with this contention. The rule is stated in the Estate of Upham, 127 Cal. 90, 59 P. 315:

"Where the residuary bequest is not circumscribed by clear expressions in the instrument, and the title of the residuary legatee is not narrowed by special words of unmistakable import, he will take whatever may fall into the residue, whether by lapse, invalid disposition, or other reason." In O'Connor v. Murphy, 147 Cal. 148, 81 P. 406, the matter was discussed in the following language:

"It is not enough that it appears from a clause of the will, simply that the testator intended to make a particular devise of a portion of his estate which, however, for some reason, failed to be effectual; because, if that were the rule, it would apply to every lapsed or invalid bequest, and the residuary clause could never be effectual to carry it.

"On the contrary, it must appear unequivocally that it was the intention of the testator, not only to make a particular devise, but it must further appear from the terms of such devise, or from other provisions of the will, that it was the intention of the testator, that the residuary clause should not in any event carry such bequest should it become inoperative for any reason. The intention to include all ineffectual bequests in the residuary clause is presumed; the intention to exclude must appear from appropriate language evidencing that intention, or by clear implication."

situation. None of the next of kin, appealing here, are close relatives of the testator. He apparently left neither mother or father, brother or sister, uncle or aunt, or first cousin. The only bequest in the will to any one within any of these classes lapsed because of the death of the legatee before the death of the testator. When petitioner, Pomeroy, arrived in San Francisco to probate the will, he found that the property of decedent had been transferred to a third person shortly before the testator's death under a trust instrument, and protracted litigation resulted to recover the property for the estate upon the theory that it had been transferred at a time when decedent was of unsound mind. The litigation was carried to this court upon appeal, and the decision thereof appears in Pomeroy v. Collins, 198 Cal. 46, 243 P. 657. Incidentally, the executor had to defend another action instituted by one Helen H. Walsh to admit to probate a certain letter as a holographic codicil to the will of decedent. Estate of Kelleher (Cal. Sup.) 259 P. 437, 54 A. L. R. 913. In the meantime, certain proceedings had been commenced to determine heirship, under section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure. That proceeding, although instituted in 1924, was undetermined at the time the appeal herein was taken. It appears that the executor has proceded as far as he may with the probate proceedings, and is delayed indefinitely in the matter of final distribution until the determination of heirship which is necessary for the distribution of the intestate portion of the estate. In the meantime, he has spent many years untangling the various complications growing out of the situation, and it seems but equitable that he should have the benefit of at least a portion of the property to which he is entitled. The trial court reserved out of the share of said executor sufficient property to pay for the services of a possible administrator with the will annexed in the event petitioner should for any reason be unable or unwilling to complete the final steps of the administration of his trust, so no possible injustice can be done to anyone by the present partial distribution. Section 1616, Code of Civil Procedure, provides for partial allowance on account of statutory fees of an executor, and we see no reason for a different rule when the fees are those fixed by the will itself.

The fees for attorney's services, being a proper expense of administration, are payable like the other expenses of administration, and are not a personal charge against the executor.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

GRAVES v. ARIZONA CENT. BANK et al.

(Sac. 4141.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 14, 1928.

1. Mortgages 🔑593—"Equity of redemption" is interest in realty, subject to ordinary rule of conveyances thereof.

"Equity of redemption" is an interest in real property, and ordinary rule of conveyances of realty applies thereto to same extent as to any other estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Equity of Redemption.]

2. Mortgages 🔑593—Mortgagor's conveyance of equity of redemption to mortgagee must rest on sufficient consideration.

Conveyance of equity of redemption by mortgagor to mortgagee must rest on sufficient consideration.

3. Frauds, statute of 🔑119(1)—Vendor may be estopped to rely on defense that conveyance by him was not in writing (Statute of Frauds).

Vendor may be estopped by circumstances to rely on defense that conveyance made by him was not in writing, as required by statute of frauds (Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 5).

4. Mortgages 🔑593—Mortgagee's cancellation of debt and protection of mortgagor from liability for further payments under contract to purchase land held sufficient consideration for oral transfer of equity of redemption.

Mortgagee's cancellation of mortgage debt, protection of mortgagor from liability for further payments under contract to purchase land, and making of numerous payments to vendor, on strength of mortgagor's oral transfer of equity of redemption to mortgagee, constitute sufficient consideration therefor.

5. Mortgages 🔑29—Purchaser's assignment of interest in land as security for loan impressed lien on everything that would have passed by grant of property (Civ. Code, § 2926).

Under Civ. Code, § 2926, purchaser's assignment of interest in land before completion of payments, though intended as security for loan, impressed a lien on everything that would have passed by grant of property.

6. Estoppel 🔑27(1)—Purchaser assigning interest in land as security for loan and orally transferring equity of redemption to assignee, who canceled indebtedness, made payments to vendor, and took possession, held estopped to assert title as against assignee.

Purchaser assigning interest in land as security for loan and subsequently transferring equity of redemption to assignee by oral agreement in consideration of latter canceling indebtedness to him, protecting purchaser from liability for further payments under contract of sale, and making payments to vendor, held estopped to assert title, equitable or otherwise, as against assignee, who had more than technical possession of property under such transfer and could compel specific performance of contract or quiet title as against purchaser.

7. Execution 🔑111 — Judgment creditor can reach no interest in land that judgment debtor could not reach (Code Civ. Proc. § 688).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 688, judgment creditor can reach no interest in land that judgment debtor himself could not reach by appropriate action.

8. Attachment 🔑178—Judgment 🔑780(3)—Neither judgment nor attachment impresses lien on judgment debtor's interest in land under contract to purchase it.

Neither judgment nor attachment sued out in action against judgment debtor impresses any lien on latter's interest in land, if any, under contract to purchase it.

9. Payment 🔑31—Oral agreement that conveyance, in form unconditional, of purchaser's interest in land under sale contract, be considered absolute in lieu of debt to grantee, extinguishes debt.

Oral agreement that conveyance, in form unconditional, of purchaser's interest in land under contract of sale, be considered absolute in lieu of debt to grantee, is extinguishment of debt.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Judgment on court's findings supported by evidence must be affirmed.

Court's findings having proper support in the evidence, judgment thereon must be affirmed.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; H. S. Gans, Judge.

Action by John H. Graves against the Arizona Central Bank, a corporation, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

George R. Freeman, of Willows, for appellants.

W. T. Belieu, of Willows, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. This is an action to remove a cloud from the title to real property claimed by the plaintiff and to that end to enjoin the defendant bank, as judgment creditor, and the sheriff, respectively, from proceeding with an execution sale of said property upon a judgment obtained by defendant bank against one O. E. Squier. We find no merit in the appeal, and the judgment must be affirmed.

The court was warranted in finding the facts to be substantially as follows: In 1919 the Superior California Farm Lands Company and said Squier entered into a contract of sale and purchase of some 80 acres of land in Glenn county for a consideration of approximately $12,000, to be paid in annual installments. Thereafter, and up to February 16, 1925, said Squier had paid about $4,000 on the purchase price. On said last-mentioned date said Squier borrowed from plaintiff some $1,500 and as security for the loan delivered a written assignment executed by himself and his wife to said plaintiff, which assignment on its face was unconditional and no defeasance was executed by plaintiff. It is admitted, however, by him, that at the time the assignment was so taken and received it was intended to be as security. Thereafter, however, about the month of July, 1925, said Squier, acknowledging his inability to make further payments under said contract or to repay said loan, surrendered his equity of redemption to plaintiff with the intent to give him the full title to his equitable estate therein. This agreement between these parties was oral. Thereafter, however, plaintiff entered into possession of said property and paid on account of said contract to the vendor various sums of money, aggregating some $2,000 or more, and, in addition to that, paid certain taxes, assessments, and water charges in connection with the operation thereof and otherwise acted openly as the owner and possessor of said property. Later, and on January 18, 1927, defendant bank obtained a judgment in the superior court of Glenn county against said Squier for the sum of approximately $1,900. A writ of execution was thereafter sued out, addressed to the sheriff of said county, and on February 9, 1927, after levying same upon the lands here in dispute, an execution sale of said property was noticed. Thereupon plaintiff filed his complaint herein, praying for an injunction restraining said sale upon the ground that he was the owner of said property and that to allow the sale to proceed would be to cloud his title thereto. On trial of the action, the court found plaintiff to be the owner of said property and to have been such on and prior to the levy of said execution, and further found that the existence of such a sale against said property would be a cloud upon the title thereto, and granted the relief prayed for. The propriety of this action on the part of the court below under these circumstances is involved in this appeal.

[1-3] "The only point in this action is as to whether the respondent is a mortgagee, or the absolute owner, of Squier's equitable interest in the property," is appellant's characterization of the sole issue under consideration. It is true that equity of redemption is an interest in real property and that the ordinary rule of conveyances of real property applies to the same extent as to any other estate therein. Bradbury v. Davenport, 114 Cal. 593, 46 P. 1062, 55 Am. St. Rep. 92. It is also well settled that a conveyance of such equity of redemption by the mortgagor to the mortgagee must rest upon sufficient consideration. Bradbury v. Davenport, supra; Phelan v. De Martin, 85 Cal. 365, 24 P. 725. It may also be conceded that the mortgagee is not the owner of the mortgaged premises and has no title to be clouded by a sale of the mortgagor's interest therein under execution, but these concessions do not determine the question before us. At the same time, it must be admitted that circumstances frequently arise which will estop the vendor to rely upon the defense that the conveyance made by him was not in writing as required by the statute of frauds. Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 5. This is recognized in the case of Bradbury v. Davenport, supra. It is also recognized in numerous other cases in this state, a few of which are as follows: Brown v. Town of Sebastopol, 153 Cal. 704, 96 P. 363, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 178; Pearsall v. Henry, 153 Cal. 314, 95 P. 154, 159; Schubert v. Lowe, 193 Cal. 291, 223 P. 550; Kinsell v. Thomas, 18 Cal. App. 683, 124 P. 220; Rundell v. McDonald, 62 Cal. App. 721, 724, 217 P. 1082.

[4-6] The possession of the property by the respondent under the oral transfer was more than technical, and such cases as Hambey v. Wise, 181 Cal. 286, 184 P. 9, and Wood v. Anderson, 199 Cal. 440, 444, 249 P. 862, are not controlling. Moreover, the claim of estoppel to rely upon the statute of frauds does not rest upon the question of possession alone. The question of consideration for the oral transfer is met by the fact that respondent canceled the indebtedness of Squier to him and also protected him from liability upon the further payments under said contract of sale and purchase, and moreover respondent prejudiced himself by numerous payments to the vendor upon the strength of said oral agreement. The conveyance made by Squier to respondent, although intended as security, impressed a lien upon everything that would have passed by a grant of the property. Civ. Code, § 2926; Commercial Bank v. Pritchard, 126 Cal. 600, 605, 59 P. 130. Sufficient facts therefore appear to estop said Squier from asserting any title to said property, equitable or otherwise, as against the claim of respondent. The respondent could compel a specific performance of the contract under this showing or could in fact quiet his title against Squier.

[7, 8] It is, of course, elementary that appellant can reach no interest in said property that the judgment debtor himself could not reach by appropriate action. Section 688, Code Civ. Proc.; Bank of Ukiah v. Petaluma Savings Bank, 100 Cal. 590, 35 P. 170; Rowley v. Davis, 34 Cal. App. 184, 192, 167 P. 162. Neither the judgment nor the attachment which was sued out in this action impressed any lien upon the interest, if any he had, of the judgment debtor. Belieu v. Power, 54 Cal. App. 244, 201 P. 620; Poindexter v. Los Angeles Stone Co., 60 Cal. App. 686, 214 P. 241.

[9] The contention of appellant that the evidence shows that the mortgage debt was not canceled by respondent creates no more than a conflict at most in the evidence, for it appears that no promissory note was issued and the conveyance, being in form unconditional, an oral agreement that it be considered absolute in lieu of the debt is an extinguishment thereof. Hence the finding of the court in this respect has support in the record.

[10] Inasmuch as the findings made have proper support in the evidence, appellant shows no legal ground upon which to base a complaint against the judgment of the lower court.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Reformation of instruments ⚷32—Contract requiring broker's authorization to be withdrawn in writing might be reformed despite owner's lack of diligence in discovering provision.

Provision inserted in written authorization to sell land by broker, providing that authorization to be ended after 90 days must be withdrawn in writing, which provision was unknown to owner and concealed by broker from the owner, might be reformed to express the true intention of the parties, notwithstanding that owner might have discovered the provision at the time he executed the contract had he exercised higher degree of diligence.

2. Reformation of instruments ⚷25—Mere failure to read instrument with sufficient attention to perceive error or defect will not prevent reformation.

Mere failure of party to read an instrument with sufficient attention to perceive an error or defect in its contents will not prevent its reformation, at the instance of the party executing it thus carelessly.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by R. E. Romano against Carl Seibt and wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Albert Picard, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Robert B. Gaylord, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. An appeal by the plaintiff, a real estate broker, from a judgment entered for the defendants in an action to recover a commission.

Defendant Carl Seibt, on July 6, 1923, executed to the plaintiff an authorization in writing for the sale by the latter of certain real estate situated in San Francisco. The writing provided for the payment of a commission of $400 to the broker in case of sale either by him or by the owner within the period fixed by the authorization. The writing by its terms provided that it should remain in force "irrevocable for ninety days from date hereof and thereafter until withdrawn * * * in writing. * * *" The property was not sold by the plaintiff, nor was a purchaser found by him, but the sale was made by the owner through another broker. While the sale was made after the 90-day period, the claim for commission is based upon the fact that there had been no previous withdrawal in writing of plaintiff's authorization.

[1] As defenses to the action and as grounds for a reformation of the instrument, it was alleged that the wife of defendant Seibt, who was joined as a defendant, neither executed the writing nor authorized its execution by her husband; further, that the agreement between the parties was that the authorization should remain in force for 90 days and no more; that the authorization was drawn by plaintiff, who represented to Seibt that the same contained the above provision; that the instrument was read to said defendant by plaintiff, with the exception of that portion providing that it should remain in force after the 90-day period, that is, until withdrawn in writing; that relying upon the statement of the plaintiff as to its provisions, which he believed to be true, defendant Seibt did not read the writing but signed the same through a mistake as to its contents.

The court found the allegations above to be true; that the writing did not express the true agreement of the parties in so far as it made necessary a notice of termination after the 90-day period, and in that respect should be reformed. Judgment was entered for defendants accordingly.

The findings of the court are fully supported by the evidence, but appellant claims that defendant Seibt was negligent in failing to read the instrument and was not justified in relying upon the plaintiff's statements as to its contents. In support of this contention plaintiff relies upon the following cases, namely: Knox v. Modern, etc., Shop, 68 Cal. App. 583, 229 P. 880, and Kimmell v. Skelly, 130 Cal. 555, 62 P. 1067.

In the first case the trial court found that the parties by mutual agreement rescinded a paragraph of the contract before a sale was made by the owners, which finding was without support. The owners also claimed that they failed to read the contract before it was signed, and were not aware of a clause therein similar to the one in question. There was, however, no concealment or misrepresentation by the broker, and the court held that the owners were negligent in failing to inform themselves of the contents of the writing, and could not avoid liability on the ground that they were mistaken as to its terms.

A similar situation was presented in the second case, where it was held that the party complaining had under the circumstances no right to rely upon the statements of the other parties to the transaction.

[2] But the case at bar differs from the above in that, according to the evidence and findings, the plaintiff not only inserted the clause in question contrary to the agreement of the parties, but concealed the fact that it was contained in the writing. Under such circumstances, the provision might be avoided by the defendant, notwithstanding he might have discovered it at the time the contract was executed had he exercised a higher degree of diligence. Wilson v. Moriarty, 77 Cal. 596, 20 P. 134; Wenzel v. Shulz, 78 Cal. 222, 20 P. 404; Smith v. Occidental, etc., Steamship Co., 99 Cal. 462, 471, 34 P. 84. Moreover, as held in Los Angeles Co. v. New Liverpool Co., 150 Cal. 21, 87 P. 1029, the mere failure of a party to read an instrument with sufficient attention to perceive an error or defect in its contents will not prevent its reformation at the instance of the party who executes it thus carelessly.

The facts fully justified the conclusions of the trial court, and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

In re LONARDO. (Cr. 1521.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 10, 1928.

1. Habeas corpus 🔑85(2)—Petitioner's uncontroverted evidence, showing absence from Ohio at time of homicide, required discharge from custody under extradition warrant for return to Ohio.

Uncontroverted evidence, offered in behalf of petitioner in habeas corpus proceeding, showing that he was in San Francisco and not in Ohio at time of murder charged to have been committed by him in state of Ohio, held to require petitioner's discharge from custody under warrant of rendition and extradition executed by Governor at request of Ohio authorities.

2. Habeas corpus 🔑92(2)—Petitioner held entitled, in habeas corpus, to secure release from custody under extradition warrant, to try question whether he was fugitive.

Petitioner, in habeas corpus proceedings to secure release from custody under warrant of extradition for his return to another state under criminal charge, held entitled to try question whether he was fugitive within meaning of United States Constitution and extradition statutes.

Application by Dominic Lonardo, also known as Joseph Piazza, for writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the Chief of Police, City and County of San Francisco, to secure petitioner's release from custody as a fugitive from justice. Writ granted, and petitioner discharged.

James F. Brennan, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Joseph A. Garry, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. This is an original habeas corpus proceeding. Petitioner is held in custody by the chief of police of the city and county of San Francisco and two police agents from the state of Ohio under a warrant of rendition and extradition executed by the Governor of the state of California. This warrant was issued upon the request and affidavit of the prosecuting attorney of Cuyahoga county, Ohio, accompanied by a certified copy of an indictment from the state of Ohio charging petitioner with having committed a certain murder in that state on or about December 31, 1920. The affidavit, besides merely formal matters, included the bare statement that the person charged by said indictment with the crime of murder "is a fugitive from justice."

[1, 2] The petitioner alleges that he is not a fugitive from the justice of the state of Ohio on said charge of murder, and that he was not in the state of Ohio at any time during the 31st day of December, 1920, nor for a period of more than one month prior, nor more than one month thereafter, but was at all such times within the state of California. He presents affidavits of ten residents of San Francisco to the effect that he was in San Francisco at the time before and after the date of the Ohio murder. These witnesses, or most of them, testified in the superior court to the same effect in a habeas corpus proceeding prosecuted there for the same purpose as this one. The transcript of the testimony of these witnesses was produced upon the return of this writ in this court and admitted as evidence by stipulation.

No testimony was offered on behalf of respondent. He relies upon the Governor's warrant and upon the cross-examination of the petitioner's witnesses. It is claimed that the cross-examination of these witnesses so far overcomes their direct testimony that this court should believe none of it, but decide in favor of and in accordance with the presumption arising from the Governor's action that the petitioner is a fugitive from the justice of the state of Ohio and that he has fled therefrom. The cross-examination at most shows that some of the witnesses might be mistaken about dates and that others might be falsifying; but it is far from convincing us that the direct testimony of these witnesses is not worthy at the least of considerable credence.

Weighing the evidentiary force of the showing made for and against the petitioner, we conclude that the petitioner is not proven to be a fugitive from the justice of the state of Ohio. Although this court upon the hearing of this writ called to the attention of counsel for respondent the probable conclusion of this court in the absence of affirmative testimony contradicting the showing made by petitioner, no such testimony was forthcoming and no request was made for an opportunity to produce any such testimony. To the suggestion that under the Ohio indictment the proof of the crime charged might show the murder to have been committed at a time when petitioner was in the state of Ohio and not in California, but nevertheless on or about the 31st of December, 1920, counsel for respondent stated that no such contention would be made.

The petitioner is entitled to have tried by this court in this proceeding the question of whether he is a fugitive within the meaning of the United States Constitution and statutes providing for extradition from one state to another. Ex parte Shoemaker, 25 Cal. App. 551, 144 P. 985; Hyatt v. Corkran, 188 U. S. 691, 23 S. Ct. 456, 47 L. Ed. 657; see, also, cases collected at 51 A. L. R. 801.

Under this record the plain duty of the court is to discharge the petitioner, and it is so ordered.

SUNSET LUMBER CO. v. SMITH et al.

(Civ. 6386.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 6, 1928.

1. Schools and school districts 🔑81(2)—Joinder of contractor and sureties on contractor's bond held authorized in materialman's action on contractor's bond (Code Civ. Proc. § 383).

In action by materialman on contractor's bond to recover for materials furnished in constructing school, joinder of contractor as principal on bond and sureties was authorized, under Code Civ. Proc. § 383.

2. Schools and school districts 🔑81(2)—Joinder of school district and trustees, though not necessary in action on contractor's bond for materials used in constructing school, held not prejudicial to surety on bond.

In action by materialman on contractor's bond to recover for materials furnished in construction of school, joinder of school district and trustees thereof, though not necessary, was not prejudicial to surety on contractor's bond.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1170(1)—Error in overruling demurrer for misjoinder of parties defendant is no ground for reversal, unless prejudicial to party demurring (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Error in overruling demurrer for misjoinder of parties defendant after trial on merits is not ground for reversal of judgment, unless party demurring has been misled to his prejudice or error otherwise appears to have been injurious, under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

4. Election of remedies 🔑5—Remedy provided materialman under Public Works Act held cumulative with remedy under Code of Civil Procedure, and does not require election by materialman (Code Civ. Proc. § 1184; Public Works Act 1919).

Public Works Act 1919 (St. 1919, p. 487), providing that, unless contractor's bond is filed, no claim shall be allowed in favor of contractor as penalty against contractor, but further providing that materialman shall be entitled to payment in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, held additional and cumulative remedy with remedy given by Code of Civil Procedure, and does not require election by materialman.

5. Schools and school districts 🔑86(2)—That materialman's verified statement was denominated "Notice to Withhold" and complied with Code did not make it insufficient under Public Works Act (Public Works Act 1919; Code Civ. Proc. § 1184).

Under Public Works Act 1919 (St. 1919, p. 487), requiring materialman to file with body by whom contract was awarded verified statement of claim and that claim has not been paid, fact that materialman's statement was denominated "A Notice to Withhold," or that it was also sufficient to comply with Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, did not make it any less sufficient as compliance with Public Works Act.

6. Schools and school districts 🔑81(2)—Materialman suing on contractor's bond under Public Works Act held not required to first proceed under Code or wait for pro rata payment (Public Works Act 1919; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1184, 1184a).

Under Public Works Act 1919 (St. 1919, p. 487), requiring that action by materialman on contractor's bond be commenced within 90 days after period within which claims of lien must be filed for record, materialman is not required to first bring action under Code Civ. Proc. § 1184a, or wait for pro rata payment under section 1184.

7. Schools and school districts 🔑81(2)—Contractor's bondsmen are relieved to extent that materialman has succeeded in reducing claim against bondsmen by complying with Code (Code Civ. Proc. § 1184 et seq.).

If materialman has succeeded in reducing his claim against contractor's bondsmen by complying with provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 1184 et seq., bondsmen are relieved to that extent.

8. Schools and school districts 🔑81(2)—Action by materialman on contractor's bond, commenced May 18, 1923, held timely, where contractor abandoned work November 22, 1922, and only notice of completion was filed January, 1923 (Public Works Act 1919; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1187, 1190).

Under Public Works Act 1919 (St. 1919, p. 487), providing that statement of materialman's claim shall be filed with body by whom contract was awarded prior to expiration of period within which claims of lien must be recorded, as prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, and that suit by materialman must be commenced against contractor's bondsmen within 90 days after expiration of that period, action by materialman on contractor's bond, commenced May 18, 1923, after contractor had abandoned work on November 22, 1922, and notice of completion was filed January, 1923, was commenced within time, whether abandonment by contractor should be deemed to constitute cessation of labor under section 1187, or whether date of notice of completion is to be deemed date of completion; section 1190 having no application.

9. Evidence 🔑83(2)—School trustees are presumed to perform duties and to have exacted contractor's bond as required in construction of school.

Board of trustees of school district is presumed to have performed every duty imposed on it, and hence to have exacted bond from contractor in construction of school as required.

10. Schools and school districts 🔑81(2)—Complaint by materialman, alleging contract between contractor and school district setting out bond referring to contract, authorized conclusion that contract alleged was referred to in bond and did not relieve bondsmen by reason of variance.

Where complaint by materialman on contractor's bond to recover for materials furnished in constructing school alleged contract between contractor and school district, and bond set out as exhibit in complaint referred to contract as contract between same parties for same amount, made on same day, for same character of work and improvements, and there was no evidence or claim that any other contract was entered into between such contractor and school trustees, court was entitled to conclude that contract alleged was referred to in bond, and hence surety on bond was not relieved of liability by reason of variance from provisions of bond.

11. Schools and school districts 🔑81(2)—Surety on contractor's bond held not relieved of liability by school district's consent to judgment for materialman for part of claim (Civ. Code, § 2819).

Where school board for whom school was constructed admitted having certain amount on hand to pay claim of materialman, and consented to judgment against it for such amount in materialman's action on contractor's bond, there was no such settlement or compromise by materialman with school board, under Civ. Code, § 2819, as would release surety on contractor's bond; there being no alteration of obligation of principal nor of rights or remedies of materialman against principal to injury of surety.

12. Corporations 🔑517—Verification of materialman's claim by manager of materialman's corporation held sufficient (Public Works Act 1919; Code Civ. Proc. § 1187).

Under Public Works Act 1919 (St. 1919, p. 487), requiring statement by materialman to be verified without designating who shall make verification similar to Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, authorizing verification by any person who knows facts, verification of materialman's claim by manager of materialman's corporation made on behalf of corporation held sufficient.

13. Schools and school districts 🔑81(2)—Materialman held not required to exhaust remedy against school board before proceeding against contractor's bondsmen or prove amount in hands of school board remaining unpaid to contractor (Public Works Act 1919).

In action under Public Works Act 1919 (St. 1919, p. 487), by materialman on contractor's bond for materials furnished in constructing school, materialman was not required to exhaust his remedy against school district before proceeding against bondsmen, and materialman was not required to prove exact amount in hands of school board remaining unpaid to contractor, especially where surety on contractor's bond had ample opportunity to show that school board had funds to apply on materialman's claim in excess of amount for which school board confessed judgment.

14. Schools and school districts 🔑81(2)—Materialman's complaint for materials furnished in constructing school containing verified notice to withhold, specifying materials used, stated case against surety on contractor's bond.

Complaint by materialman on contractor's bond for materials furnished in construction of school, alleging agreement between contractor and materialman for furnishing of materials described in notice to withhold, duly verified and annexed to complaint, and that all materials were used in constructing building, stated cause of action against surety on contractor's bond.

15. Pleading 🔑310—Essential elements of case must be distinctly averred, and cannot be left to inference from documents attached to complaint.

Whatever is essential element of cause of action must be presented by distinct averment, and cannot be left to inference to be drawn from construction of document attached to complaint.

16. Pleading 🔑205(1)—General demurrer does not lie if plaintiff is entitled to any relief under complaint.

A general demurrer does not lie if plaintiff is entitled to any relief under allegations of complaint.

17. Schools and school districts 🔑85—Materials furnished in constructing school are to be paid for when delivered, in absence of express allegation of time of payment (Civ. Code, § 1657).

Under complaint by materialman on contractor's bond for materials furnished in constructing school, in absence of express allegation as to when contractor should pay for materials furnished, such time is fixed by law as being time of delivery of materials, under Civ. Code, § 1657.

18. Schools and school districts 🔑21—School district is necessary political subdivision of county under direction of local authorities to promote general educational purposes of state.

School district is necessary political subdivision of county under direction and supervision of local authorities for promotion of general educational purposes of state; system being matter of general concern and not municipal affair.

19. Schools and school districts 🔑81(2)—Admission in answer to materialman's suit for materials in constructing school, that school district was duly organized district and public corporation, held admission that it was state agency, without further proof.

In action by materialman on contractor's bond for materials furnished in constructing school, admission in answer of surety on bond that school district was duly organized and existing school district and a public corporation constituted admission that district was state agency and political subdivision, and no further proof thereof was required.

20. Stipulations 🔑14(4)—Refusal to permit defense of estoppel in answer held proper, where stipulation on which case was tried raised no such defense (Public Works Act; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1184–1184c).

Where surety on contractor's bond sued by materialman answered by general denial, and stipulated that defenses urged were insufficiency of statement filed by materialman to meet requirements of Public Works Act 1919 (St. 1919, p. 487), that claim was barred by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1184–1184c, and provisions of Public Works Act, but did not mention special defense of equitable estoppel, and case proceeded to trial pursuant to stipulation, court properly refused to permit counsel for surety to file in answer issue of estoppel.

21. Schools and school districts ⚷81(2)—Attorney fees in action by materialman on bond of contractor may be included in judgment without filing of cost bill (Public Works Act 1919; Code Civ. Proc. § 1033).

Under Public Works Act 1919 (St. 1919, p. 487) providing for attorney fees to be taxed as costs and to be included in judgment, attorney fees in action by materialman on bond of contractor may be included in judgment without filing of cost bill, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1033.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; H. L. Lucas, Judge.

Action by the Sunset Lumber Company against E. Potter Smith and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant James K. Nelson alone appeals. Affirmed.

Cooley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Louis Oneal and Maurice J. Rankin, both of San José, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an action to recover for materials furnished in the erection and construction of the Soquel union grammar school in the town of Soquel, Santa Cruz county. The action is brought against E. Potter Smith, the contractor to whom the board of trustees of the Soquel union school district let the general contract for the construction of the school building, and against James K. Nelson and J. J. Stevenson, the sureties on the contractor's bond, the members of the school board, and the school district itself. The action is primarily one against the contractor to recover for the materials furnished and used in the construction of the school building. The contractor defaulted, and the other defendants answered. Defendant James K. Nelson, one of the sureties on the contractor's bond, is the only defendant who has appealed.

Appellant presents the following points as grounds for a reversal of the judgment: "(1) The demurrer of this defendant should have been sustained because of misjoinder of causes of action and misjoinder of parties defendant; (2) plaintiff's action is barred by the provisions of the various lien law statutes of the state of California; (3) the defendant James K. Nelson is not liable by reason of the variance from the provisions of the bond; (4) the defendant James K. Nelson is not liable by reason of the settlement by the principal without the consent of the surety; (5) plaintiff has failed to comply with the provisions of the Public Works Act (St. 1919, p. 487); (6) the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision of the trial court; (7) the complaint of plaintiff does not state a cause of action against this defendant; (8) the court erred in striking out the equitable defense of estoppel; (9) the court erred in including in its findings an award of $750.00 counsel fees."

[1-3] As to appellant's first contention it may be said that this action was primarily against the contractor and his bondsmen. The contractor and bondsmen were all parties to the bond in question. The contractor, Smith, signed it as principal, and appellant, Nelson, and defendant Stevenson signed as sureties. Such joinder of principal and sureties in an action is authorized. Code Civ. Proc. § 383; Rice Sureties Co. v. Daggs, 63 Cal. App. 273, 277, 218 P. 484; Rodabaugh v. Kauffman, 53 Cal. App. 676, 682, 200 P. 747. In regard to the joinder of the school district and trustees, it may be said that, while it was not necessary to join them, we fail to see how appellant has been prejudiced or injured thereby. Plaintiff's cause of action arose out of his contract with the contractor, Smith, appellant's principal, and, while the liability of the trustees or the school district, if any, might differ, nevertheless it is based upon plaintiff's contract with Smith, the contractor, and, in order to prevail against any of these defendants, plaintiff would be compelled to prove the performance of his contract with Smith to furnish materials for the construction of this school building. It is well settled that an error overruling a demurrer for misjoinder of parties defendant after a trial on the merits is not ground for the reversal of the judgment unless the party demurring has been misled to his prejudice or the error otherwise appears to have been injurious. 2 Cal. Jur. 1012; Asevado v. Orr, 100 Cal. 300, 34 P. 777; Hirshfeld v. Weill, 121 Cal. 14, 53 P. 402. Were we to concede "that the special demurrer for misjoinder might have been properly sustained by the trial court, the concession is of no avail here. This for the reason that under section 4½ of article VI of the Constitution it could not be said that the overruling of the demurrer was such an error as had produced a miscarriage of justice." Trask v. Garza, 51 Cal. App. 743, 197 P. 807.

[4-6] Appellant contends that, because plaintiff's procedure is a compliance with section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, he cannot enforce the liability of bondsmen given pursuant to the Public Works Act of 1919. A reading of the Public Works Act demonstrates that such act is a remedy in addition to and cumulative with the remedy given by section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the two remedies are intended to be co-operative in effect. There is nothing in the Public Works Act which expressly or impliedly says that a materialman must elect between these two remedies, or that, if he seeks one, he waives the other. On the contrary, the act of 1919 expressly makes the right to recover on the bond an additional and cumulative remedy, for, in section

1 thereof, it is provided that, unless the bond is filed, no claim shall be allowed in favor of the contractor. This obviously is a penalty placed on the contractor for failure to file the bond, but the act provides that nevertheless materialmen shall be entitled to be paid in accordance with section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Hence it is apparent that the act of 1919 is not an exclusive remedy, but is a cumulative one, and one created in view of the rights given under section 1184. The only condition which must be performed by the materialman to establish his right against the surety under the act of 1919 is that "he shall file with the body by whom the contract was awarded a verified statement of his claim, together with a statement that the same has not been paid." Here plaintiff has filed such verified statement, as shown by the pleadings and the claim admitted in evidence. The fact that this statement is denominated "A Notice to Withhold," or that it is also sufficient to comply with section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, does not make it any the less sufficient as a compliance with the Public Works Act. It is a verified statement containing an itemized list of the materials furnished, together with a statement that the same has not been paid. Appellant apparently urges that, until there is a pro rata payment under section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, no cause of action exists against the bondsmen. The act of 1919 does not require that plaintiff first proceed under section 1184 et seq. The period within which suit may be commenced on the bond as provided in the act of 1919 shows that there need be no steps taken under section 1184 or any waiting for a pro rata payment. The act of 1919 requiring that action on the bond be commenced within 90 days following the period within which claims of lien must be filed for record, it is obvious that, if a materialman was first required to bring an action under section 1184a, a period of time would not only possibly, but probably, expire in excess of 90 days from the time when claims of lien must be filed for record, and hence the bondsmen would, by insisting upon the plaintiff first exhausting his rights pursuant to section 1184 et seq., avoid liability for any portion of a materialman's claim. Such construction would defeat the purpose of the act.

[7] If plaintiff has succeeded in reducing his claim against the bondsmen by complying with the provisions of section 1184 et seq., the bondsmen are relieved to that extent, and cannot consistently complain.

[8] As to appellant's contention that the action is barred, it may be said the Public Works Act provides that the statement of the materialman's claim shall be filed with the body by whom the contract was awarded prior to the expiration of the period within which claims of lien must be recorded, as prescribed by section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that suit must be commenced against the contractor's bondsmen within 90 days after the expiration of that period. In this case the contractor abandoned the work on November 22, 1922, and the building was not completed until January, 1923, when notice of completion was filed. If the abandonment by the contractor should be deemed to constitute a cessation of labor under section 1187, such cessation did not constitute completion until it had continued for 30 days, making the time of completion December 22, 1922; there being no notice of completion filed within 10 days thereafter, the time within which to file claims of lien did not expire until March 22, 1923, 90 days after December 22, 1922. If, however, January 24, 1923, when the notice of completion was filed, be deemed the date of completion, the period within which claims of lien must be filed would be 30 days thereafter or to and including February 22, 1923, and plaintiff would have 90 days thereafter or until May 23, 1923, within which to commence its action. In either event the action was commenced within the required time, as the complaint was filed on May 18, 1923. This being an action against appellant on his bond given pursuant to the Public Works Act, and not for foreclosure of a lien, appellant's argument, invoking the period prescribed by section 1190 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the authorities he cites, have no application.

[9] Appellant's statement in his brief that the bond was executed and filed after the date of the commencement of the work is not borne out by the record. Aside from the fact that the presumption is that the board of trustees performed every duty imposed on it, and that therefore it exacted a bond from the contractor (Stone v. Shackelford, 64 Cal. App. 750, 222 P. 846), the witness J. J. Young, clerk of the board of trustees, testified that, before the work was started, this bond was filed with the trustees.

[10] It is claimed that the bond was given for the construction of a building, while the complaint refers to the improvements as buildings. The complaint alleges the contract to be one between E. Porter Smith and Soquel Union School district, entered into on May 17, 1922, for the sum of $44,735. The bond refers to the contract as the contract between the same parties for the same amount made on the same date, and for the same character of work and improvements. The bond is set out as an exhibit in the complaint and made a part thereof. There is no evidence or claim that any other contract was entered into between this contractor and the board of trustees. The court was entitled to and reasonably should have concluded that it was the contract alleged that was referred to in the bond and the contract to secure which the bond was given.

[11] Appellant contends that he is not liable by reason of a settlement by the principal without his consent as surety; that section 2819 of the Civil Code alone is sufficient authority. This section provides: "A guarantor is exonerated, except so far as he may be indemnified by the principal, if by any act of the creditor, without the consent of the guarantor, the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect, or the remedies or rights of the creditor against the principal, in respect thereto, in any way impaired or suspended." The situation here presented is not a settlement or compromise by plaintiff with the school board. The full amount of plaintiff's claim being $10,213.39, and the school board having $5,017 on hand to pay towards plaintiff's claim, it consented that judgment be entered against it for this amount. If plaintiff was satisfied to take judgment against the defendant bondsmen for $5,193.39, allowing the bondsmen credit for the amount for which the school board confessed judgment, appellant has not been injured. Plaintiff was under no obligation to prove that there was a larger amount in the hands of the trustees than they admitted, and appellant was at liberty to make such proof by examination of the trustees or such other persons as were informed upon the subject. The authorities cited by appellant that a creditor cannot, without the consent of the guarantor, alter the original obligation with the principal have no application to the present case. The school board was not a principal on appellant's bond nor a party thereto other than a creditor. Smith was the principal on appellant's bond, and plaintiff did not alter the obligation of Smith, nor have the rights or remedies of the plaintiff against the principal been suspended nor the sureties' rights injured or impaired.

[12] There is no merit in appellant's contention that plaintiff's claim was not properly verified. The verification shows that E. H. Galpin, who verified the claim, is the manager of the plaintiff corporation, and that he verified the claim on behalf of the corporation. The act of 1919 merely requires that the statement be verified, without designating who shall make the verification. It is similar to the verification to claims of lien required by section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under which it is held the verification may be made by any person who knows the facts. Parke & Lacey Co. v. Inter Nos Oil Co., 147 Cal. 494, 82 P. 51.

[13] It is appellant's claim that there is no proof as to the exact amount in the hands of the school board remaining unpaid to the contractor, and therefore there may be sufficient funds to meet plaintiff's demand. The act does not require that plaintiff exhaust his remedy before proceeding against the bondsmen. And, as has been said, appellant had ample opportunity to show that the board had funds to apply on this claim in excess of the amount for which it confessed judgment.

[14] There is no merit in appellant's contention that the complaint does not state a cause of action against him. The complaint alleges in legal effect the agreement entered into between the contractor and plaintiff under which plaintiff agreed to furnish certain building materials set forth and described in the "Notice to Withhold" annexed to the complaint and made a part thereof, "said building materials to be used in the construction of said buildings and improvements. * * * That all of said materials were furnished to be used and were actually used in the erection and construction of said buildings and improvements," while the bond recites that the agreement was entered into for the "erection of a Union Grammar School Building." The "Notice to Withhold" attached to the complaint, which is duly verified, contains an itemized statement of the materials supplied, together with a statement that the "materials were to be and were actually used in the construction and erection of that certain structure, now being erected on the land and premises occupied by the Soquel Union Grammar School situate at Soquel, Santa Cruz County, California."

[15, 16] It is true, as urged by appellant, that "whatever is an essential element of a cause of action must be presented by a distinct averment and cannot be left to an inference to be drawn from the construction of a document attached to the complaint" (Panter v. National Surety Co., 36 Cal. App. 46, 171 P. 803, 804), and that "recitals in a contract incorporated in a complaint will not supply the want of essential averments in the pleading" (Hayt v. Bentel, 164 Cal. 686, 130 P. 434). While a demurrer for uncertainty here might have been sustained, no such ground appears in the demurrer filed by defendant. A general demurrer does not lie, if the plaintiff is entitled to any relief under the allegations of the complaint. Knowles v. Baldwin, 125 Cal. 224, 57 P. 988; San Francisco Paving Co. v. Fairfield, 134 Cal. 220, 66 P. 255.

[17] As to the contention that there is no allegation as to when the contractor should pay for the materials furnished, it may be said that, in the absence of an express allegation, such time is fixed by law as being the time of delivery of the materials. Civ. Code, § 1657; Clairmonte v. Napier Motor Co., 11 Cal. App. 265, 104 P. 712.

[18, 19] As to appellant's objection that "there is no allegation that the Soquel School District was or is a political subdivision or agency of the State of California," it may be said "the school district is a necessary political division of the county under the direction and supervision of the local authorities for the promotion of the general educational purposes of the state, the system being a matter of general concern and 'not a municipal affair.'" People v. Rinner, 52 Cal. App. 752, 199 P. 1069. It is evident that the act of 1919, pursuant to which this bond was given, was intended to apply to all those agencies or divisions of government, the buildings or structures of which were not subject to lien, and that, when defendant admits in his answer that the Soquel union school district is a duly organized and existing school district and a public corporation, he admits it is a state agency and political subdivision, and no further proof of such fact is required.

[20] We are not in accord with appellant's contention that the court erred in striking out his equitable defense of estoppel. The most that can be said of this defense is that appellant in his answer alleges that, prior to the execution of this bond, which it is not claimed was expressly authorized or executed with the knowledge of plaintiff or its officers or directors, appellant, who was in the employ of plaintiff, had executed other similar bonds that the plaintiff might secure certain business, and that, on other previous occasions, some of the officers of the plaintiff company had requested appellant to sign similar bonds. It is not alleged or claimed that plaintiff or its officers or directors authorized or directed appellant to sign this particular bond, nor is it alleged or claimed that they had any knowledge that appellant proposed to execute this bond or had done so. When the case came on for trial, an answer had been filed on behalf of appellant containing merely a general denial. The present counsel appeared for the first time on the morning of the trial and announced that he was ready to proceed to trial with the stipulation that the defendant Nelson be privileged to file his answer after the trial was concluded. It was then stipulated that defendant Nelson's answer would admit and deny certain allegations of the complaint, but no suggestion of any special defense of equitable estoppel was made in the stipulation; the defenses urged being that the statement filed by plaintiff was not sufficient to meet the requirements of the Public Works Act and that plaintiff's claim was barred by the provisions of the Public Works Act or sections 1184 to 1184c of the Code of Civil Procedure. "Mr. Gallagher: Yes, I am going to deny that the withhold notice was filed with the board, and I am going to deny that the document purporting to be a withhold notice is a withhold notice, and I am also going to allege by way of special defense that the plaintiff's claim is barred by the particular statute they predicate their action on." Pursuant to this stipulation, the case proceeded to trial, and the evidence was adduced. The court had a full and complete understanding of the entire case, and, when appellant's counsel sought to urge in his answer, when filed, an issue other than that contained in the stipulation and in addition to that upon which the case was tried, the court properly refused to permit him to do so.

[21] Appellant finally complains of the fact that attorney's fees are included in the judgment: First, for the reason that plaintiff proceeded under section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and, second, the Public Works Act provides that attorney's fees must be taxed as costs. The first objection we have already considered. With respect to the second, it is true that the act provides for attorney's fees to be taxed as costs and to be included in the judgment, but the fixing of attorney's fees must be by the court, and, if included in the judgment, must naturally be fixed at the time of the rendition of the decision, so that the amount so allowed may be so included in the judgment. The act does not expressly or impliedly require that a cost bill be filed under section 1033 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Furthermore, we fail to see how appellant has been in any way prejudiced.

This disposes of the objections urged, and from what has been said it follows that we find no error calling for a reversal of the judgment.

Judgment is affirmed.

GRASSIE et al. v. AMERICAN LA FRANCE FIRE ENGINE CO. et al. (Civ. 3566.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 10, 1928.

1. Automobiles ⚷224(1)—One voluntarily assuming dangerous position of passenger on fire engine during test run assumed risk ordinarily incident to that dangerous position.

One voluntarily assuming dangerous position of passenger on fire engine during test run assumed risk ordinarily incident to such dangerous position, and fire engine company was not liable for injury arising from such risks.

2. Automobiles ⚷224(1)—One voluntarily becoming passenger on fire engine during test run must take greater precautions for his own safety than passenger in ordinary automobile.

One voluntarily assuming dangerous position of passenger on fire engine during test run was required, in exercise of due care which law always exacts, to take greater precautions for his own safety than if he were passenger in ordinary automobile.

3. Automobiles ⚷175(1, 4)—Fire engine company carrying passenger on test run had same duty as to speed and care as in ordinary run to fire.

Where person voluntarily assumed dangerous position of passenger on fire engine during test run, fire engine company was only under obligation to run at same speed and use same care and caution as is usual when fire apparatuses travel to fire.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Katherine F. Grassie and others against the American La France Fire Engine Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Morin, Newell & Brown, of Pasadena, and Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Lucius K. Chase, of Los Angeles (Lucius F. Chase, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. The plaintiffs brought this action to recover damages for the death of William S. Grassie, which they allege was caused by the negligence of defendants.

The case was tried before the court sitting with a jury, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant and judgment was thereupon entered. From this judgment the plaintiffs prosecute this appeal.

Mr. Grassie was killed when a fire engine, upon which he was riding, owned and operated by the defendant American La France Fire Engine Company, collided with a telegraph pole, during the time said fire engine was making a test run. The specific negligence alleged in plaintiffs' complaint is as follows: "The said defendant (American La France Fire Engine Company) by its agents and servants * * * did procure said W. S. Grassie to mount said apparatus, occupy a seat, and they did then drive said apparatus rapidly in a westerly direction along Mariposa Street at a high rate of speed and in the vicinity of Marengo Avenue, approached a double curve at a high, unlawful and reckless rate of speed. They did fail to operate said machine on the right hand side of the highway, but did operate and drive said machine upon the center and also upon the left hand side of a highly crowned highway, and by reason of said high speed, and by reason of the operation of said vehicle in the wrong portion of the highway, and a portion not designed to accommodate vehicles traveling at a high speed in a westerly direction, did fail to properly control said vehicle and did recklessly and negligently drive and propel said vehicle in a tangent from said curve, which was a double curve, across certain parallel railway tracks, and over and against a certain telephone pole, against which said apparatus came in contact. That by reason of the collision with said pole, said W. S. Grassie was crushed, suffering grievous bodily injuries, solely from the effect of which he died. * * *"

The answer of the defendants raised several defenses, among them being: (a) That there was no negligence on the part of either of the defendants; (b) that the accident occurred solely as a result of the negligence of the deceased, in that his elbow interfered with the arm of the driver, causing the driver momentarily to lose control of his machine, resulting in the accident; (c) that even assuming that defendant was traveling in excess of the legal speed, deceased was contributorily negligent, in that, having knowingly placed himself in a dangerous position in riding on the fire engine as an observer on a test run made at the same speed as would generally be made in going to a fire, he assumed the risk ordinarily incident to such a run; (d) that even assuming defendants' negligence, and assuming also that no risk was assumed by deceased, or by assuming that defendants were negligent beyond the risk assumed by deceased, nevertheless recovery was barred by reason of the contributory negligence of deceased, in that he held the arm of the driver with his elbow and thus caused the accident.

The facts are these: Altadena is an unincorporated residential town in Los Angeles county. The board of supervisors of Los Angeles county had, prior to the death of William S. Grassie, which occurred on March 17, 1924, organized what is known as the "Altadena County Fire Protection District," which included the town of Altadena. On or about the 25th of February, 1924, said board of supervisors had made arrangements to purchase from the defendant American La France Fire Engine Company one fire engine for the Altadena district. Some of the citizens of Altadena had suggested to the officers of the Altadena county fire protection district that two fire engines would be required for the protection of the district. The county fire department was opposed to the purchase of two engines, claiming that one engine placed as nearly in the center of the district as possible would afford ample fire protection. To determine the question, Mr. Johnson, deputy chief of the county fire department, arranged with the defendant American La France Fire Engine Company to take a fire engine, such as the district intended to purchase, to Altadena and to make test runs with it from the central portion of the district to the outlying territory. The fire engine was to be run on these tests at the same rate of speed that fire engines ordinarily travel in going to a fire. Pursuant to this arrangement, the defendant American La France Fire Engine Company sent a fire engine from Los Angeles to Altadena in charge of defendant George Kenley, who was the delivery engineer of the defendant company. Mr. Kenley drove this engine to a point near the center of the district and was there met by a committee of citizens of Altadena, among whom was the deceased, William S. Grassie. The defendant George H. Herold, the sales manager of the defendant company, and a Mr. Barker, the battalion chief of the county fire department, were also present. Several test runs were made with the engine, running from a garage located about in the center of the district to the outlying portions of the district in several directions. On these runs, Mr. Herold, Mr. Barker, and a Mr. Graham were passengers. Mr. Graham was president of the citizens' committee. After several runs had been made, Mr. Graham had to leave and requested the deceased, Mr. Grassie, to take his place on the engine and ride with the driver and observe the time that the engine made in making the test runs. Up to this time all the tests had been made to the east boundary of the district. The engine was now to make a test run from the same starting point to the west boundary of the district. Mr. Barker, the battalion chief and an employé of the county of Los Angeles, seeing the deceased start to get on the rear of the engine, requested him to take the front seat by the side of the driver, which was done. Mr. Kenley was the driver of the engine; Herold and Barker were also on the engine. The streets were cleared of traffic for the run. The engine traveled up Lake street and turned onto Mariposa street and proceeded down that street at a speed of between 30 and 35 miles an hour. There were several curves in the street. The first curve was a curve to the left and a second curve was a curve to the right. The engine approached the curves from the east and negotiated the first curve to the left without difficulty at a speed of about 30 miles an hour, and reached the second curve at a speed of 20 to 24 miles an hour, but instead of fully making the right curve the engine left the road, went through a fence for a distance of about 75 feet, and struck a telephone pole on the right of way of the Pacific Electric Railroad, throwing the deceased from his seat on the fire engine and instantly killing him.

While the evidence is somewhat conflicting on the point, there was substantial testimony to the effect that before the second or right-hand curve was reached, and while on that curve, the driver of a vehicle approaching from the east could see ahead a distance of 350 to 500 feet, and that the curve could be made with the engine at a speed of 30 miles an hour with safety. The engine was a right-hand drive. Mr. Kenley, the driver of the truck, testified that as he started to turn it to the right, Mr. Grassie's body swayed toward him and Mr. Grassie's elbow came over his left arm, applying a pressure and preventing him from turning the steering wheel to the right to take the curve.

Appellants make this contention: "A reversal of this case is sought on the ground that the court misdirected the jury as a matter of law, principally on the ground that the court directed the jury as a matter of law that deceased was at the time in a joint undertaking or enterprise with the defendants and that any negligence of the defendants was, therefore, chargeable to the deceased. * * * There is no question of assumption of risk involved in this case. It was a clear case of the deceased being an invited guest and, therefore, neither the assumption of risk or joint adventure had anything whatever to do with the case."

The court did not instruct the jury that, as a matter of law, the deceased was engaged in a joint enterprise, but did instruct the jury in effect that if it found that Mr. Grassie participated in a test run of a fire engine, made at the same rate of speed at which a fire engine ordinarily travels to a fire, and that he made no objection to the speed, that he assumed the risk of the dangers resulting from traveling at a speed faster than the limit allowed by law, provided the speed was such as was used in going to a fire.

These instructions are based entirely upon the familiar principle of law stated in 19 California Jurisprudence, p. 589, as follows: "One who, for the purposes of his own, voluntarily places himself in a position of danger, assumes the risks ordinarily incident to such a position, and must exercise a quantum of care commensurate with the additional danger." See, also, Graff v. United Railroads, 178 Cal. 171, 172 P. 603; Morgan v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., 13 Cal. App. 12, 108 P. 735; Roberts v. Sierra R. R. Co., 14 Cal. App. 180, 111 P. 519, 527; Trousclair v. Pacific Coast Steam-Ship Co., 80 Cal. 521–524, 22 P. 258; Fisher v. Southern Pacific Co., 89 Cal. 399, 26 P. 894; Clark v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé R. R. Co., 164 Cal. 363, 128 P. 1032.

[1-3] Appellants contend that deceased was an invited guest of the defendants. We are unable to find in the record any evidence that any of the agents or employés of the fire engine company invited deceased to become a passenger on this fatal run. Mr. Graham, the president of the citizens' committee, requested deceased to make the trip, and Mr. Barker, an employé of the county, told him what position to take on the engine. However, it seems to us to be entirely immaterial whether Mr. Grassie was an invited guest or not. Mr. Grassie knew that the engine was going to make a run just the same as if it was going to a fire; he also knew that fire engines going to a fire traveled at a high rate of speed, and he knew the condition of the streets over which the run was to be made. Notwithstanding all these facts, Mr. Grassie voluntarily assumed the dangerous position of a passenger on this fire engine on this test run.

Under these circumstances, we hold that Mr. Grassie assumed the risk ordinarily incident to that dangerous position, irrespective of his status, and the defendant fire engine company was not liable for any injury sustained by him arising from the risks ordinarily incident to the dangerous position which he had voluntarily assumed. Manifestly, a passenger upon a fire engine going to a fire is not in a safe place. It was therefore incumbent upon Mr. Grassie, in the exercise of the due care which the law always exacts, to take greater precautions for his own safety than if he were a passenger in an ordinary automobile. Upon the other hand, the fire engine company was only under obligation to run at the same rate of speed and use the same degree of care and caution that fire apparatuses usually run and operate in traveling to a fire. Kelly v. Santa Barbara Railroad Co., 171 Cal. 415, 153 P. 903, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 67; Clark v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé R. R. Co., supra.

Appellants rely upon the case of Curran v. Earle C. Anthony, Inc., 77 Cal. App. 462, 247 P. 236. The facts of that case are entirely different from those in the case at bar. In that case the plaintiff merely went riding in a touring car with the salesman to demonstrate the automobile to a prospective purchaser and was killed through the negligence of the salesman. The widow of the deceased brought an action for damages against the salesman and Earle C. Anthony, Inc., the owner of the car, and recovered a judgment against both. On appeal it was contended that deceased was engaged in a joint enterprise with the salesman. The court held, under the facts, that deceased and the salesman were not engaged in a joint enterprise within the meaning of the law of negligence. The question of deceased assuming a dangerous position was not there involved.

Appellants further contend that the court erred in giving certain other instructions. We have examined all the instructions given, and, taken as a whole, they fully and fairly state the law upon all the issues involved.

We think the judgment was correct under the facts and the law, and should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Charles H. Mattingly, of Los Angeles, for respondent Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Co.

STROTHER, Justice pro tem. The first named of the above actions was instituted by the city attorney of the city of Los Angeles, under the authority of section 731 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in the name of the people of the state of California, to abate and enjoin a nuisance which the defendants Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Company, a corporation, and Hawley and others, directors of the company, were alleged to be committing and maintaining. The facts of the alleged nuisance, as set out in the complaint, were that the defendants were excavating rock, sand, and gravel in the residential district of Los Angeles by means of steam shovels and that the smoke, dust, and noise resulting from its operation were a menace to the health and comfort of its inhabitants; that they were excavating sand and gravel from the company's holdings along Arroyo Seco, or dry creek, in that neighborhood, in a manner to create pools of stagnant water detrimental to the public health, and removing the natural banks of the creek, thereby subjecting the streets of the city and residence lots in the district to the danger of damage and destruction by flood waters and depriving them of lateral support.

The defendants answered, denying the material allegations of the complaint specifically, and setting up that certain other actions were pending between the city of Los Angeles and defendant Rock & Gravel Company, involving the right of the defendant to continue its operation; that retaining walls had been built by the defendant and others were to be built to restrain any flood waters that might come down the creek; that no such waters could come down, as the Los Angeles flood control district had constructed a dam in the hills which would impound all flood water; that the purpose and object of the city in instigating the suit was to confiscate the property of defendant without compensation; that besides lands owned by it along the creek, defendant held a short-time lease on 15 acres having deposits of sand and gravel of the net value of $675,000.

The trial court found that the defendant could continue its operations on its own land with certain restrictions upon the extent and manner of its excavation and by building walls to control the flood waters and give lateral support to adjoining lands; that the leased land might be excavated along the creek channel, but that the excavation of the remainder of it would endanger streets and property adjacent which could not be protected by the building of a wall; that the net value of the deposits on the leased land was $675,000. Decree was entered accordingly, providing for excavation of defendants' land under regulations laid down, and enjoining the excavation of the leased land. The first part of the decree was accepted by the parties, and it is from the latter part that defendants prosecute their appeal.

The only points seriously urged by appellants are: (1) That the finding that the leased lands could not be excavated, and adjacent lands protected by a wall, is not supported by the evidence; (2) that the judgment is erroneous because, in effect, a confiscation of defendants' property for public use without compensation; (3) that the judgment, if permitted to stand, should be so amended by the court as to give judgment in favor of defendant Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Company and against the city of Los Angeles, in the sum of $675,000, the net value of the deposits in the leased land as found by the court.

[1] As to the first point, it is conceded by appellants that the evidence was conflicting; but it is claimed that the physical facts disclosed are so inconsistent with the conclusion of the court as to make the evidence upon which it was based not worthy of credence. The physical facts adverted to are that the banks of the creek consist of loose sand, rock, and gravel, subject to erosion by the flood waters. But it further appeared that the leased land was a table-land rising some distance above the level of the creek, and it cannot be said, as a matter of fact, that the resistant power of the weight and extent of the deposit could be supplied by an artificial wall. The finding of the court being based upon substantial evidence cannot therefore be disturbed.

[2] As to the second point, appellants' position seems to be, though it is not precisely defined, that, their interest in the land being only to do the things which the court held to be a menace to the public welfare, they were in a different situation from the owner of the whole estate, because the result of the judgment was to destroy the whole value of their interest. If their contention were correct, the most obnoxious nuisance might by a very simple device be placed on an impregnable position. The land remains to its owner to be used for whatever lawful purpose he may see fit to use it.

The authorities to the effect that the use of property in a manner detrimental to the public health or safety may be abated, however valuable the use be to the owner, are too numerous and too uniform to require specific citation. What has just been said disposes also of the third contention of appellants; but it may be observed that they have not pointed out how this court could, in any event, render a judgment against the city of Los Angeles, which is not a party to the action.

The two other actions were brought by Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Company against the city of Los Angeles and the mayor and other officials of the city to enjoin the enforcement of two several penal ordinances of the city forbidding such operations as those of plaintiff in certain sections of the city which by ordinance had been set apart as a strictly residence district. The three actions were tried upon the same evidence and separately appealed upon one transcript, and stipulated to be and ordered heard together on appeal. In the two latter cases judgments were given in favor of the plaintiff, from which the respective defendants appeal.

The facts alleged by plaintiff pertinent to the question are that it is the owner in fee and holder under lease of lands which are chiefly valuable for their deposits of rock, sand, and gravel which can be excavated and removed for sale; that it has a very large investment in its business, many contracts for its material unfulfilled, and a great prospective profit from the operation of its business which will be destroyed if defendant is permitted to enforce its ordinances; that while the lands which plaintiff was excavating are within a residence district as defined by the city's ordinance, the district is so thinly populated that its operations will not be detrimental to the public welfare. The tract of land involved in these two actions and upon which plaintiff was operating is the same tract as that which the court enjoined the plaintiff from excavating in the case of People v. Hawley et al., hereinbefore considered.

There are many averments in the pleadings on the part of both parties to these actions which are entirely irrelevant to the single issue which should have been presented; i. e., whether or not the ordinances complained of were void as being an arbitrary and unreasonable, and therefore unconstitutional interference with the right of plaintiff to the enjoyment of its property. The complaint sets out that under an act of the Legislature a flood control district was organized which constructed a dam in the mountains, which, it alleges, controls all but exceptional floods coming down a creek abutting upon plaintiff's property, and that the district is authorized by law to make further provision for the control of flood waters. It also alleges that the city of Los Angeles was by law authorized to lease, operate, and own gravel beds and that it was engaged in a nefarious scheme to drive out all competition and acquire all of plaintiff's properties and acquire a monopoly of the kind of business conducted by plaintiff.

The defendant pleaded a contract alleged to have been entered into between plaintiff and defendant by which the former agreed to build walls along the creek and around certain excavations made by it in its operations, and the defendant, in consideration of plaintiff's agreements, agreed not to interfere with excavations which were the subject of an injunction suit between the parties—the particulars of which suit do not appear—and to permit plaintiff to do certain other things evidently relating to matters involved in that suit. Plaintiff filed an amended and supmental complaint alleging that the contract mentioned was never executed and that, if it had been, it was void as in restraint of trade.

What these various matters had to do with the issue to be tried by the court is not apparent to us, yet the bulk of the voluminous pleadings and findings of the court are devoted to them except that the court made no findings whether or not the city had the evil intent attributed to it. The pleading of such matters, with the consequent burden upon the trial court of hearing evidence and making findings, serves merely to befog the real issue and makes the task of a reviewing court almost as onerous as that of the proverbial searcher for the "needle in a haystack."

Pleading is the final test of a lawyer's knowledge of the facts of his case and the law applicable to the facts. The injection of a great mass of irrelevant and redundant matter into a pleading is evidence that the pleader is either too ignorant to know what it is all about or too indolent to find out. Counsel state that the taking of the joint evidence in the three cases consumed seven weeks, and the size of the reporter's transcript confirms the statement. Only an infinitesimal amount of that evidence is set forth in counsels' briefs, but the judgment rolls in the two latter cases make a large printed volume, and in the former, a considerable part of another.

[3-7] The reasonableness of any legislative act under the police power is presumed when it appears upon its face from common knowledge of its subject-matter to be reasonable. If it does not so appear, any one attacking its validity must plead and prove facts showing that it is unreasonable.

It is contended by respondent that each of the ordinances is arbitrary and unreasonable upon its face. The ordinances forbid the carrying on of operations such as plaintiff's in residence districts established by a zoning ordinance of the city. The power of municipalities to adopt zoning ordinances has been upheld. Miller v. Board of Public Works, 195 Cal. 477, 234 P. 381, 38 A. L. R. 1479. It is not apparent that forbidding the operation of steam shovels or the excavating of deep holes in a residence district is an arbitrary or unreasonable regulation; on the contrary, it would appear that such operations might easily depreciate or destroy the value of such a district for residence purposes and render ineffective the zoning ordinance.

It was, therefore, incumbent upon the plaintiff to allege and prove such facts and circumstances as would show the arbitrary and unreasonable application of the ordinances under existing conditions. The plaintiff claims that the enforcement of the ordinance will result in the taking of its property without due process of law by prohibiting its most valuable use. The right to a beneficial use of private property, however, has always been held subject to such limitation as the state, in the exercise of its police power, may lawfully impose.

The only allegations in the complaints from which it might be inferred that the application of the ordinances to plaintiff's business was arbitrary and unreasonable is that the district in which it was being conducted was not in fact a residence district, but that all of its land "is an uninhabited district, and the territory around it is thinly inhabited," as expressed in one complaint and by similar allegations in the other complaint. The court, however, found to the contrary of the statements in these allegations. The judgment of the court is not supported by the findings.

The judgment in the case of People v. Hawley et al. is affirmed. The judgments in the cases of Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Co. v. City of Los Angeles and the Same Plaintiff v. City of Los Angeles, Cryer et al., are reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgments in favor of the defendants.

HENDRICKSON v. HENDRICKSON.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 14, 1928.

1. Husband and wife ⚿49½(6)—Husband held not entitled to restoration of property given his wife, though she attended dances without his knowledge, and afterwards lost her affection for and left him.

Husband is not entitled to restoration of property which by way of gift he unconditionally conveyed to her, without being induced by fraud to do so, though she attended dances without his knowledge, and afterwards because of his conduct lost her affection for and left him; she never having been guilty of meretricious relations.

2. Deeds ⚿19—Nonpayment of recited consideration in deed of gift is not ground for cancellation.

Conveyance being intended and made and received and accepted as a gift, donor is not entitled to cancellation because the recited nominal consideration was not paid.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by James Hendrickson against Maude Hendrickson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. A. Rogers, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Fred A. Watkins, of Long Beach, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Plaintiff by this action seeks the cancellation of a deed to certain real property. The complaint alleges, in substance, that at the time the conveyance was made the parties were husband and wife, and plaintiff, believing that defendant entertained love and affection for him, made the transfer to his wife, upon her request, for their sole use and benefit and upon the promise that she would reconvey the property to him at any time he desired. It is then charged that defendant, when she made the promise, intended to retain the same for her sole use and benefit, and that after receiving the conveyance her attitude immediately changed and she became unbearable, and subsequently deserted plaintiff and their children. Defendant denied these allegations. The trial court found in substance that defendant did not make any false or fraudulent representations to plaintiff in order to procure the conveyance, or that she ever agreed to reconvey the property to him upon his request, but that, on the contrary, such conveyance was a voluntary act on plaintiff's part and was intended as a gift, and was accepted by defendant as such. Judgment in favor of defendant followed.

[1] It is here claimed that the evidence shows conclusively that the execution and delivery of the deed were obtained by means of fraud and deception, and also that title never passed for the reason that defendant failed to pay the consideration of $10 named in the deed. There is no merit in these contentions. There was evidence to show that at the time the conveyance was made the parties had been married for a period of over seven years, and that defendant during that time entertained love and affection for her husband and had borne him three children and was pregnant when the deed passed with twins, as their birth about three months later developed. Defendant admitted that her affections had undergone a change due to the fact that plaintiff insisted upon her submitting herself to a physician for the purpose of having an operation performed at a time when she was pregnant. It also appeared in evidence that defendant was fond of and attended dances without the knowledge of her husband, and it is claimed that by reason of this fact and the change in her affections, together with the additional fact that she subsequently left her husband, entitled him to a restoration of the property. We do not think so. It may be that in a case where a wife has prevailed upon her husband to make a gift to her of property under the false pretense that she was fond of him, when in fact she had determined to desert or abandon him upon securing the conveyance, or where at such time she was carrying on adulterous relations with another, such acts would constitute actual fraud entitling the donor to a restoration of his property, and especially so where it appeared that the conveyance would not have been made but for the deception. Murdock v. Murdock, 49 Cal. App. 775, 194 P. 762. But this is not such a case. There is no evidence to show that defendant was ever guilty of meretricious relations. The record contains ample evidence to show that defendant was fond of her husband at the time of the conveyance, and whatever change may have taken place in her affections subsequently was caused by the act of the defendant in demanding that she undergo an illegal operation and other acts of cruelty practiced by him upon her. There is abundant evidence in the record to show that the conveyance was freely and voluntarily made, and without any promise on the part of defendant to reconvey to the husband upon his request.

[2] Equally without merit is the claim that cancellation should be decreed because the consideration of $10 expressed in the deed was not paid. Upon this question the trial court found that the conveyance was intended and made as a gift and was received and accepted as such. The evidence supports the finding.

The judgment is affirmed.

ANGLO CALIFORNIA TRUST CO. v. KELLY et al. (Civ. 6249.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. Dec. 11, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 9, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 7, 1929.

1. Appeal and error 🔑957(1)—Judgment 🔑139—Trial court's disposition of application to set aside default is largely discretionary, and will not be set aside unless abuse clearly appears (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Action of court upon application to set aside default under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, rests very largely in discretion of trial court, and will not be disturbed on appeal unless abuse of discretion clearly appears.

2. Appeal and error 🔑957(1)—Order on application to set aside default will stand, unless unsupported by any evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Order of trial court on application to set aside default, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, will not be disturbed on appeal, unless order is without any evidence whatever to sustain it.

3. Judgment 🔑143(11)—Refusal to set aside default occasioned by failure of defendant's attorney to appear at trial held not abuse of discretion, though defendant himself procured illegal transfer of case to another department.

Trial court's refusal of application to set aside default held not abuse of discretion, where failure of defendant's attorney to appear at date set for trial was explained as due to information which he received concerning his client's activities in having the case removed to another department for jury trial, since facts did not show excusable neglect, and attorney should have known that transfer by client was illegal.

4. Attorney and client 🔑88—Attorney has exclusive management of case, and client prior to changing attorneys cannot assume control.

Party to action must appear either in person or by attorney, and party appearing through attorney, though permitted to change attorneys, may not prior to that time assume control of the case, since attorney has exclusive management and control.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action by the Anglo California Trust Company against John Kelly and wife and Lillian Kelly and others. Judgment was entered for plaintiff by default, and, from an order overruling a motion to set aside default, defendants named appeal. Affirmed.

Grover O'Connor, of San Francisco, for respondent administrator.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls and Lee M. Olds, all of San Francisco, for defendant Commerce Oil & Leasing Co.

TYLER, P. J. [1, 2] Appeal from a default judgment. The action was one brought for the foreclosure of two mortgages. The case was regularly set for trial, and, defendants failing to appear, the court took evidence and entered its decree of foreclosure. This decree was recorded on March 27, 1926, and notice thereof was duly given to defendants. Thereafter a notice of motion to set aside the default was made under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The motion came on regularly for hearing, and was denied, and the sole question here presented is whether or not the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to vacate the decree. It is, of course, elementary, that the action of a court upon an application to set aside a default, or grant relief therefrom, rests so largely in its discretion that it will not be disturbed on appeal unless it shall be made clearly to appear that there was an abuse of this discretion. Pickerill v. Strain, 196 Cal. 683, 239 P. 323. While it has been said in some cases that this discretion is better exercised when it tends to bring about a decision of the cause upon its merits, the rule itself has never been relaxed. Ingrim v. Epperson, 137 Cal. 372, 70 P. 165. The matter being discretionary and reviewable only for abuse, it may well be that this court would sustain an order denying such relief in one case and deny it in another, where the facts presented to the lower court were practically the same in both, because this court would not say that there was an abuse of discretion in either event. Lynn v. Knobb, etc., Co., 177 Cal. 56, 169 P. 1009. In other words, it must be shown that the order is without any evidence whatsoever to sustain it.

[3] Considering all the facts and circumstances as disclosed by the record, we are of the opinion that the court below did not abuse its discretion in refusing to vacate and set aside the decree. It appears from the affidavits presented on the motion that the case was twice regularly noticed for trial. At the time of the first setting of the cause defendants' attorney requested that the matter be allowed to stand over for three weeks upon the understanding that no further continuance would be asked for. Upon this agreement being made, the attorneys for both parties called upon the clerk of department 16 of the court, where the cause was pending, and arranged for a day of trial. The matter was set for March 25, 1926, and plaintiff's attorney served notice of the new date of trial. The matter thereafter continuously appeared on the calendar of department 16 up to the time the default was entered. Prior to the date when the case was thus set for trial, defendants' attorney, who resided in Visalia, sent a written communication to plaintiff's attorney informing him that he had received notice of the setting of the cause. This communication contained a proposed amended answer, which was subsequently filed. Defendants' attorney asked for the exact amount claimed to be due, but, before a reply was given, defendant John J. Kelly, called personally upon plaintiff's attorney and made a similar request. The exact amount due was stated to him, whereupon he attempted to enter into a discussion concerning the matter. Plaintiff's attorney refused to talk about the case except upon the question of immediate payment of the amount due, giving as a reason for such refusal that defendant was represented by an attorney and should act through him. Kelly then made the statement that he would demand a jury. He was informed that, the suit being one in equity, defendants were not entitled to a jury trial. Thereafter Kelly personally consulted with certain officers of the court and filed a demand in person for a jury trial. After the filing of this demand, Kelly delivered to plaintiff's attorney a notice of motion to set the cause for trial. This notice was signed by Kelly alone, his attorney's name nowhere appearing thereon. It contained the recital that the motion would be heard in department 8 of said court on Friday, the 19th day of March, 1926. Plaintiff's attorney ignored the notice, as it was not made by the attorney of record. No notice of the motion appeared upon the calendar of department 8 or in the minutes of the court of said department on that day, but the same did appear on the calendar of department 16. Notwithstanding this fact, Kelly appeared personally in department 8 on the day noticed in support of the motion to set and succeeded in having the cause placed at the foot of the jury calendar in department 8. The judge of department 16 had no knowledge of the proceedings had in department 8, and the matter was ordered dropped from the calendar, but the original order setting the cause for trial on March 25, 1926, remained in full force. Upon procuring the consent of transfer in the manner indicated, Kelly procured a deputy court commissioner to draw up and present to the court a written order of transfer of the cause from department 16 to department 8, a jury department. This order recited that the case was a "jury case" and also that plaintiff had demanded a jury; both recitals being untrue. A copy of this order was mailed to plaintiff's attorney. As above stated, notwithstanding the irregular transfer, the case continued on the calendar of department 16 for trial on March 25, 1926. On this day plaintiff appeared with his witnesses for trial, evidence was taken, and the decree here sought to be set aside was entered.

[4] The affidavit of Kelly's attorney states that the sole reason why he did not appear at the trial was because of the information he had received from his client concerning his activities. Such facts do not, in our opinion, show excusable neglect for his failure to appear at the trial. He knew or should have known that the transfer was irregular and had no effect upon the regularly noticed date of trial. Tubby v. Tubby (Cal. Sup.) 260 P. 294. While a party to an action may appear in his own proper person or by attorney, he cannot do both. If he appears through an attorney, such attorney has the management and control of the action. If a party becomes dissatisfied with his attorney he may make a change. Until this has been done, the client cannot assume control of the case. Boca, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 150 Cal. 153, 88 P. 718. This rule is indispensable to the orderly conduct of a cause. The facts indicate that the activities of Kelly were for the sole purpose of obtaining delay, and offer no excuse for defendants' attorney failing to be present at the time the case was regularly set for trial and of which he had legal notice. Under all the facts and circumstances, the court below was justified in refusing to vacate the decree.

The order is affirmed.

KAUFMAN v. TOMICH et al. (Civ. 6336.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 10, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 9, 1929. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Feb. 7, 1929.

1. Municipal corporations ⚷395(1)—Court was justified in determining damages for subsidence from cost of concrete garage which restored property, where expense was less than that of excavating for retaining wall.

Court's finding as to amount of property owner's damages, due to removal of lateral support by sewer construction, was proper, though based on cost of construction of concrete garage for restoring retaining wall, where evidence showed cost of garage was less than cost of excavating for retaining wall and served same purpose.

2. Appeal and error ⚷221—Defendants could not complain for first time on appeal that incorrect measure of damages was adopted.

Defendants, who tried case below on theory that measure of damages adopted by court in its finding was correct, could not complain for first time on appeal that measure of damages so adopted was improper.

3. Municipal corporations ⚷400—Contractor, sued with city for damages from subsidence due to sewer construction, held solely liable, where plaintiff's retaining wall was not braced as required by specifications.

Where specifications for laying of sewer on street abutting plaintiff's property called for bracing retaining wall, and sewer could have been laid without harming plaintiff's property by contractor's use of proper care, contractor alone was liable for damages caused by removal of lateral support, in suit against contractor and city, where no steps were taken to brace or protect defendant's retaining wall until after damages occurred.

4. Municipal corporations ⚷400—That work planned by city is inherently dangerous does not render city liable for damages caused by contractor.

Municipality is not necessarily liable for damages caused by contractor by reason of fact that the work planned is inherently dangerous, since the amount of danger merely determines the amount of care required of contractor in executing the work.

Strother, Justice pro tem., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by Ethel Clayton Kaufman against Peter Tomich and the city of Los Angeles. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Judgment against defendant Tomich affirmed, and that against defendant City reversed.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Lucius P. Green, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for appellant city of Los Angeles.

Hewitt, Ford, McCormick & Crump, of Los Angeles (J. F. Moroney and Pierce Works, both of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant Tomich.

Miller & Ellis, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STROTHER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for damages to real property. The city council of the city of Los Angeles adopted a resolution of intention to lay a sewer on Fairfield avenue, a street upon which plaintiff's property abuts, to be constructed in accordance with specifications adopted by the council and plans and profiles on file in the office of the city engineer. A contract for the construction was let to the defendant Tomich.

Plaintiff's property was situated on the south side of Fairfield avenue, and sloped at a considerable angle toward the street, and at the line was about 7 feet above the street. A concrete retaining wall formed the property line. The defendant Tomich, in performance of his contract, dug a ditch in the street 7 or 8 feet from plaintiff's line and about 7½ feet deep in which to lay the sewer. The ditch was dug in sections 6 or 7 feet long, about 6 feet apart, with tunnels at the bottom between the sections. Directly after the excavation of the ditch, the westerly part of plaintiff's lot and part of a vacant lot west of hers began to slip diagonally toward the street, breaking the retaining wall and taking out part of the foundation of plaintiff's house, which was set about 15 feet back of the street line. It was the contention of plaintiff that the damage to her resulted from the conjoint negligence of the city in improperly planning and locating the sewer line and of the contractor in negligently performing the work. There was testimony on her behalf that the side of the ditch nearest her property cracked and bulged in, and that the contractor did not properly brace the sides of the ditch, so as to prevent movement of the earth. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal separately upon a joint bill of exceptions.

It is argued on behalf of the appellant city of Los Angeles that the only act of the city was a governmental one, in declaring the necessity for the construction of the sewer; that the plans and specifications for its construction were the work of an independent agent, the city engineer, and the carrying out of the plans and specifications solely the responsibility of the contractor. The case of Haughawout v. Hubbard, 131 Cal. 675, 63 P. 1078, and other cases, are cited in support of the proposition that the city is not liable for the acts of its officers in preparing specifications and doing other engineering work. But in all of these cases the court was considering, not the liability of the municipality, but the sufficiency and regularity of the proceedings as authority for proceeding with the proposed work, or the enforcement of the lien of assessments against the property liable for its cost. The cases which hold that a municipality is not liable for the acts of its administrative officers are those where the officer had omitted the performance of his legal duty, or done some act in violation, or in excess, of his legal duty, as in the case of Sievers v. San Francisco, 115 Cal. 648, 47 P. 687, 56 Am. St. Rep. 153.

Section 34 of the "Vrooman Act" (St. 1885, p. 147, as amended by St. 1891, p. 206) does not, as argued by the appellants, give complete power and discretion to the city engineer in the preparation of plans and specifications and other engineering work necessary in carrying out public improvements, and, if it did, it would be merely substituting him as another agency of the municipality for the city council or the board of public works, and would not change its liability, if any, for the results. The city council in its resolution of intention expressly designated the specifications for the work—which specifications it had theretofore adopted by ordinance—and defined the location of the sewer. In determining the necessity of the sewer, the city, by its council, was acting in its governmental capacity; in planning the location and construction of the sewer, in its corporate or ministerial capacity, in the construction of a public work of the municipality. If, by reason of its construction in the particular location, the plaintiff's property was damaged, no "compensation having first been made," as required by article 1, § 14, of the Constitution, the city committed a legal wrong for which it is liable.

The question whether the liability existed at common law or was created by the constitutional provision is immaterial, as the nature of the liability is the same in either case. In Perkins v. Blauth, 163 Cal. at page 789, 127 P. 53, it is said: "Upon the other hand, if the act is one commanded by the municipality itself, if inherently wrong, the municipality and the agent who performed will both be liable." Again: "Wherever the injury complained of is the taking or damaging of private property for public use without compensation then under the guarantee of the federal constitution against such invasion of the private rights of property, neither the state itself nor any of its agencies or mandatories may claim exemption from liability." Id. The decisions in this state are uniform to the same effect. In this case, the court having found from competent evidence that the plan and location of the sewer was inherently dangerous, it comes within the rule.

It is urged by appellant city of Los Angeles that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding that the "location and alignment of said sewer was intrinsically dangerous and inherently wrong." Over the objection of defendants, witnesses, who were shown to be experienced in excavation similar in kind and location to that in this case, were permitted to testify that the location and manner of construction of the ditch were likely to endanger plaintiff's property. It is argued that this was not a matter upon which expert testimony was admissible, and appellant Tomich contends that, if the finding was true, he was not liable, and both appellants contend that no joint liability was shown. But it does not seem to us that the effect of the removal of lateral support from soil, on a hillside, composed of an overburden of black adobe on a thick layer of mixed shale and clay, with a subbase of clay, is of such common knowledge that the judgment of those experienced in working under such conditions would not be enlightening, or that the amount of care necessary to prevent soil of that character and in that position from caving, is matter of common knowledge. If they were matters of common knowledge it would seem hardly necessary to have the aid of an engineer, skilled in the planning and supervision of such work, in preparing its plans and specifications and locating its line. This evidence, with the evidence of the physical facts and of what happened, was sufficient to support the finding of the court.

The contractor having undertaken to carry out a work which the court found was inherently dangerous to plaintiff, and having been found by the court not to have taken the precautions which might have averted injury to plaintiff, was also liable.

Certain other findings of the court are objected to by appellants as not supported by the evidence. The finding that the city did not, by its specifications, require that the sides of the ditch should be braced, was contrary to the evidence. There was testimony, however, to the effect that they were not braced, and the court so found. The court having found that the location of the ditch endangered plaintiff's property, it was the duty of the city at all events to prevent the injury and the finding was immaterial.

The complaint alleged, and the court found, that the notice mentioned in section 832 of the Civil Code, defining the rights of coterminous owners to lateral support, and providing that each shall have the right to make proper and usual excavations on his own land, on "giving * * * reasonable notice to the other of his intention to make such excavations," was not given. There was, in the answer, no denial of the allegation, but merely a denial of the further allegation that "no notice was given."

[1] It is claimed by appellants that the amount of damages found by the court was excessive. Plaintiff restored the retaining wall by the construction of a concrete garage. Witnesses on her behalf testified that the cost of this structure was less than would have been the cost of excavating for a solid foundation for an ordinary retaining wall and replacing the earth behind it, and served the same purpose of restoring and maintaining the stability of plaintiff's property. This was sufficient justification for the court's finding.

[2] Appellants contend that the measure of damages adopted by the court in its finding was not correct, and that the finding should have been as to the difference in the value of the property before and after the injury, not the cost of restoring it to its original condition. The question is raised for the first time on this appeal, and the case was tried by both parties on the theory that the latter was the proper measure of damages. Appellants should not now be heard for the first time on appeal to complain that the case was tried on an erroneous theory. Kincaid v. Dunn, 26 Cal. App. 686, 148 P. 235.

The judgment should be affirmed.

KOFORD, P. J. [3] I concur in that part of the opinion which affirms the judgment against defendant Tomich, but do not agree with that part of the opinion which affirms the judgment against the defendant city of Los Angeles. I think the damage to plaintiff's property was caused by the negligence of the contractor in failing to carry out faithfully the specifications and not by the public work as planned, specified, and contemplated. It could have been executed without harm to plaintiff, if proper care was used by the contractor; and so it was not the public work, but the manner of executing that public work by the contractor, which damaged the plaintiff. Although the specifications called for bracing, yet, quoting from respondent's brief, "it clearly appears that no bracing or protection of plaintiff's wall was taken until after the damage had occurred." In the authorities relied upon by respondent for upholding the liability of the municipality, the damage resulted from the very nature of the improvement as planned. This distinction is pointed out by Justice Sloss in Gay v. Engebretsen, 158 Cal. 21, 24, 109 P. 876, 139 Am. St. Rep. 67, and in the case of Perkins v. Blauth, 163 Cal. 782, at page 789, 127 P. 50, and in Sievers v. San Francisco, 115 Cal. 648, 652, 653, 47 P. 687, 56 Am. St. Rep. 153.

[4] The public work planned and ordered was to open and close the street, again restoring it to its former state in good order. The work as planned, then, would do no harm to plaintiff; but the city is held liable by the judgment, because the work as located and aligned was inherently dangerous—inherently wrong and of such a nature as was likely to damage and injure plaintiff's property. If the judgment is correct, then the municipality is responsible at all events for damages caused by the contractor if the work planned is dangerous, but not if the work is not dangerous inherently. No such distinction has been drawn in the authorities between dangerous work and safe work. The amount of danger only determines the amount of care required in executing the work.

The judgment against the defendant Tomich is affirmed. The judgment against the city of Los Angeles is reversed.

In action to recover possession of automobile sold by plaintiff's assignor to defendant's assignor under conditional sales contract, plaintiff was not entitled to recover judgment, where defendant was in actual possession of automobile when action was commenced, and final payment had been made to plaintiff's agent.

5. Sales 🔑480(1)—Replevin by assignee of conditional sales contract required immediate and exclusive right of possession when action was commenced.

In action to replevin automobile by assignee of conditional sales contract, brought against assignee of original purchaser, plaintiff, to recover, was required to establish claim to immediate and exclusive right of possession of automobile at time of commencement of action.

6. Sales 🔑480(4)—Assignee of original purchaser, receiving automobile, sought to be replevied, in good faith trade, and in possession as owner at commencement of action, held, under evidence, entitled to judgment.

In replevin for automobile by assignee of conditional sales contract against assignee of original purchaser, evidence that defendant had in good faith received automobile in trade with original purchaser, and was owner thereof and in actual possession at time of commencement of action, showed defendant was entitled to recover judgment.

7. Estoppel 🔑92(2)—Assignee of conditional sales contract held estopped to deny defendant's title to automobile, because certificate of ownership was not transferred, where purchase price was paid to agent (Motor Vehicle Act, § 45).

In replevin for automobile by assignee of conditional sales contract against assignee of original purchaser, plaintiff was estopped to deny defendant's title or right of possession on ground that certificate of ownership had not been transferred, as required by Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517) § 45, where entire balance of purchase price of automobile was paid to agent of plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Acceptance Corporation against T. S. Jones. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Brownstone & Goodman, of San Francisco, and Huston, Huston & Huston, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Gaddis & McDonald, of Woodland, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action to replevin an automobile. The answer asserts that the right of possession and title to the car were in the respondent. It also alleges that the car was worth $403.11, and prays for the return of the machine or the payment of its value.

May 23, 1925, Harmon & Graves Motor Company, of Eureka, Cal., sold and delivered to C. A. Bland a Nash touring car upon an executory contract, by the terms of which the title remained in the vendor until the purchase price was fully paid. C. A. Bland was a minor, and the contract was therefore executed by his father, C. M. Bland, although the car was registered in the name of the son. Three days after the contract was executed it was assigned to the Pacific Acceptance Corporation of San Francisco, California. Harmon & Graves maintained an office at Redding, in the vicinity of which the Blands resided. After the assignment of the contract, several payments thereon were made to Harmon & Graves, which were accepted and credited without criticism on the part of the appellant. In February, 1926, Bland was having trouble with his machine and drove it into respondent's garage at Woodland for repairs. An agreement was then made with respondent to exchange this machine for another automobile, upon the purchase price of which Bland was credited the sum of $700 as the value of his Nash car. Bland then drove the new machine away, promising respondent to immediately pay the balance due upon the old machine. In February, 1926, the appellant wrote to C. A. Bland a letter, acknowledging receipt of two installments which were paid upon the Nash car. The appellant said: "You have requested information as to whether it will be satisfactory for you to make two payments at a time. But we understand from our representative, who is at present in and around Redding helping Mr. Graves with some of his collections, that you have already traded your car off. * * * If this rumor is true, * * * we must ask you to send us the entire balance of $403.11." This letter was signed "Collection Manager," beneath which appeared the firm name of Harmon & Graves.

February 24, 1926, Mr. Brown, the agent of appellant, called at the home of Bland, and demanded payment of the balance of the purchase price of the Nash machine. Bland told the agent that he would meet him the following day in Redding and pay the balance. Brown agreed to meet him at the office of Harmon & Graves, but said he had other business in that vicinity, and added: "If I am not there, Graves will attend to it for me."

In this regard, Bland testified on cross-examination: "Q. As I understand it, Brown told your father, if he wasn't at Harmon & Graves the next morning, to pay the balance due on this account to Graves, at Harmon & Graves? A. [Yes; he said to] pay it to Graves." At 9 o'clock the next morning Bland appeared at the designated office in Redding pursuant to agreement and found Brown absent. After considerable delay and effort to obtain Brown's presence, Bland executed and delivered his check to Graves for the entire balance of the purchase price of the Nash car. It appears that Graves failed to account to appellant for this payment. The trial court found that appellant was neither the owner nor entitled to the possession of the automobile, and decreed that it take nothing by this action. Upon the contrary, the court found that respondent was the owner and entitled to the possession of the Nash car, that it was worth $403.11, and that subsequent to the commencement of the action appellant had sold the machine and was unable to restore it to the owner, and thereupon rendered judgment in favor of the respondent for the sum of $403.11.

The appellant asserts that (1) the findings and judgment are not supported by the evidence; that (2) Graves was not authorized as its agent to collect the money in question; that (3) since the balance of the purchase price of the machine had not been paid to appellant, Bland had no title to convey to the respondent; and that (4) the respondent held no valid title to the automobile since the certificate of ownership had not been transferred to him as provided by section 45 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517).

[1, 2] The vital question involved in this appeal is whether Bland was justified in assuming that Graves was authorized by the appellant to collect the balance of the purchase price of the automobile. While there is a conflict of testimony, we are of the opinion that the record discloses substantial evidence of the existence of an ostensible agency in Graves. Brown was the authorized agent of appellant, empowered to collect the balance of the purchase price of the machine or repossess it. He demanded payment from Bland, and agreed to meet him at the office of Harmon & Graves in Redding for that purpose, saying: "If I am not there, Graves will attend to it for me." Harmon & Graves were the original owners of the machine and executed the contract of sale to Bland. The contract itself directed that the payments be made "at the office of the seller, or his assigns." After the assignment of the contract several installments were paid by Bland to Harmon & Graves and credited to his account without objection on the part of appellant. The appellant knew that payments were made in this manner. Bland testified that he wrote the appellant July 17, 1925, saying: "* * * Now I paid two payments on my car June 23. I paid the payments that were due and also the July payment, and I have receipts to show it. I paid it to John Witherow, one of Harmon & Graves head salesmen. So, please look up the mistake at once, as I do not intend to make payments twice." In spite of the fact that appellant knew these payments were being made to Harmon & Graves, it failed to direct Bland to discontinue this practice. In this regard, Mr. Bland testified: "Q. Did you ever receive any notice from the Pacific Acceptance Corporation asking you not to make any payments to Graves * * *? A. No sir, I did not."

[3] The authority of an agent is to be determined by the relation of the parties together with the conduct and declarations of the principal. 1 Cal. Jur. 695, § 5; 21 R. C. L. 819, § 5; Rezos v. Zahm & Nagle Co., 78 Cal. App. 728, 246 P. 564. In the case of Schnier v. Percival (Cal. App.) 256 P. 1109, where the principle of ostensible agency was involved, the court said: "It appears from the evidence in the case that defendants knew the general custom of Eshleman to collect payments and issue receipts in his own name, and, by failure to object, acquiesced in this conduct. Where the acts are of such a nature and so continuous as to justify a reasonable inference that the principal knew of them and would not have permitted them if unauthorized, the acts are competent evidence of agency." An agent is authorized to perform any act which the principal may transact, except when it clearly appears that his authority is otherwise limited. Section 2305, Civ. Code. Since the acts, conduct and omission of appellant to notify Bland not to pay installments to Harmon & Graves may reasonably be said to have justified him in believing that Graves was authorized to collect the balance of the purchase price of the automobile the appellant is estopped from denying the authority of its agent in this respect. Section 2317, Civ. Code; Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Co. v. Santa Cruz County National Bank, 82 Cal. App. 519, 523, 255 P. 881; Robinson v. Am. Fish & Oyster Co., 17 Cal. App. 212, 119 P. 388. Where an agent is authorized to collect money, without specifically limiting him to the collection of cash, and a valid check is accepted in lieu of cash, it is equivalent to a payment to the principal, although the agent absconds with the proceeds. California Stearns Co. v. Treadwell, 82 Cal. App. 553, 563, 256 P. 242.

[4-6] Since the respondent was in actual possession of the Nash car on July 13, 1926, when this action in replevin was commenced, and the final payment was made to the agent of appellant February 26, 1926, the appellant was not entitled to recover judgment. In order for appellant to prevail in the present action, it was necessary for it to establish its claim to immediate and exclusive right of possession of the automobile at the time of the commencement of the action. 5 Cal. Jur. 160, § 4; 23 R. C. L. 866, § 15; Boles v. Stiles, 188 Cal. 304, 204 P. 848; Kenny v. Christianson, 200 Cal. 419, 424, 253 P. 715, 50 A. L. R. 1297. Upon the contrary, the evidence indicating that the respondent had in good faith traded with Bland for the Nash machine, and was not only the owner thereof, but in the actual possession of it at the time of the commencement of this action, he was entitled to recover judgment in his favor. In the case of Parke v. Franciscus, 194 Cal. 284, at page 295, 228 P. 435, 440, relied upon by the appellant, it is said: "In an action of claim and delivery the claimant is not called upon to establish ownership, merely a right to the possession of the thing, and since the transfer to appellants was not void ab initio, in an action of claim and delivery, they might be entitled to recover."

[7] The entire balance of the purchase price of the automobile having been paid to the agent of appellant, it was estopped from denying the vendee's title or right of possession upon the ground that the certificate of ownership had not been transferred as required by section 45 of the Motor Vehicle Act, or otherwise. Dowd v. Russell, 78 Cal. App. 262, 248 P. 293; Davies-Overland Co. v. Blenkiron, 71 Cal. App. 690, 236 P. 179; Boles v. Stiles, 188 Cal. 304, 204 P. 848; Kenny v. Christianson, supra.

The judgment is affirmed.

BOUCHER v. PEASLEY.

PEASLEY v. CONSOLIDATED INV. CORPORATION et al.

(Civ. 5872.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 17, 1928.

1. Master and servant ⟹80(10)—Evidence held to support finding that employment contract called for fixed salary in addition to commissions.

Finding that contract of employment called for fixed salary payable semi-monthly, in addition to commissions, and not for mere advancements, subject to periodical adjustment of account according to commissions earned, held supported by the evidence.

2. Appeal and error ⟹1002—Verdict on sufficient evidence cannot be disturbed on appeal because of conflicting evidence.

Verdict being supported by sufficient evidence cannot be disturbed on appeal because of evidence conflicting therewith.

3. Master and servant ⟹68—Salary is not recoverable for time after parties agreed employee should have commission only.

Where, while one was working on a salary and commission basis, his employer told him that the business would not warrant his further employment, but that he might remain on a commission basis, and he agreed to this and continued with the employer, there is no basis for his recovery of compensation, other than commissions, for the time subsequent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; K. Van Zante, Judge.

Action by B. A. Boucher against W. S. Peasley, with cross-action by defendant, joining the Consolidated Investment Corporation as cross-defendant. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff and the Corporation appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Carl E. Lindsay and Lindsay & Gearhart, all of Fresno, for appellants.

William A. White, of Fresno, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff, Boucher, sued the defendant, Peasley, on an assigned claim for $1,562, alleged to have been paid Peasley by the Consolidated Investment Corporation in excess of money due him. Peasley filed a cross-complaint, bringing in the Consolidated Investment Corporation as a defendant on a claim for $396, alleged to be due for services rendered the corporation. The cause was tried before a jury, and resulted in a verdict for Peasley on the original complaint and in a verdict for him against the corporation on his cross-complaint in the sum of $396. The original plaintiff and the corporation both appeal from the judgment on the same record.

Two points are raised—that the evidence does not support the verdict on the cross-complaint, and that it does not support the verdict on the main issue. For the purpose of clarity, we will reverse the order of the points raised.

On the main issue the evidence is that Peasley was employed by the corporation as a listing and real estate salesman; that his contract called for payments to him as commissions upon sales, and that in addition to this arrangement he was paid $82.50 semi-monthly, which he claimed to be an agreed salary over his commissions, and which the appellants claimed was merely a drawing account, subject to adjustment according to the amount of commission earned. He commenced work with the company on June 17, 1924, and continued until September 15, 1925, when, by mutual consent, the semi-monthly payments ceased, but he continued in the employ of the company on the commission basis until November 30, 1925. The original complaint alleged that the company advanced him during this period the sum of $2,586.40, that the total amount of commissions earned was $1,024.32, and that there was due the company the excess of these advances amounting to $1,562.02. Peasley, however, contended that these payments were by way of salary as the result of an express contract and that they should have continued until November 30, 1925, when he left the employ of the company. This latter claim is the basis of his cross-complaint in the sum of $396.

[1, 2] The evidence on the main issue is sharply conflicting, Peasley testifying that an express contract was made on June 1, 1924, calling for a fixed salary over commissions earned payable semi-monthly. Witnesses on behalf of the company were just as positive that the agreement was that Peasley should be permitted to draw $82.50 semi-monthly, subject to a periodical adjustment of his account according to the commissions earned by him. The books of the company received in evidence supported the testimony of its witnesses. Many of the checks received by Peasley, specifying that they were for advancements, also tended to support this testimony, though it was shown that some three or four of these checks were drawn on account of salary. The jury believed the evidence offered in support of Peasley, and this evidence is sufficient to support the verdict. Such being the case, the verdict cannot be disturbed on that issue.

[3] The second point presents a different situation. Peasley alleged in his cross-complaint that the semi-monthly payments were not made after October 1, 1925, and that the amount claimed to be due was for unpaid salary until he left the employ of the company. The jury gave its verdict for the full sum claimed, but the evidence wholly fails to sustain this part of the verdict. This evidence is that, some time in the month of September, 1925, a representative of the company informed Peasley that the business of the company would not warrant his further employment, but that he might remain with the company on a commission basis only if he so desired. Peasley agreed to this arrangement and testified that he continued with the company merely in a sense of loyalty, without expectation of compensation, that whatever service he gave at that time was "gratis." There is no basis for a claim for compensation either upon an express contract or by way of quantum meruit. The theory of a cause of action for compensation for services rendered rests on a contract, express or implied, to pay for the services. But when the services have been voluntary with the understanding between the employer and the employee that they shall be without compensation, there is no basis for an action for compensation, either upon an express contract or in quantum meruit. We have not overlooked the rule that where an employment under an express contract has continued over the term by mutual consent it will be presumed to have been under the same conditions as the express contract for the term. But such is not the case here.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom the item of $396, and as so modified it is affirmed, appellants to recover their costs on this appeal.

CITY OF LONG BEACH v. STEN et al.★
(Civ. 4991.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 12, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Feb. 7, 1929.

1. Eminent domain ⟹265(3)—Reasonable attorney's fees should be awarded defendant on dismissal of condemnation proceeding, though he is attorney and defends for himself (Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a).

The reasonable attorney's fees, which Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a, provides shall be awarded to defendant in condemnation proceeding on the proceeding being dismissed, should be awarded him, though he is an attorney and as such defends for himself.

2. Eminent domain ⟹265(3)—On dismissal of condemnation proceeding, each defendant should be awarded reasonable attorney's fee, though one is attorney and defends for both (Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a).

Where one of the co-owners and defendants in condemnation proceeding is an attorney, and as such defends for both, he as defendant is entitled to allowance of a reasonable attorney's fee independent of that allowed his codefendant, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a, providing for awarding defendant reasonable attorney's fees on dismissal of the proceeding.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Condemnation proceeding by the City of Long Beach against Theodore J. Sten and another. From a judgment granting the motion to retax costs on dismissal of the proceeding, defendant William Ellis Lady appeals. Reversed, with directions.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, pro se.

Bruce Mason, Geo. W. Trammel, Jr., Fred F. White, and John K. Hull, all of Long Beach, for respondent.

KEETCH, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff filed an action in 1923 in the superior court of Los Angeles county to condemn certain property in the city of Long Beach jointly owned by the defendants Sten and Lady. The latter is an attorney at law and appeared and defended on behalf of his coowner and for himself personally. An interlocutory judgment in the sum of $19,620 was obtained in their favor, and, subsequent to the entry of judgment, the plaintiff city passed an ordinance abandoning the condemnation proceedings and duly obtained a judgment and order dismissing the action against defendants. The appellant Lady, on behalf of himself and Sten, filed separate cost bills, claiming, among other items, $1,500 as attorney's fees under section 1255a of the Code of Civil Procedure. Plaintiff moved to retax the costs claimed by defendant Sten, particularly the amount claimed as attorney's fees, and also moved to retax and disallow the costs claimed by Lady as attorney's fees, on the ground of the latter being an attorney at law and having appeared and defended in his own behalf. Evidence was received by the court as to the value of the services rendered; the defendant Lady testifying that he had spent three or four days in preparing for trial and the greater portion of one day in actual trial. An expert witness testified that, on the basis of the amount of the judgment rendered in the case, the reasonable value of the services of an attorney representing the land of defendants Sten and Lady was $750, and that the value of the services of an attorney representing Sten would be $375. The court granted the motion to retax, fixing the amount of the attorney's fees for Sten at $375 and disallowing the attorney's fees as claimed by the defendant Lady. It is from this order that the latter appeals.

[1] Section 1255a of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the abandonment of condemnation proceedings, provides in part as follows: "Upon such abandonment, express or implied, on motion of defendant, a judgment shall be entered dismissing the proceeding and awarding the defendant his costs and disbursements, which shall include all necessary expenses incurred in preparing for trial and reasonable attorney's fees." It is contended by appellant that the section above referred to having specifically and specially provided for the allowance of costs and reasonable attorney's fees in connection with the abandonment and dismissal of a cause of action by the party initiating it, the mere fact that an attorney happens to be the owner of the property sought to be taken, and defends for himself in his professional capacity, should not deprive him of just compensation for the time and legal services rendered. He argues: "The statute authorizes it, and common sense and fairness justify it, just as much as if instead of appearing in propria persona he had gone out and obtained another lawyer to represent him, and the defendant himself devoted his own time to other litigation or legal work."

Appellant suggests that there is no authority in this state which applies directly to the situation presented, and we have failed to discover any. It is true that, in support of its contention that appellant, as the attorney in the case, is not entitled to attorney's fees because he appeared in propria persona, the respondent cites the case of Patterson v. Donner, 48 Cal. 369, where the plaintiff, an attorney, appeared personally in the action. As quoted by respondent, the court there said: "The judgment of the court below should be reduced, however, by the sum of five hundred dollars, fee of counsel for foreclosure. The action was brought and prosecuted by the plaintiff personally. We do not think that the stipulation in the mortgage sued on, for counsel fee, can apply where no counsel fee was paid by the plaintiff." As indicated, however, the case cited involved the matter of foreclosure of what was declared to be a mortgage by the court, wherein it provided for the allowance of counsel fees for such foreclosure. Patterson held the note and appeared both as plaintiff and as attorney in person. It is obvious that this presents an entirely different situation from the instant case, where the defendant and appellant has been forced under the right of eminent domain exercised by the plaintiff, the city of Long Beach, to defend, either in person or by some other attorney, his rights as the owner of property sought to be condemned. Section 1255 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides as follows: "Costs may be allowed or not, and if allowed, may be apportioned between the parties on the same or adverse sides, in the discretion of the court." This discretionary power is limited by section 14 of article 1 of the Constitution, which provides that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having first been made." It was held that the costs referred to in this section were the ordinary and usual costs attending trials and hearings under statutory provisions, and that counsel fees were not allowable to a defendant in a general judgment in his favor in condemnation proceedings. In 10 California Jurisprudence, at page 432, it is said in this connection: "To require the defendants to pay any portion of their own costs necessarily incidental to the trial of the issues on their part, or any of the costs of the plaintiff, would reduce the just compensation awarded by the jury by a sum equal to that paid for costs." These costs, however, did not include attorney's fees, and in 1911 the Legislature enacted and added to the Code of Civil Procedure section 1255a, covering abandonment proceedings, and has, as we have seen, specifically provided for costs and reasonable attorney's fees.

The question of the constitutionality of section 1255a as to attorney's fees was raised in the case of City of Sacramento v. Swanston, 29 Cal. App. 212, 155 P. 101, and its constitutionality upheld in an exhaustive opinion by Mr. Justice Hart. Referring to the specific character of this statute, the court said: "Thus it must at once become obvious that a proceeding for the condemnation of private property for a public use, under the power of which we have been speaking is, in its origin, its purpose and its characteristics, essentially different from any other action or proceeding established by our law as an instrumentality for the enforcement of a private right or the redress or prevention of a private wrong. It is, indeed, not included by the code within the category of ordinary actions at law or suits in equity, but is denominated, with others, as a 'special proceeding,' and even as to other proceedings so denominated in the code, it is, by reason of the characteristics peculiar to it, strictly sui generis. It, therefore, cannot be doubted that the proceeding to condemn property under the right of eminent domain is so differentiated from the ordinary actions or proceedings in a court of justice 'by which one party prosecutes another for the enforcement or protection of a right, or the redress of a private wrong,' as to bring it within the settled test justifying the assignment of the proceeding to a particular class for the purposes of reasonable provisions not applicable to other classes of actions. * * * In the case at hand there exists no basis for the reasoning which led to the conclusion arrived at in Builders' Supply Depot v. O'Connor, 150 Cal. 265 [88 P. 982, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 909, 119 Am. St. Rep. 193, 11 Ann. Cas. 712] and in Gulf etc. Ry. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150 [17 S. Ct. 255, 41 L. Ed. 666]. In those cases it was held, as we have seen, that an allowance to the plaintiff of an attorney's fee if he was victorious in the trial was distinctly discriminatory, because no such allowance was provided for the defendant in case he prevailed at the trial. In this case, however, as in no other case of which we can presently think, the statute gives to the plaintiff the right to abandon the proceeding, even after a trial thereof and a verdict and judgment of condemnation rendered and entered, and, as a penalty for such abandonment, accords to the defendant the right to be reimbursed by the plaintiff for not only the ordinary costs but an attorney's fee. No right of abandonment is awarded by the statute to the defendant, and, in the very nature of the case, there could not be so that it would affect or impair the right of the plaintiff to condemn and take his property. The conditions as to the two parties in the proceeding are essentially and radically different." This language is applicable as distinguishing from the case at bar the cases of Patterson v. Donner, supra, Bank of Woodland v. Treadwell, 55 Cal. 379, and City Investment Co. v. Pringle, 49 Cal. App. 353, 193 P. 504, also cited by respondent. The same questions were raised in the case of Silver Lake Power & Irrigation Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 32 Cal. App. 123, 162 P. 432, and the case of City of Sacramento v. Swanston was quoted and approved.

In consonance with the language of these decisions with respect to the interpretation and purposes of section 1255a, it is fair to assume that the intention of the Legislature in the enactment of that statute was to indemnify and make whole a defendant in an abandoned condemnation proceeding for the time, trouble, and expense, including attorney's fees, to which he has been put by the plaintiff. That the law under such circumstances allows attorney's fees is now beyond controversy, and the only question presented is whether or not an attorney appearing for himself as a defendant in such an action is entitled to his fees in his professional capacity. It would seem from a review of the authorities, English and American, that the weight of opinion is decidedly in the affirmative. Thornton, in his work on Attorneys at Law (volume 2, p. 861), says: "An attorney who conducts his own litigation is entitled to his statutory fees. The reason for making this distinction between parties who are attorneys and those who are not is that when the party is an attorney he gives his professional time, knowledge and experience in the conduct of the defense of his suit which he would otherwise have to pay another attorney for rendering. It can make no difference to the defeated party, who is by law bound to pay the costs of the attorney of the prevailing party, whether that attorney is a party himself or another attorney employed by him. He, like any other attorney, is paid for his time and services; for if he renders them in the management and trial of his own case they may amount to as much pecuniary loss or damage to him as if he had paid another attorney for doing it"—citing Kopper v. Willis, 9 Daly (N. Y.) 460. See, also, Flaacke v. Jersey City, 33 N. J. Eq. 57; Drake v. Berry, 42 N. J. Law, 60; Crommelin v. Dinsmore, 1 City Ct. R. (N. Y.) 69, and Willard v. Harbeck, 3 Denio (N. Y.) 260.

Among the English cases, the leading authority appears to be London Scottish Benefit Society v. Chorley, Crawford, and Chester, 12 Q. B. Div. 452. Denman, J., reviewing that case, said: "In this action the defendants were solicitors. They employed no agents, but conducted the whole business as defendants in person. They succeeded in their defense, and obtained judgment: and the question has arisen, upon taxation of costs, whether, where a solicitor sues or defends in person, he is entitled only to such costs as any other defendant in person would be entitled to, viz., the costs out of pocket, or whether he is entitled to such costs as a successful defendant would be entitled to who does employ a solicitor, saving only such costs as are in the nature of things not chargeable by reason of their being instructions to himself, or matters of a like nature. The master has allowed the costs in dispute, and, upon a summons at chambers, my Brother Mathew, without expressing any opinion, referred the matter to the Court; and therefore the case comes before us as an original application to review the decision of the master. We took time to consider, owing to our having ascertained that there has been some difference of opinion amongst the taxing officers upon the subject. For the plaintiffs it was contended that these costs ought not to be allowed, and we were referred to the statute 23 Henry 8, c. 15. I do not think any question can be raised here founded upon the distinction between plaintiff and defendant. The origin of costs is to be traced to some early statutes: but none of the rules have at all, I think, affected the question whether, in taxing costs on behalf of a successful defendant who is a solicitor, the master ought or ought not to include such costs as those which have been allowed here. That is now to be decided for the first time and by the same practice, I think, by which it was always to be decided: and we have to look at what is the proper view of the matter, just as much with reference to the present state of things as we should have had to do before the passing of the Judicature Acts, or before the more recent Acts relating to costs. In Harold v. Smith, [5 Hurl. & N. 381] (1) Bramwell, B., laid it down as a general principle that costs are allowed by way of indemnity; and it was argued that these costs cannot fall within that principle, because they are not costs which the defendants have incurred or for which they have become liable. This is, no doubt, a very plausible argument, but I do not think it is by any means conclusive, because, treating the costs as being in a reasonable sense of the word equivalent to an indemnity, I am not aware of any principle which ought to prevent a successful party who is a solicitor, and who does solicitor's work, from being indemnified not merely for the time he must necessarily expend as a witness in his own case, but also for the pains, trouble, and skill which he has to incur and to exercise in order to bring it to a successful conclusion. There is nothing to prevent 'costs' thus incurred from falling within the fair meaning of an 'indemnity,' though not actually money out of pocket such as he would have had to pay if his action or his defense had been intrusted by him to another solicitor. The solicitor's time is valuable: he applies his skill to a suit or action in which he is obliged to spend his time and exercise his skill in consequence of the wrongful act of his opponent; and therefore it is not an unreasonable view that the word 'costs', in the sense of an 'indemnity,' should be held fairly to include a reasonable professional remuneration for that work which, if he did not do it himself, would have had to be done by another solicitor and paid for by his unsuccessful opponent. If that be so, and the word 'indemnity' is reasonably capable of being used in that sense, it becomes a mere question of practice whether the costs here claimed by the defendant ought, as a rule, for it is not necessary to consider exceptional cases, to be allowed to a successful litigant, being a solicitor and conducting his own case." Manisty, J., sitting in the same case, in approving the words of Justice Denman, added: "When a party to an action, be he plaintiff or be he defendant, conducts it himself, and is a solicitor, if he is entitled to his costs he is entitled to them as solicitor's costs: and why should he not be? I think my Brother Denman has answered that also conclusively. Justice seems to require it. Time is money to a solicitor; and why should he not be as much entitled to his proper costs, if he affords the time and skill which he brings to bear upon the business where he is a party to the action as he is where he is not a party? Again, I agree with my Brother Denman that it is for the advantage of the party against whom the judgment is given that his opponent is a solicitor, because there are many charges which the latter cannot make and which would be allowed if the claim or defense were conducted by another solicitor. Justice and reason, therefore, seem to me to favor the conclusion to which we have come."

Another English case is that of In re Donaldson, 27 Chan. Div. 545. We cite this case for the reason that it was there held that the solicitor mortgagee in a foreclosure action was entitled to his fees in his professional capacity, contrary to the holding in the case of Patterson v. Donner, cited by respondent. Lord Bacon, as Vice Chancellor, delivering his opinion, said: "There is no rule more true, more well-established, or more familiar than that a trustee is not entitled to make a profit out of his trust, though he is entitled to the costs incurred by him in the exercise of his trust; but it appears to me that this rule has no application to the present case, because the respondent Mr. Donaldson is not a trustee for the Applicant. Trustees are obliged to protect their trust property and must of necessity frequently employ a solicitor for that purpose, and they are entitled to the costs they have so incurred. If I accede to Mr. Hemming's argument, I shall be obliged to decide that in a case where a separate solicitor is not employed, and a solicitor is both trustee and mortgagee, he cannot, under any circumstances, be entitled to his costs of acting as solicitor for himself and his cotrustees. For that proposition no authority has been cited; but there is authority for the proposition that a solicitor acting for himself has a right to charge for his costs. Now here are trustees acting in their trust, and having advanced money on mortgage in pursuance of their trust proceed to realize their security. One of these trustees is a solicitor. Being trustees they are entitled to employ a solicitor, and they employ one of themselves as such. Because that one trustee happens to be a solicitor I am asked to direct the Taxing Master to disallow the costs which have been incurred through his having been employed as solicitor. That I cannot assent to. I cannot allow that when a solicitor happens to be a trustee he is to be treated as for the time being suspended from practice or struck off the rolls so far as regards the matter in which he is a trustee. I do not think a solicitor is to be deprived of civil rights because he is a trustee. If he were a sole surviving trustee, and had to file a bill for foreclosure of mortgaged property, it could not be said he was not entitled to the costs of the suit; on the contrary, he would be entitled to all his costs. Now what are the facts here? Certain mortgagees enforce their securities against their mortgagor. One of the mortgagees, Mr. Donaldson, who is a solicitor, does the solicitor's work in the matter and charges the mortgagor with profit costs for the work so done. The matter comes before the Taxing Master, when the mortgagor objects that Mr. Donaldson is not entitled to charge profit costs in respect to the mortgages or any other costs than those out of pocket. The Taxing Master then makes a certificate answering the objections as follows: [His Lordship read the certificate and continued:] I cannot say that that is wrong. I know of no principle requiring me to say that the items in question are wrongly charged. The case of London Scottish Benefit Society v. Chorley (1) shews clearly that a solicitor is entitled to charge as a solicitor for costs in an action to which he is a party. I cannot therefore disaffirm the decision at which the Taxing Master has arrived."

Among the American cases cited by Mr. Thornton, we refer to that of Flaacke v. Jersey City, supra, where it was said: "The complainant objects not only to certain items of the bills of costs as taxed for the defendants Andrew V. Church and S. C. Mount respectively, on the ground that the allowances are greater than the law authorizes, but insists that Mr. Mount, who is a solicitor of this court, and appeared in the cause in his own person, is not entitled to any costs, because he did not appear by solicitor. The objections cannot be sustained. A solicitor who is a party to a suit and appears in his own person, is entitled to the allowances made by the fee bill for his services therein, except, of course, for a retaining fee"—citing Willard v. Harbeck, supra.

In Crommelin v. Dinsmore, supra, which was an action where the attorney was sued on a contract and defended in person, the court said: "The services of the defendant (who is an attorney and counsellor-at-law) in his own defense, are presumably as valuable as the same services would have been in the defense of another; and if the doctrine of indemnification is to prevail, there is no reason why he should not be similarly compensated."

[2] It is argued by respondent that appellant Lady "would have been compelled to expend the same amount of time in the preparation and trial of the cause had his codefendant been the sole owner of said property," and that the fixing of the fee was discretionary with the court. Conceding this, it would appear, however, that, while he did not have to do so, being himself qualified to pass as an expert, the court accepted the valuation of $750 as indicated by the legal expert witness by allowing one-half of that amount to the defendant Sten and disallowing any fee for the defendant Lady. The only theory upon which the amount could have been so reduced is that Lady was not entitled to any fees as an attorney in defending as to the one-half interest in the property owned by him. As we have seen, under section 1255a and the authority of the cases cited, this discrimination is inequitable. He is entitled to a reasonable attorney's fee independent of what may have been allowed his codefendant Sten.

The judgment granting the motion to retax costs is reversed, with directions that the sum of $375 be allowed as attorney's fees for the defendant Sten, and that, in addition, the trial court allow such attorney's fees for defendant Lady as in its discretion it may deem reasonable.

SELVAGE v. FRED J. MAURER & SON.★
(Civ. 6585.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 18, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 17, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 14, 1929.

1. Pleading ⚷369(2)—Where evidence would have sustained verdict on either count and no election was required, court properly submitted counts based on quantum meruit and express contract to jury.

Where evidence on behalf of plaintiff would have sustained verdict upon either count and no election was required, court properly submitted count based on agreed price for services on an express contract and count based on quantum meruit to jury under proper instructions.

2. Contracts ⚷323(1)—Whether plaintiff seeking compensation for excavation work abandoned contract before completion held for jury.

In action by subcontractor against contractor for compensation for performing excavation work, question, whether plaintiff abandoned his grading contract before completion and thus should not recover at all, or at least not full contract price, held for jury under evidence shown.

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

3. Damages 🔑119—In subcontractor's action against contractor for compensation for excavation work, damage resulting from subcontractor's failure to perform another contract held for jury.

In action by subcontractor against contractor for compensation for performing excavation work for United States Coast Guard station, question of damage contractor sustained by subcontractor's failure to commence performance of another contract to construct substructure and launchways, which contractor was compelled to construct, held for jury.

4. Damages 🔑189—In subcontractor's action against contractor for compensation for excavation work, evidence warranted jury's finding defendant sustained no damage from plaintiff's failure to perform another contract.

In action by subcontractor against contractor for compensation for performing excavation work in construction of United States Coast Guard station, jury was justified under evidence in making no award upon defendant's offsets for plaintiff's failure to perform substructure and launchways contract because of defendant's failure to prove damage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

Action for labor performed by W. S. Selvage against Fred J. Maurer & Son. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry L. Ford and J. T. Fraser, both of Eureka, for appellant.

W. Ernest Dickson, of Eureka, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Plaintiff recovered a judgment for $2,251.81 for performing certain excavation work. Trial was by jury. Defendant appeals from the judgment, assigning errors which largely involve questions of fact.

Maurer & Son were awarded a contract by the United States government to construct a United States Coast Guard station consisting of a marine ways, a building, and the excavation of a land approach on the ocean shore at Pt. Reyes, Cal. They sublet to Selvage, the plaintiff and respondent herein, the construction of the substructure (pile driving) and launchways for the sum of $3,000. This subcontract was in writing and provided, among other things, for partial payment of 75 per cent. of the work completed on the 1st of each month at the request of Selvage. Selvage came to the scene and commenced to make ready for this work. It appeared that it was necessary for the land excavation to be completed before the pile driving for the substructure should be commenced. A. L. Maurer, the son mentioned in the corporate name of appellant, was acting as general superintendent of the entire work covered by the government contract with Maurer & Son. Appellant asked Selvage to give a bid upon the excavation part of the work, because the person whom appellant had relied upon to do this work had failed to appear. Selvage bid $2,000 for the excavation work. A verbal agreement was made with Maurer & Son, accompanied by a brief written bid, signed by Selvage only, specifying the price and a very general description of the excavation work to be done. At the trial the parties differed materially upon what the verbal understanding was between them regarding progress payments on this work, regarding the furnishing of materials and equipment, and as to whether Selvage had agreed to perform the work to the final satisfaction of the government engineer or only to carry out the orders and directions of A. L. Maurer. This subcontract was the basis of the complaint in the action. There were three counts. One for $2,000, as for the agreed price on an express contract, one for the same $2,000, as for the reasonable value of the same work, and a third for $251.81, consisting of $150 for excavating rock, $66.06 for material paid for by Selvage, which should have been paid for by appellant, and the balance for extra labor and excavation caused by appellant's misdirections for the doing of the excavation.

Selvage's testimony was to the effect that neither by contract nor by actual practice did he have anything to do with the government engineer. That the engineer would not recognize him as subcontractor, but dealt only with Maurer, the general contractor. That the engineer laid out lines and established stakes, indicating to Maurer the extent and nature of the excavation required, and Maurer, in turn, placing his own interpretation on these directions, indicated to Selvage in more detail how the work was to be done. That, owing to mistakes of Maurer, Selvage was required to finish the surface of the cut twice, but that finally he finished the job to the last finishing touch, to the expressed satisfaction of Maurer. Thereupon, being greatly dissatisfied because he had been unable to obtain any progress payments on the work, he demanded his pay. He testified that the verbal contract was that he should have 75 per cent. progress payments monthly, just as provided in his written contract for the substructure. Appellant positively declared that no payments would be made until it had received payment from the government. His pay not being forthcoming upon the $2,000 contract, Selvage declared he would not commence with the performance of his $3,000 contract for the substructure and launchways until paid for his excavation work to date.

It was appellant's claim and testimony that Selvage was required to finish the excavation to the satisfaction of the government engineer and the plans and specifications of the government contract; that Maurer's acceptance of the work was necessarily conditioned upon the final approval of the government engineer; that eventually the government engineer came and decided that the grading was not executed up to the lines designated by him; that Selvage was entitled to no payment until Maurer had received payment from the government; that Selvage therefore failed to complete the excavation according to contract, but that he had abandoned it uncompleted; that he also unjustifiably abandoned the contract for the substructure and launchways. Defendant claimed damages by way of counterclaim and cross-complaint for these alleged breaches by Selvage. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for, and allowed defendant nothing upon the offsets pleaded.

[1] At the conclusion of plaintiff's case in chief, defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the second cause of action, which was for quantum meruit, claiming that plaintiff's case rested upon an express contract. This motion was denied. Defendant then immediately moved for a nonsuit upon the first cause of action, claiming that the court had decided by the last-mentioned ruling that there was no express contract, or that the first cause of action had not been proven. Appellant disclaims any motion to compel an election, but claims that his motions for nonsuit presented a pure question of law for the court. If the law did not require respondent to make an election, it is difficult to see how the court was obliged to do so for him by granting one of defendant's motions for nonsuit. The testimony on behalf of the plaintiff would have sustained a verdict upon either count, the one sustained depending upon what view of the testimony the jury approved. This was a question of fact for the jury, and not for the court to decide. The court did not err in submitting both counts to the jury under proper instructions. Where no election was required, both issues could go to the jury. Bancroft's Code Pleading, vol. 1, §§ 108 and 655; Cowan v. Abbott, 92 Cal. 100, 28 P. 213; Estrella Vineyard Co. v. Butler, 125 Cal. 232, 57 P. 980; Tanforan v. Tanforan, 173 Cal. 270, 159 P. 709.

[2] Appellant next claims that Selvage abandoned his grading contract before completion, and hence should not recover at all, or at least not the full contract price. This is entirely a question of fact well within the jury's province under the testimony. There was ample evidence to support the decision of fact that Selvage had fully completed his contract with appellant, even though the excavation did not fully satisfy the plans and grade lines of the appellant's contract with the government. The evidence does not compel the conclusion that the requirements of the two contracts with respect to excavation or grading were identical.

[3, 4] Appellant's last point is that damages should have been awarded it, because plaintiff failed to commence the performance of the substructure and launchways contract. Appellant testified that the cost of the labor in doing this work himself was $4,652.29. On the other hand, the government construction engineer, who supervised and inspected the work and kept account of the amount of labor, testified, that exclusive of the contractor's time, the total labor spent in driving piles for the substructure and construction of the launchways was approximately $3,000 (the contract price) including the laying of rails (not in the Selvage contract). From this testimony the jury could conclude that appellant was inclined to greatly overestimate the cost of labor and therefore of other claimed damage, and that in fact it was not damaged at all by respondent's failure to perform this contract. Appellant testified to items of cost of performing this work in addition to the item for labor (some of which, like the donkey engine and its transportation, may not have been properly chargeable to this part of the work). These items, so far as the jury may have found them proper, may have been less than the labor of laying the rails. If so, the total cost to plaintiff would be found to be less than the contract price of $3,000. Again, these items may have been held unreasonably large, there being no testimony of their reasonable value. The question of damage was, therefore, a question of fact for the jury. The jury could decide from the testimony that appellant completed the work called for by this contract at a cost equal to or less than the contract price of $3,000, and for that reason allow nothing to defendant as offset.

There was also ample testimony from which the jury could decide that appellant made it impossible for respondent to perform the substructure contract by failing to pay anything upon the excavation contract according to its terms. It was understood by the parties, according to respondent's testimony, that he needed the payments to finance and carry out the work. Appellant's positive declaration that progress payments and final payment would not be made, until it had in turn been paid by the government, would justify respondent in believing that the same attitude would be maintained by appellant during the performance of the substructure contract. Having decided, however, that the jury was justified in making no award upon appellant's offsets because of failure of appellant to prove damage, it is unnecessary for us to decide whether respondent was excused from performing the substructure contract on the theory of anticipatory breach or prevention of performance.

WATTSON v. ELDRIDGE et al., Members of and Constituting Board of Public Works of City of Los Angeles. (Civ. 5988.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 13, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Feb. 11, 1929.

1. Dedication 🔑58—Dedication of artificial canal, laid out and constructed to form complete system of waterways within city, held only for use as canals.

Conveyance to city of certain artificial canals, laid out and constructed so as to form a complete system of waterways, held to constitute dedication to the public for use only as canals in accordance with intention of grantor as manifested by deeds of conveyance.

2. Dedication 🔑15—Intent is material factor in determining whether dedication has occurred.

In determining whether or not a dedication has occurred, the intent of grantor is a material factor.

3. Dedication 🔑58—City was without authority to convert canals, dedicated to public use as such, into surface streets.

Where canals laid out within city as complete system of waterways were dedicated to public use as canals or waterways, legislative body of the city was without authority to convert them into surface streets by means of grading and filling, in that such a use would not be consistent with the use to which streets were dedicated.

4. Dedication 🔑58—Property dedicated to particular public use cannot be put to other inconsistent use.

Property dedicated to a particular public use cannot be put to other public use inconsistent with the use of original dedication.

5. Dedication 🔑38—Grantor, after dedicating canals for public use as such only, could not thereafter revoke dedication and dedicate property to different use.

Grantor's attempt by subsequent conveyance to abandon reservation in previous dedication of canals within city that areas were to be used only as such, was without effect, in that grantor, after dedication was complete, could not revoke dedication and dedicate property to other and different purposes.

Original application for writ of mandate by R. A. Wattson against Arthur Eldridge and others, as members of and constituting the Board of Public Works of the City of Los Angeles. Peremptory writ denied.

Arthur M. Ellis, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Hewitt, McCormick & Crump, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMPSON, J. This proceeding seeks the writ of mandate directed to the respondents, as the members of the board of public works of the city of Los Angeles, compelling them to execute a certain contract for the improvement of certain alleged streets in Los Angeles city, under the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730). The respondents refused to execute the contract, and, among their reasons, assigned the fact that the work called for included the filling and improving of artificial canals in that part of Los Angeles, formerly Venice, and stated that there was serious doubt as to whether these canals constituted public streets.

It has been stipulated by the petitioner and the respondents that, of the areas to be improved with concrete pavement, curb, gutters, and sidewalks, the following "are now and have been occupied by and used as canals or waterways, to wit: San Juan Avenue, Market Street, Windward Avenue, Grand Boulevard, Kinney Plaza, Second Avenue, Andulusia Avenue, Cabrillo Avenue and Altair Place —and that there is an existing grade of the bottoms, sides and walkways along and adjacent to all of said canals and that the same have been constructed and at all times up to the present maintained at and to such grades. That the plans and profiles for said work referred to in said ordinance show that said canals and waterways are to be filled and graded to the new grades or elevations indicated thereon and that said walkways are to be removed and reconstructed with new sidewalks and curbs in the place thereof."

The parties to this proceeding being unable to agree upon the title to or the use of the areas heretofore used as canals, a commissioner was appointed to try that issue, and he has found, in substance, that the respondents are mistaken in their belief that the city has not the right to fill in and improve as public streets the areas heretofore used as canals, "for the reason that said canals have been continuously used by the public as public waterways for all purposes of public ways for more than twenty years prior to the passage of the Ordinance of Intention, * * * namely since about the year 1905, and the same constitute and are public streets in the city of Los Angeles." He has also found, in substance, that the owners of lots in the tract containing the canals have not, nor have the owners of lots abutting upon the canals, a right or easement to have the canals kept and maintained as canals. Specifically he has found that "it is not true that any such right is appurtenant to each or every or any lot in said Venice of America Tract." It is also found, in substance, that it is not true that the lands designated as canals are not now open or dedicated "to public use as streets, avenues, lanes or courts," and that it is untrue that the Abbot Kinney Company, who laid out the Venice of America, "by its acts or conduct or otherwise set said lands apart as canals or waterways for use as such perpetually by the owners of land in said tract or the public generally, or either or any thereof * * * that it is true that areas within said lots have at all times herein mentioned been used as public walks and ways, and it is also true that certain areas thereof have been occupied by canals and waterways and have been used for the transportation of persons and things by boat and other water craft, and for recreation and pleasure." Another finding is to the effect that it is not true that certain deeds, which will be later discussed in this opinion, did not convey the fee to the areas now in question to the city of Los Angeles, or to the city of Venice and annexed to the city of Los Angeles since the date of the first deed, subject or subordinate to the right of the owners of lots in the Venice of America tract to have the same kept open and maintained as canals.

Exceptions have been interposed by respondents to these findings, and certain others not necessary now to mention on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify them and that they are contrary to the evidence. The transcript of the testimony is before us, together with the exhibits, and there appears little if any dispute in the record. The differences of opinion really arise from the interpretation put upon certain acts and documents. This is made patent by a reading of the commissioner's memorandum of opinion, which accompanies his findings, wherein he calls attention to the fact that the Venice of America tract was laid out in imitation of "Ancient Venice," but with this difference, that, although the situation of the beautiful and romantic city of the old world required streets of water, the watery public ways of California's Venice were artificially provided, "their functions, however, being essentially those of streets," and that, although these waterways were dedicated to the city of Venice in 1912, the grantor providing that they should be used "solely and only for perpetual waterways and canals free to the public forever," the same grantor by a subsequent deed abandoned the reservation made in its favor in the deed of 1912. The commissioner having determined that the functions of these canals are akin to those of streets, his findings are, as he says, "predicated upon the theory that it is competent for the governing body in charge of the use to ordain a change in the character of the public ways involved whenever such governing body shall determine that the public weal requires such a change." We therefore proceed to set down those facts which may fairly be said to appear from the record without dispute, and which compel us to depart from the conclusion of the commissioner.

In January, 1905, the Abbot Kinney Company laid out and subdivided the Venice of America tract, and, on the map approved by the trustees of Ocean Park, within the boundaries of which the tract was situated, and who accepted the dedication of the streets, roads, alleys, and highways on behalf of the public, the areas in question were designated as lots, followed by the name of the particular canal, such for example: "Lot H, Grand Canal," with the words underneath in fine print, "not to be dedicated." Out of twenty-three blocks in the tract, comprising several hundred lots, all of the lots, with the exception of a portion of those in five blocks, were made to front upon canals, and vehicular and pedestrian traffic was provided for by streets and alleys. The Abbot Kinney Company, as is recited in the findings, at about the time of recording the map, excavated and dredged the canals, lined them with cement, improved the banks and marginal strips with walkways, and planted them to grass, trees, and shrubs, and erected ornamental structures, including boat landings and stairways, and bridges over the canals for ordinary traffic. They were all so laid out and constructed as to "form a complete system of waterways in said Venice of America Tract, each such canal or waterway being connected with all others, and works, facilities and appliances were installed by said Abbot Kinney Company for the inflow and outflow of water whereby an adequate circulation of salt water from the Pacific Ocean was provided for such system of canals." Since their construction, the canals have been used continuously by the public generally for pleasure and recreation, inclusive of boating, bathing, swimming, and aquatic sports. The lots in the tract were sold by the company, and at least several of the deeds contained the following language:

> "To have and to hold all and singular the said premises, together with appurtenances unto the parties of the second part and to their heirs and assigns forever; but there is reserved to the first party, its successors and assigns all rights of way and easements designated or indicated on the aforesaid map as to railways, canals, buildings, arcades, streets, highways, alleys, and like matters and things, and also the exclusive right to lay and maintain any and all pipe deemed necessary or convenient on the said granted premises in the said Venice of America, and also the exclusive right to place and maintain telegraph, telephone and other electric light poles and wires over and upon the said granted premises in such places and position as to the said first party may seem reasonable. * * * All of the before mentioned reservations and conditions are for the benefit of the owners of said lots in said Venice of America as well as of said first party, and that said reservations and conditions shall run with the land and be binding upon the heirs, legal representatives and assigns of the said grantee."

In 1909 the Abbot Kinney Company deeded to the city of Venice the marginal strips along each side of the several different canals for street and sidewalk purposes, the deed, however, containing a proviso that the city should not interfere with the trees, plants, shrubs, and other improvements, which, as we have already observed, were placed thereon by the Abbot Kinney Company. In 1912 the entire lots or canals (including the marginal strips) were deeded to the city of Venice, the grant, however, being upon and subject to the following conditions:

"1. Said City of Venice shall not destroy or permit the destruction of the flowers, plants, or trees on any part of the premises herein granted, but shall care for and maintain the same perpetually.

"2. * * *

"3. Also the premises herein conveyed shall be used by said second party and its successors solely and only for permanent waterways, and canals, free to the public forever."

The findings recite that prior to the deed in 1912 the Abbot Kinney Company maintained the canals, and that subsequent thereto the city of Venice, and, since its annexation to Los Angeles, the city of Los Angeles, have exercised dominion and control over them and maintained them at public cost, and that they have been used by the public without interruption or interference for like purposes as before the deed. In 1925 and 1926, two deeds were executed and delivered, the latter being a correction deed and the grantee being the city of Los Angeles, to which Venice had meanwhile been annexed, by which the Abbot Kinney Company purported to convey to the city the canal areas in question "to be used as and for" public streets.

[1, 2] Under these facts we cannot escape the conclusion that there was manifest an intention on the part of the grantor to set aside and dedicate the canal areas to the public for use as canals, improved and beautified on both sides with parkways and walks. It is equally obvious that for more than twenty years the public and the owners of lots in the tract have occupied and used the land for the purposes intended. Under these circumstances it is impossible for us to reach any conclusion other than that there has been a dedication to the public for use as canals. Intent is the material factor in determining whether a dedication has occurred. As is said in People v. County of Marin, 103 Cal. 223, 37 P. 203, 26 L. R. A. 659 in speaking of the difference between express and implied dedication: "The substantial difference between the two consists in the mode of proof. In the former case the intention to appropriate the land to public use is manifested by some outward act of the owner manifesting his purpose, while in the latter it is usually by such acts or conduct not directly manifesting the intention, but from which the law will imply the intent." See, also, Myers v. City of Oceanside, 7 Cal. App. 87, 93 P. 686; City of Los Angeles v. Kysor, 125 Cal. 463, 58 P. 90; Anaheim v. Langenberger, 134 Cal. 608, 66 P. 855. In People v. Myring, 144 Cal. 354, 77 P. 976, where the question referred to dedication of certain highways, the court says: "The dedication of a road as a public highway is the setting it apart by the owner of the land for the use of the public, and the subsequent use thereof by the public operates as an acceptance of the same and makes it a public highway. Such dedication may be express, as by a grant to the public, or it may be implied from the circumstances under which the road is set apart and used. The adverse user of the road by the public with the knowledge of the owner for a period of time corresponding to that fixed for conferring a title by prescription establishes as against the owner a presumption of dedication. 'It affords the conclusive and indisputable presumption of knowledge and acquiescence, while at the same time it negatives the idea of mere license' (Schwerdtle v. County of Placer, 108 Cal. 589 [41 P. 448]; Hartley v. Vermillion, 141 Cal. 340 [74 P. 987]). Under this rule the evidence before the jury, as above shown, was sufficient to justify them in finding that the road had been dedicated by the defendant as a public highway. There was, moreover, evidence of positive acts on his part tending to confirm this presumption. In 1876, prior to the construction of the road, he had signed a petition to the board of supervisors for the laying out of the road in the vicinity of its route, and had also signed the grant of a right of way therefor, and after the road was built he had, at different times, worked upon it for its repair. * * *"

So here, we not only have a user by the public for a period in excess of twenty years, but we have the unambiguous grant of the owner to the city upon condition that the areas be used solely for canal purposes "free to the public forever." And, if there were any doubt concerning the acceptance by user, certainly there can be none concerning the acceptance evidenced by the city when, subsequent and pursuant to the deed, it assumed dominion and control over the canals, and maintained them for more than ten years at public cost. Wolfskill v. County of Los Angeles, 86 Cal. 405, 24 P. 1094. Nor do we find the inconsistency, suggested in the briefs, between the provisions of the several deeds to the effect that the reservation of the canals, etc., shall be "for the benefit of the owners of lots in said Venice of America as well as of" the grantor, and the fact that the map indicated that the canal areas were "not to be dedicated." The rational interpretation to be put upon the words found on the map, and the only one which is reconcilable with all the other acts, is that the words were used in order that the city trustees of Ocean Park should not by their acceptance, on behalf of the public, of streets, alleys, etc., obligate the city for the maintenance of the canals.

[3, 4] Having concluded that the canals were dedicated to public use as canals or waterways, the next question to be considered is whether the legislative body of the city may convert them into surface streets in the manner followed in this proceeding. We are convinced that it cannot. The books abound with authorities to the effect that property dedicated to a particular public use cannot be put to other public use inconsistent with the use of the original dedication. To illustrate to what extent this rule is carried we refer to the case of Spires v. City of Los Angeles, 150 Cal. 64, 87 P. 1026, 11 Ann. Cas. 465, where the Supreme Court determined that, while a public library might be erected upon property dedicated to use as a public park on the ground that it was conducive to the increased use and enjoyment of the land as a park, nevertheless it was held that space could not be provided therein for the use of the board of education. It is there said: "If any part of such building could be used for one administration purpose, it might gradually be devoted to another. If one municipal board or municipal officer of the city having no direct relation to the library can be located therein, so may another, and so the building which the city has a right to erect as a library building solely in aid of the public enjoyment of the park may be gradually invaded for administration purposes and ultimately devoted to those purposes." In Hall v. Fairchild-Gilmore-Wilton Co., 66 Cal. App. 615, 227 P. 649, it was held that an attempt to devote a portion of a public park to street purposes was void and beyond the authority of the legislative body of the city. Numerous authorities are therein cited to uphold the statement that, where the public accepts property designated for use for certain purposes, its acceptance is burdened with the use thus designated, and the object and purpose of the dedication cannot be destroyed by its use for other purposes. Reference may also be had to Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 43, 28 P. 839, 16 L. R. A. 145, and Slavich v. Hamilton, 201 Cal. 299, 257 P. 60, the latter of which points out that the rule is more strict and the use more narrowly limited where the dedication is by private individuals than where the land is acquired by public purchase. Carrying the rule one step further, it has been determined in Mulvey v. Wangenheim, 23 Cal. App. 268, 137 P. 1107 (and this applies directly to the right of the owners of lots abutting upon and facing the canals), that the owner of property abutting upon a public park is entitled to enjoin the city officials from extending a public street through it, the court saying: "The plaintiffs purchased said property with respect to its location abutting upon said portion of said park and in reliance upon the uses and trusts upon which the title to said park lands is held. No compensation has been provided to be paid to plaintiffs on account of the damage which they claim that they will suffer by the opening and construction of said street." In accord with this enunciation is that found in Riverside v. MacLain, 210 Ill. 308, 71 N. E. 408, 66 L. R. A. 288, 102 Am. St. Rep. 164, where a similar situation was in question. And so we think are the authorities of Eachus v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 103 Cal. 614, 37 P. 750, 42 Am. St. Rep. 149, and Bigelow v. Ballerino, ,111 Cal. 559, 44 P. 307, in which it was held that "the right of the owner of a city lot to the use of the street adjacent thereto is property which cannot be taken from him for public use without compensation."

Is the use proposed to be made of these canal areas consistent with the use to which they were dedicated? It is hardly necessary for us to deal with any legal refinements in an effort to distinguish by definition an artificial canal used for boating, swimming, and aquatic sports from a public street filled with automobiles, street cars, and pedestrians. No one would be so hardy as to argue that the use of Broadway in Los Angeles, Market street in San Francisco, Pennsylvania avenue in Washington, or Fifth avenue in New York as canals would be consistent with the use to which they have been set aside and dedicated as public streets. Why is not the converse true? The artificial canals of Venice are as fully a distinguishing characteristic of the latter place as the individual boulevards are of either of the former cities. They are not so much highways as they are in the nature of public parks—true, they may by means of the water itself be used as watery ways of transportation—but they are chiefly used as places of amusement and recreation. As streets, the means of transportation heretofore made use of would be destroyed, and, instead of places of amusement and recreation, they would be filled with a wriggling mass of noisy and offensive smelling vehicles. Desirable as it may be to open additional surface arteries of traffic, it cannot be successfully argued that their use for vehicles, animals, and pedestrians is consistent with their dedicated use for boats and bathers. There is much more reason for arguing that the use of public parks with walkways and driveways could be converted into commercial thoroughfares, and at least the same amount of reason for saying that the lakes of our parks, used as they are for boating, could be transformed into highways. It has been almost useless to search the books for a parallel situation, because common knowledge informs us that there is probably no other city in our country with an artificial canal system. The nearest approach to our problem which we have been able to find appears in the case of Perkins v. Town of Colebrook, 68 Conn. 113, 35 A. 772, in which the court uses this language: "In the case at bar it is apparent that the way prayed for was substantially a way over the waters of a pond—a waterway. Whether a private way over water, like the present one, can be laid out at all * * * may well admit of doubt. The statute, in speaking of public highways and private ways, seems to contemplate solid ways that can be worked and repaired, over which men and animals may pass on foot, and whereon wheeled vehicles may be drawn, and whose limits are defined by permanent solid objects, and not an air-drawn line. It contemplates a road or path as distinguished from a ferry or right of ferriage. In Imlay v. Railroad Co., 26 Conn. 249, 256 [68 Am. Dec. 392] this court said: 'The term "public highway," as employed in such of our statutes as convey the right of eminent domain, has certainly a limited import. Although, as suggested at the bar, a navigable river or canal is, in some sense, a public highway, yet an easement assumed under the name of a highway would not enable the public to convert a street into a canal. The highway, in the true meaning of the word, would be destroyed.'"

[5] We have yet to inquire into the effect, if any, of the deeds of 1925 and 1926. As already noted, the commissioner concluded that the Abbot Kinney Company abandoned the reservation that the areas were to be used only and solely for canals. The language we have quoted from the deed of 1912 does not, however, indicate a reservation, but designates the purposes of the use. It would be strange, indeed, after a dedication were complete, if the grantor could revoke the dedication, and dedicate the property to other and different purposes, or if the right could still reside in the grantor to release the conditions imposed by the original conveyance. As soon as the dedication is complete the right of the public is fixed and the former owner loses all control over the property. Such is the declaration of the Supreme Court in Slavich v. Hamilton, supra, and the cases therein cited, and by the petitioner herein is concluded.

Even if we were to assume, contrary to the fact, that there had been no dedication, there would then be another obstacle to the obliteration of these canals in the manner here attempted. It is conceded that they have been used by the owners of lots in the Venice of America tract, as well as by the public, for more than twenty years before the present proceeding. There is a unanimity in the decisions to the effect that the same rights may be acquired in an artificial water course by user over that period of time as in a natural watercourse, even to the extent of holding where the waters of a natural water course are diverted by a dam from the main to a smaller channel, that one who has used the water thus diverted for power purposes is entitled to have the same maintained. Murchie v. Gates, 78 Me. 300, 4 A. 698. For the authorities generally on this subject, see Cole v. Bradbury, 86 Me. 380, 29 A. 1097; Dority v. Dunning, 78 Me. 381, 6 A. 6; Stimson v. Inhabitants of Brookline, 197 Mass. 568, 83 N. E. 893, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 280, 125 Am. St. Rep. 382, 14 Ann. Cas. 907; Watkins v. Peck, 13 N. H. 360, 40 Am. Dec. 156; Shepardson v. Perkins, 58 N. H. 354; Ranney v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co., 137 Mo. App. 537, 119 S. W. 484.

It has been suggested that the case of Schultz v. City of Venice, 200 Cal. 50, 251 P. 914, has an important bearing upon the proceeding and may be conclusive upon us. As we understand the holding therein, it has no bearing upon the questions before us. All that the Supreme Court determined in that case was that they could not review the testimony to determine its insufficiency to support the findings without specifications of insufficiency in the bill of exceptions, where the pleadings tendered, and it was apparent that the cause was tried upon the theory that the pleadings sufficiently tendered, the issues covered by the findings.

Other objections are argued by the respondents why the writ should not issue; particularly it is said that there is a lack of definiteness in the ordinance of intention, but no useful purpose would be served, nor is it necessary to discuss them further.

O'NEIL v. EDWARDS. (Civ. 6252.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 17, 1928.

Easements ⟹36(3)—Evidence supported finding that defendant's easement in portion of plaintiff's property for driveway was established by grant, estoppel, prescription, and ratification.

Finding that defendant's easement in portion of plaintiff's property used as driveway was fully established by grant, estoppel, prescription, and ratification held supported by evidence, where predecessors in interest of parties some 16 years before entered into written agreement to construct mutual driveway upon contiguous portion of their premises, and evidence indicated plaintiff had notice thereof.

in common with plaintiff, and prayed for damages for the denial of the use. The trial court found in favor of defendant and entered judgment quieting title to a common driveway and restraining plaintiff from interfering therewith and granting defendant $1 damages and costs of suit.

The court made numerous findings, from which it appears that defendant's title to the easement had been fully established by grant, estoppel, prescription, and ratification. Appellant claims that certain of these findings are not supported by the evidence. There is no merit in the contention. It appeared in evidence that the predecessors in interest of the parties had on August 1, 1912, entered into a written agreement to construct a mutual driveway upon contiguous portions of their respective premises. This joint use was for the purpose of enabling the owners to reach the rear of their lots by automobile. This grant of easement was expressly created and designed by them to run with the land as a covenant, the agreement providing that "the common driveway shall be perpetual and shall attach to their heirs and assigns forever." Upon the execution of this agreement, one of the parties thereto immediately constructed a garage upon his premises and made use of the driveway. The agreement was not recorded at the time plaintiff acquired title to one of the parcels of land impressed with the easement, but there is ample evidence to show that at that time the driveway was open, laid out, in visible existence, and was seen by her prior to the taking of her title. The evidence also shows that the driveway was used under a color of right and for many years after plaintiff acquired her property was so used without objection or hindrance, and that plaintiff herself not only acquiesced in its use, but availed herself of its benefits.

A further review of the evidence would answer no useful purpose. It fully supports the findings of the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

COMER v. LOS ANGELES RY. CORPORATION. (Civ. 6294.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 18, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 17, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 14, 1929.

1. Trial 🔑404(1)—Findings should be read together and liberally construed in support of judgment, reconciling conflict on material points.

All findings of trial court are to be read together and liberally construed in support of the judgment, and if possible should be reconciled so as to prevent any conflict on material points.

2. Trial 🔑398—Ultimate facts found which support judgment are not overcome by inconsistent findings as to certain of probative facts.

In reviewing sufficiency of finding, ultimate facts, which are in themselves sufficient to support judgment, may not be overcome by mere findings of probative facts, which are not the only facts on which the court may have based its ultimate finding.

3. Appeal and error 🔑996—Reviewing court may draw necessary inferences from findings to support judgment.

It is well established that the reviewing court is entitled to draw necessary inferences to support the judgment.

4. Electricity 🔑19(13)—Findings of negligence and lack of contributory negligence, in automobile driver's action for injuries from contact with broken trolley wire, supported judgment for plaintiff, notwithstanding finding that wire became heated and illumined.

In action for injuries, to driver of automobile colliding with broken trolley wire, findings of trial court that injuries were caused proximately by defendant's negligence, and that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, held to sustain judgment in plaintiff's favor, though trial court also found that short circuit caused wire to become heated and illumined, from which it was claimed that plaintiff's failure to see it was negligence.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)—Failure of trial court to make additional findings is not ground for reversal, where record indicates such findings would have been adverse to appellant.

Where it is evident from the facts found and the judgment, in the light of the entire record, that more complete findings, if made, would have been adverse to appellant, omission to make further findings is not ground for reversal.

6. Electricity 🔑19(5)—Finding of want of contributory negligence, in automobile driver's action for injuries resulting from contact with broken trolley wire, held sustained by evidence.

In action for injuries to driver of automobile, resulting from contact with broken trolley wire which came in contact with rail of car track, causing short circuit, which illumined the wire, evidence held sufficient to support trial court's finding that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

geles, collided with a broken trolley wire of the appellant company, sustaining injuries to himself and damage to his automobile. Thereupon he brought this action for damages, and upon trial before a jury was awarded a verdict, but the judgment entered thereon was reversed on appeal because of erroneous instructions. Comer v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 66 Cal. App. 219, 225 P. 869. The action was then tried before the court sitting without a jury, and judgment was again rendered in respondent's favor, and the company again appealed.

The material facts surrounding the accident were as follows: During the early part of the month of January, about 6:35 o'clock in the evening, appellant's trolley wire, suspended above its south-bound track on Vermont avenue, broke at a point some distance south of the intersection of Vermont avenue and Tenth street, just after the car had passed under it, and a considerable portion of it fell between the tracks. It was already dark, the lights were lit, and there was considerable traffic on the street at the time. When the trolley wire broke and fell, the car stopped; and while the motorman was adjusting the trolley pole attached to the top of the car, and trying to sweep the wire free from the rails, the conductor was endeavoring to give warning to drivers of approaching vehicles. The wire sputtered around for a while, and finally became welded to the easterly rail of the south-bound track. Respondent drove along a few minutes after the wire broke, traveling in a southerly direction and in the regular traveled portion of the street. He saw the car, but, there being no crossing where it had stopped, paid little attention to it, intending to pass it on the right-hand side. He testified that he was traveling between 15 and 20 miles an hour, when suddenly he saw a man, who afterwards proved to be the conductor, jump out in the street directly in the pathway of his machine; that he believed the man was hailing him for a ride, but being in a hurry and having some money on his person he concluded not to stop; and that in order to avoid hitting the man he turned suddenly to the left and drove directly into the wire which, he testified, he had not seen at any time before striking it. When the machine came in contact with the wire there was a flash, followed by flames and sparks, and in some manner respondent was thrown or jumped from his automobile to the pavement, and, besides sustaining severe shock, his ankle was broken and his automobile damaged.

No point is made by appellant on this appeal as to its own negligence, it being conceded that the evidence adduced at both trials is substantially the same on all issues, and that therefore, under the law as declared by the decision on the former appeal, the evidence here is unquestionably sufficient to support the trial court's affirmative finding on that issue.

However, appellant assails the form and sufficiency of the trial court's findings herein determining the issue of contributory negligence, and also the sufficiency of the evidence to support those portions of the findings. With respect thereto, the state of the record is as follows: In paragraph IX of the second amended answer appellant pleaded contributory negligence as an affirmative defense, it being alleged therein "that after its said trolley wire broke the same came in contact with the rail of the said car track and caused a short circuit, which in turn caused the said wire to become heated and brightly illumined, and the same could have been seen by the said plaintiff or any other person passing along Vermont avenue who was exercising any care or caution; * * * that the said contact with the said wire was due to the utter failure upon the part of said plaintiff to exercise ordinary, or any, care, for his own safety, and his entire disregard of the warnings of said conductor."

In determining the truth of said allegations, the trial court found, in paragraph 10 of its findings, as follows: "That it is true that the trolley wire broke and came in contact with the rail of the car track and caused a short circuit which in turn caused said wire to become heated and illumined," but that it is not true that the conductor gave warning of the broken wire, "nor is it true that the said contact with the said wire by plaintiff's automobile was due to the utter failure, or any failure, upon the part of said plaintiff to exercise ordinary, or any care, for his own safety, or his entire disregard of the warnings of said conductor; and the court further finds that it is not true that the injuries and damages found herein, and which resulted proximately from said accident, were directly, proximately, and concurrently, or either or at all, contributed to by the fault, carelessness and negligence, or either, of the said plaintiff, but, on the contrary, the court finds that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, or any negligence, as alleged in the separate defense in paragraph IX of the second amended answer to the complaint, but, on the contrary, that the negligence of the defendant as found herein in paragraph 9 was and is the sole proximate cause of the injuries and damage to the plaintiff, as found herein."

Appellant interprets the decision on the former appeal as holding that, if the broken wire was lighted sufficiently so that it could have been seen with ordinary care, respondent was guilty of contributory negligence; and that whether it was so lighted was a question of fact for the determination of the trial court or jury; and, basing its argument on the foregoing construction, appellant contends that a fair and reasonable interpretation of the word "illumined" as used in said findings, is that the wire was sufficiently lighted so that it could have been easily seen, and that therefore said finding is in conflict with, and contrary to, the general finding of the trial court that respondent was not guilty of contributory negligence; and it further contends that, if such be not the reasonable interpretation of the word "illumined" as used in said finding, then there was a failure to find upon a material question of fact presented by the plea of contributory negligence, that is, as to whether or not said wire was lighted sufficiently so that it could have been seen with the exercise of ordinary care. We find no merit in either point.

In our opinion, the plain meaning and effect of the trial court's findings as a whole, as set forth in paragraph 10 thereof, a portion of which is hereinabove quoted, is that the wire was not sufficiently illuminated so that it could have been easily seen with ordinary care; and we believe that such meaning is emphasized by the fact that, in addition to having negatived allegations of specific acts of contributory negligence as pleaded by appellant, the trial court made a general and ultimate finding to the effect "that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence or any negligence, as alleged in the separate defense in paragraph IX of the second amended answer to the complaint," which necessarily negatived the specific allegation contained in said paragraph IX to the effect that "said broken wire could have been seen by said plaintiff or any other person passing along Vermont avenue who was exercising any care or caution."

[1-3] The established rule is that all the findings are to be read together, and liberally construed in support of the judgment; and if possible are to be so reconciled as to prevent any conflict on material points (Neher v. Kauffman, 197 Cal. 674, 242 P. 713; Goodwin v. Snyder, 70 Cal. App. 98, 232 P. 763); and the law is also well settled that in reviewing the sufficiency of findings the ultimate facts found, which are in themselves sufficient to support the judgment, will be deemed controlling, and may not be overcome by findings of mere probative facts, which are not shown by the findings to be the only facts proved, and from which alone the court finds the ultimate facts (2 Cal. Jur. p. 872, and cases cited; Enterprise Foundry Co. v. Polly, 73 Cal. App. 225, 238 P. 722; Culver v. Miller, 54 Cal. App. 545, 202 P. 338; Snearly v. Hiestand, 50 Cal. App. 393, 195 P. 272); also that the reviewing court is entitled to draw necessary inferences from the findings to support the judgment (Lomita Land & Water Co. v. Robinson, 154 Cal. 36, 97 P. 10, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1106; Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 562, 217 P. 750).

[4, 5] Applying the legal rules above set forth to the findings in the present case, it is obvious that they are sufficient to sustain the judgment. Moreover, as said in Hulen v. Stuart, supra: "From the facts found, and from the judgment ordered, it is evident, in the light of the entire record, that if more complete findings had been made they would have been adverse to the contentions of the appellant. If that be so, the failure to find further is not a ground for the reversal of the judgment (Krasky v. Wollpert, 134 Cal. 338, 342 [66 P. 309])."

[6] Further contention is made by appellant that in any event the ultimate finding of the trial court as to the alleged contributory negligence of the respondent is unsupported by the established facts. The evidence relating to this issue was summarized by the decision rendered on the former appeal as follows: "After the wire fell it sputtered and squirmed around, subsequently becoming welded to a rail of the track, and there was testimony that it got very hot, first turning red, then white. The conductor testified that it was five or six minutes from the time his car first went dark and he discovered the broken wire until respondent's accident; that until the accident happened he had not looked up at the wire, but that there was a reflection on the pavement, and he was conscious of a glow; other witnesses testified to having seen light from the wire before the collision, while still others said that it did not extend far along the wire, and that there was not much light given off. Respondent stated positively that it did not give off any light, and that he did not know the wire was down until he struck it with his machine, when 'everything lit up.'" And, in passing upon the sufficiency of such evidence, the court said: "We do not agree with appellant's contention that the court erred in refusing to grant its motion for nonsuit, or to give the peremptory instruction directing a verdict for defendant. * * * In view of the contradictory testimony above outlined, we are not at liberty to say that the evidence of contributory negligence was 'conclusive,' since there was evidence tending to show that the plaintiff was not negligent"—citing authorities.

On the present appeal appellant concedes that "the testimony on all issues is substantially the same as given at the former trials, except that the defendant produced an additional witness who had not been found at the former trial, a Mr. Rogers, but his testimony added nothing so far as the legal questions are concerned, simply tending to corroborate the evidence already commented on, showing that the wire was at a white heat"; and, that being so, we find no reason to disagree with the conclusion reached on the former appeal as to this point.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MIHALY. (Cr. 1519.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 18, 1928.

1. Larceny ⚷65—Evidence held to support verdict of guilty of grand theft of automobile.

Evidence held sufficient to support verdict finding defendant guilty of grand theft of automobile.

2. Criminal law ⚷369(5)—Evidence of defendant's statements that he could not keep car found in garage with stolen car, because prevented from stealing tire, held admissible.

Where defendant was seen by police officer leaving garage, containing stolen car, stripped of accessories, and another car containing defendant's coat and letters, testimony of witness that defendant said he could not keep such car, because he was interfered with by police while endeavoring to steal a tire, was relevant to connect defendant with the car found in the garage, and show admission that he had been stealing a tire when the police appeared, and not inadmissible as showing similar crimes.

3. Criminal law ⚷956(11)—Verdict cannot be impeached by hearsay affidavit as to occurrences in jury room.

A verdict may not be impeached by hearsay affidavit of defendant's attorney as to what occurred in the jury room.

4. Criminal law ⚷703—Opening statements of counsel do not limit right to introduce evidence.

Opening statements of counsel are not limitation on right of either party to introduce evidence of facts not referred to.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Leon E. Gray, Judge.

Eugene Mihaly was convicted of grand theft, and from the judgment, and an order denying motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

John Corgiat, Jr., of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. The defendant was tried before a jury on an information framed in two counts, the first charging a violation of section 146 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 564), the driving of an automobile without the consent of the owner, and the second charging grand theft. The information also charged two prior convictions. The defendant pleaded not guilty to the charges in each count of the information and admitted the two prior convictions. The jury found the defendant not guilty on the first count, and guilty as charged in the second count. The defendant has appealed from the judgment following the verdict, and from the order of the court denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] On May 1, 1928, a man by the name of Brown rented a private garage, No. 7, connected with the Glenwood apartment house in the city of Oakland. On the same day a Hudson automobile was stolen from a place near the Melrose station on Forty-Sixth avenue in Oakland. Theft of this car having been reported to the police department, a police officer, in company with two others, approached the Glenwood Apartments, following the tracks of an automobile which had been stolen a few days previous, and which had been run from this garage without tires and abandoned upon the street. As the three parties approached the garage, the defendant and Brown came out, and, when ordered to stop by the police officer, both ran; defendant being captured some two months later.

An inspection of the garage at the time disclosed the stolen Hudson automobile stripped of its accessories. Near by was found a Jewett car, in which were the defendant's coat and letters addressed to him. The witness Pacetti, who was employed in an automobile repair shop in Oakland, testified that the defendant and Brown had been together at his place of business on numerous occasions; that he had loaned this Jewett car to the defendant, and that immediately following the theft of the Hudson car the defendant informed the witness that he was unable to retain the Jewett, because "we got knocked over making a hoop," which, being interpreted, meant that they were interfered with by the police in endeavoring to steal an automobile tire. The same witness also testified that on a number of occasions the defendant had offered him tires for sale.

On this appeal the appellant states that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict of guilty, but does not point out wherein any material element of the crime was not proved. The statement of facts which we have heretofore given, which was wholly uncontradicted, is fully sufficient for this purpose.

[2] The argument is made that the trial court erred in refusing to strike all the testimony of the witness Pacetti, just referred to. The argument is that this testimony was introduced solely for the purpose of prejudicing the jury, in that it tended to connect the defendant with the commission of similar crimes. The point is wholly without merit. The testimony was relevant for the purpose of connecting the defendant with the Jewett car, found in front of the garage, as well as for the purpose of bringing before the jury the admission of the defendant that he had been stealing a tire when the police appeared.

[3] An attempt is made to attack the verdict upon the claim of fraud, upon the hearsay affidavit of the attorney for the appellant as to what occurred in the jury room. It needs no citation of authority that a verdict may not be impeached in this manner.

[4] Finally, it is argued that the district attorney failed to state sufficient facts in his opening statement to show the commission of a crime. No authorities are cited by appellant in support of his contention, and it would seem unnecessary to cite authority to the well-known rule that the opening statements of counsel are not a limitation upon the right of either party to introduce evidence of facts not referred to. See 8 Cal. Jur. p. 259, § 322; People v. Stoll, 143 Cal. 689, 693, 77 P. 818.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 17, 1928.

1. Garnishment 🔑42—Commissions earned under agreement with employer to hold commissions as protection on employé's notes guaranteed by employer held not debt due employé until notes were paid, but mere contingent obligation not subject to garnishment.

In action by divorced wife against divorced husband and employers to establish existence of indebtedness due husband and apply same in satisfaction of judgment for alimony, where husband agreed with employers that any commissions earned should be held by employers for their protection as guaranty against loss from liability as accommodation makers on certain notes of husband, commissions earned by husband did not ripen into debt until notes were fully paid, but constituted mere contingent or conditional obligation, which, in absence of fraud, neither husband nor judgment creditor could enforce, and which was not subject to garnishment, regardless whether commissions were earned before or after levy of execution.

2. Garnishment 🔑105—Judgment creditor is in same position as debtor as regards debt due debtor sought to be garnished.

In absence of fraud, judgment creditor seeking to establish indebtedness due defendant subject to garnishment could stand in no better position than defendant, and could not enforce payment if defendant could not do so at any time prior to trial.

3. Garnishment 🔑42—Debt which may never become due is not garnishable.

Debt which is uncertain and contingent, in sense that it may never become due and payable, is not subject to garnishment.

4. Garnishment 🔑42—That commissions were credited on employé's note to employer, instead of being held as guaranty for payment thereof, held immaterial as regards garnishment.

In action to establish indebtedness due divorced husband and sought to be garnished, defended on ground that commissions due husband by employer could be retained by employer for protection on notes guaranteed by employer, fact that commission was credited on payment of note given by husband to employer, instead of being held as guaranty for payment of notes guaranteed by employer, held immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action by Nancy B. Clecak against W. F. Dunn and another, copartners doing business under the name and style of Dunn-Williams Company, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Leo R. Friedman, of San Francisco, for appellant.

A. Don Duncan and Nat. Schmulowitz, both of San Francisco, and C. M. Booth, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff and appellant, who is the divorced wife of respondent John A. Clecak, on June 14, 1926, procured a writ of execution for unpaid alimony in the sum of $2,078 to be levied on the respondents W. F. Dunn and J. A. Williams, copartners doing business as Dunn-Williams Company, to garnish a debt alleged to be owing from said Dunn and Williams to respondent Clecak. Dunn and Williams, by return to the levy, denied any indebtedness to Clecak. Thereafter, on June 26, 1926, appellant commenced this suit in equity seeking a decree establishing the existence of said alleged indebtedness and compelling its application in satisfaction of said judgment for alimony. Respondents answered, admitting that respondent Clecak had earned a certain commission of $1,500 by reason of an exchange of two parcels of real property in the negotiation of which he had acted as one of the brokers, but alleged that nothing was due or owing from respondents Dunn and Williams to respondent Clecak by reason of the following facts: That on January 19, 1926, Dunn and Williams had become the accommodation makers with Clecak of one promissory note for $4,000 and had unconditionally guaranteed the payment of another note executed by Clecak for $6,000; and that coincident therewith, as security against loss by Dunn and Williams in case they should be compelled to pay all or any part of such notes, Clecak had executed and delivered to Dunn and Williams his promissory note for $10,000, and "it was then and there agreed by and between the said W. F. Dunn and J. A. Williams, doing business as the Dunn-Williams Co., and the said John A. Clecak, that any commissions due or owing or belonging to the said John A. Clecak through or from the Dunn-Williams Co. should not be paid to said John A. Clecak, but should be credited on account of said promissory note or on account of the said two obligations for which the said Dunn-Williams Co. were guarantors for the said John A. Clecak, at the option of the said Dunn-Williams Co." And that the $1,500 commission earned by Clecak was accordingly not due or owing to Clecak, but "to pass as a credit on the account of John A. Clecak with W. F. Dunn and J. A. Williams on account of the aforesaid agreements." The evidence showed without conflict that the $1,500 was earned by Clecak as a commission from Dunn and Williams for the exchange of a hotel building in which Dunn and Williams had a one-half interest, that only a small part of the notes for $4,000 and $6,000, respectively, had been paid, and that on June 30, 1926, Dunn and Williams, acting pursuant to their claimed rights under their agreement with Clecak, entered a credit on their books of $1,500 in favor of Clecak on his $10,000 note held by them.

Because we believe it to be the crux of the case, we quote rather fully from the testimony of Dunn and Clecak, who were the only witnesses examined on this subject, concerning Clecak's agreement with Dunn and Williams.

Respondent W. F. Dunn testified as follows:

"It was agreed that he (Clecak) was to leave with our firm the sums that he earned through our office in commissions. * * *

"Q. But you had an understanding with Mr. Clecak whereby Mr. Clecak was to leave with your firm any monies that he received through dealings with your firm? A. Yes.

"Q. * * * What were to become of the commissions? A. They were to be credited on the books of our account and if he did not make his payments upon the Beecher and Ivancovich notes and we should be called upon to make the payments and advance that money for him."

Respondent Clecak testified: "I assigned all the commissions made through their office to Dunn-Williams Co. as a guarantee that I would pay that $10,000 as I was called upon to meet them. I agreed that all the commissions be assigned to the Dunn-Williams Co., and this would stand until the account was weeded out."

Judgment went for the defendants, and this appeal is prosecuted therefrom.

[1-3] Appellant presents her appeal on the theory that there was no assignment, either legal or equitable, of the $1,500 commission to Dunn and Williams prior to the levy of the execution and the commencement of the suit, and hence that by the levy appellant obtained the right to compel the payment of the $1,500 to her which she could not subsequently be deprived of by any act of the parties. This is based on the claim that under the agreement Dunn and Williams had the option to apply this commission either as a credit on Clecak's note for $10,000 which they held, or to pay it on one or the other of the notes upon which they were liable, and that until they had exercised this option in some manner the commission had not been appropriated by them under the agreement and was therefore unqualifiedly due to Clecak at the time of the levy. We do not think that the agreement as testified to justifies this contention. The legal effect of the agreement was that any commissions earned from them by Clecak should be held by Dunn and Williams for their protection as a guaranty against loss from their liability upon the notes of Clecak to others upon which they had made themselves liable. Until the notes were fully paid, any commissions earned by Clecak from Dunn and Williams did not ripen into a debt, but constituted a mere contingent or conditional obligation. It was expressly stipulated by counsel for appellant that there was no element of fraud in this agreement. In the absence of fraud, appellant can stand in no better position than Clecak could. Since Clecak could not have enforced payment at any time prior to the trial of this action, his judgment creditor cannot do so. "A debt which is uncertain and contingent in the sense that it may never become due and payable, is not subject to garnishment." 28 Cor. Jur. 130; 12 R. C. L. p. 794; Early v. Redwood City, 57 Cal. 193; Maier v. Freeman, 112 Cal. 8, 13, 44 P. 357, 53 Am. St. Rep. 151.

In this view of the case it becomes unnecessary to determine whether the commission was earned after the levy as found by the court, or prior thereto as claimed by appellant. In neither event was anything due to Clecak so as to be subject to garnishment.

[4] It is likewise immaterial that the $1,500 was on June 30, 1926, credited on Clecak's note to Dunn and Williams. That was a mere matter of bookkeeping. The material fact is that, in good faith and without fraud, Dunn and Williams were given the right by Clecak to retain this commission for their protection until such time as the notes on which they were liable had been fully paid.

In the absence of fraud, Clecak could perform services for Dunn and Williams on any terms that he saw fit. Having agreed to those terms, neither he nor any one standing in his shoes can now complain of them.

Judgment affirmed.

95 Cal. App. 481

BRYAN v. BAYMILLER et al. (Civ. 3661.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 13, 1928.

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑109—Purchaser, whom vendors furnished water for irrigation from land company's well under agreement therewith, held not entitled to rescind contract because water company, which was to furnish water, owned no water system or rights.

Purchaser, whom vendors furnished water for irrigation of land from well of land company under agreement therewith whenever demanded or desired by him, held not entitled to rescind contract for failure of consideration in that water company, from which he was to receive water, owned no water system or rights because of conveyance of entire irrigation system to another company by vendors' assignee, even if such agreement gave only a permissive right terminable at any time, as it cannot be said that vendors would be unable to furnish water from other sources.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑114—Purchaser paying interest on balance, promising to pay principal, and negotiating for extension of time, after notice of facts authorizing rescission, waived right to rescind for fraud.

Purchaser paying interest on unpaid portion of price, promising to pay principal, and negotiating with vendors for extension of time therefor, after being notified that water system was to be transferred to another company than that which was to deliver water for irrigation of land and that he would receive no more water unless he purchased stock in such company, waived right to rescind contract for fraud.

3. Contracts 🔑262—Right to rescind contract may be waived.

The right to rescind a contract may be waived.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑119—Purchaser, not rescinding or offering to rescind for about ten months after learning of such right, was guilty of laches precluding rescission (Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 1).

Purchaser, not rescinding or offering to rescind contract until about ten months after obtaining full knowledge of any and all rights to rescind, held guilty of laches precluding rescission, under Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 1.

5. Contracts 🔑270(3)—Whether defrauded party rescinded contract promptly depends on particular circumstances, and is primarily for court (Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 1).

Whether or not defrauded party has rescinded contract promptly, as required by Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 1, depends on circumstances of particular case and is primarily for court, to whom large discretion is confided.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1008(1)—Appellate court will not disturb trial court's conclusion as to whether defrauded party rescinded contract promptly, unless manifestly unjust (Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 1).

Disposition of appellate court is to respect trial court's discretion in determining question whether defrauded party rescinded contract promptly, as required by Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 1, and not to interfere with his conclusions unless injustice was manifestly done.

7. Vendor and purchaser 🔑170—Vendors were justified in refusing purchasers' conditional tender of balance due (Civ. Code, § 1494).

Under Civ. Code, § 1494, vendors were justified in refusing purchasers' tender of balance of purchase price subject to conditions foreign to contract for purchase of land.

8. Contracts 🔑267—Party in default cannot rescind contract.

Rescission of a contract cannot be made by a party who is in default.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Charles Tyson Bryan against W. H. Baymiller and another, copartners doing business as the Baymiller Post Company, the Pacific Land Corporation, and another, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for defendants and for defendant land company on the cross-complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fred C. Pugh, of Red Bluff, and Ernest L. English, of Santa Monica, for appellant.

Huston, Huston & Huston, of Woodland, and McCoy & Gans, of Red Bluff, for respondents.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff brought this action to rescind a contract for the purchase of real estate entered into between him and defendant Baymiller Post Company and to recover the sum of $4,250 paid by him on the purchase price of said land under said contract and for damages in case rescission cannot be had.

Defendants answered, denying the material allegations of the complaint and setting up that plaintiff was guilty of laches in attempting to rescind the contract and that he had waived the alleged fraud of defendants, and also filed a cross-complaint demanding judgment in favor of defendant Pacific Land Company, to whom said contract had been assigned, for the remainder of the purchase price called for by said contract, to wit, $4,500.

Judgment went for defendants and in favor of the Pacific Land Company on the cross-complaint for the said sum of $4,500.

As ground for rescinding the said contract, plaintiff alleges in his complaint:

That the consideration passing to him under the contract has wholly failed, in this, that by said contract Baymiller Post Company agreed that they would bore wells and install pumps and construct a water system necessary to irrigate the lands described in the contract, and, when so constructed, said system would be conveyed to the El Camino Water Company, which last-named company

Baymiller and Post had caused to be incorporated as a subsidiary company to hold title for them to said water system, and that the said water company after such construction and transfer would deliver water for the irrigation of plaintiff's said lands in accordance with a contract entered into by plaintiff with said water company of the same date as that of the contract between Baymiller Post Company and plaintiff, namely, June 3, 1921.

That thereafter Baymiller and Post caused the Pacific Land Corporation to be incorporated and in June, 1922, the said land contract was duly assigned by Baymiller Post Company to said last-named corporation; it assuming all obligation of the Baymiller Post Company contained in said contract.

That after its incorporation said Pacific Land Corporation continued the development of said irrigation system and completed the same in October, 1923. That in February, 1923, Baymiller and Post and Pacific Land Corporation proceeded to incorporate a second water company, known as the El Camino Canal Company. It was organized as a mutual water company empowered to furnish water to the stockholders only, and that on or about September 8, 1923, the Pacific Land Corporation conveyed to said canal company the entire irrigation system aforesaid.

That thereby the El Camino Water Company, with whom plaintiff had contracted for water for the irrigation of his lands, was left without any water system whatever and without means of supplying plaintiff with any part of the water it had contracted to supply him.

That plaintiff purchased the land, agreeing to pay $250 an acre for the same upon the representations of Baymiller and Post that the same would be irrigated under the contract he entered into with the El Camino Water Company, and that without the necessary water to irrigate said land it would not be worth to exceed $25 per acre.

On the 28th of March, 1924, plaintiff served upon defendants a notice of his rescission of said contract, in which he stated that the consideration for his contract for the purchase of said land had failed by reason of the failure and refusal of the El Camino Water Company to develop water for the irrigation of said land and by reason of the transfer of the water system to the El Camino Canal Company, thereby making it impossible for either the Pacific Land Corporation or the El Camino Water Company to deliver water to said land.

The court found defendants had not committed fraud and that the El Camino Water Company was ready, able, and willing to supply to plaintiff the water called for by the said water contract, and that it is not true that since the execution of said water right the lands of plaintiff have been without a water right or right to irrigating water.

Half of plaintiff's land lies north of a public road and the other half south of said road. For the irrigation of the north half a pipe line leads to it from what is known as well No. 6 and for the south half a ditch leads to the same from said well.

The only period during which any of said land was irrigated was during the year 1922, when a tenant of plaintiff raised a crop on a part of the south half of said land. During that period water was conveyed to said south half of said land through a ditch from said well No. 6. Other than this period, neither the plaintiff nor any tenant or agent of his has ever demanded water from defendants for the irrigation of said lands. This well was not owned by any of the defendants. It was the property of the Finnel Land Company, but the right to use water from this well for the irrigation of plaintiff's land was claimed by defendants under an agreement to that effect entered into by the Finnel Land Company with the Pacific Land Corporation.

Although defendants did not own this well, they claimed the right to furnish water for plaintiff's lands from it under the terms of said water contract which provides that the El Camino Water Company might supply the said water from any source whatsoever.

Shortly prior to July 1, 1923, the defendants, other than the El Camino Water Company, co-operating with the landowners who owned land irrigated by said water system, organized a mutual water company, known as the El Camino Canal Company, and about that time plaintiff was informed of the organization of the company and that the defendants, other than the El Camino Water Company, would transfer the said water system to said El Camino Canal Company, and thereupon he was requested to surrender his water contract and purchase water stock of the said canal company in the proportion of one share of water stock for each acre of land owned by him; that is to say, that plaintiff should purchase 35 shares of said stock at $60 per share. This request plaintiff refused.

Plaintiff testified that, at the time defendants made the request or demand that he surrender his water contract and in lieu thereof purchase said stock, they informed him that, unless he did this, he would receive no water for the irrigation of his land. Defendants denied this, and the court found against plaintiff upon this proposition.

[1] In his opening brief, plaintiff appears to rely, as ground for rescinding the land contract, upon the total failure of consideration, and, in support of this contention, says that this failure was due to the fact that the El Camino Water Company owned no water system or water rights or property of any kind.

It appears, however, that the Pacific Land Company to whom the said land contract was assigned, and who, plaintiff alleges in his complaint, assumed all the obligations of Baymiller Post Company called for by said land contract, has a right to irrigate the lands of plaintiff from the said well No. 6, under the agreement with the Finnel Land Company.

Plaintiff argues upon the theory that this agreement does not guarantee a permanent right to the use of the water of said well, but is only a permissive right which may be terminated at any time. Admitting that this contention is true, yet up to the present plaintiff at all times has been furnished with water for the irrigation of his land whenever demanded or desired by him. Even in case defendants lost the right to use water from well No. 6 to irrigate plaintiff's land, it cannot be said that they would not be able to furnish it from other sources. Speaking of impossible considerations, Elliott, in his work on Contracts, vol. 1, § 225, says: "To bring the case within the rule of dispensation, it must appear that the thing to be done cannot by any means be accomplished." And, in the case of Berry v. Wells, 43 Okl. page 70, 141 P. 444, the court used this language: "The contract, as a matter of law, not being impossible of performance, defendants had no right to assume that plaintiff in no way could comply with the conditions which he undertook to perform."

[2] The trial court found that plaintiff had waived any fraud of which defendants might have been guilty by his recognition of the contract, after the time, according to plaintiff's contention, his right to rescind was created, and that is equally true of his right to rescind the contract.

It appears from the evidence that, after plaintiff had notice of the proposed transfer of the water system to the El Camino Canal Company, and after, as he claims, he had been notified by defendants that, unless he purchased stock from said company, he would receive no more water for the irrigation of his said land, he paid interest on the unpaid portion of the purchase price of said land, promised to pay the principal sum and entered into negotiations with defendants for an extension of time for the payment of said principal sum.

[3] That the right to rescind a contract may be waived is well settled. Harrington v. Paterson, 124 Cal. 542, 57 P. 476; Black, Rescission, vol. 2, §§ 590, 594; Elliott, Contracts, vol. 3, § 2430; Bernard v. Sloan, 2 Cal. App. 744, 84 P. 232.

[4-6] The trial court also found that plaintiff was guilty of laches, in that he did not use diligence in rescinding or offering to rescind; that continuously from June, 1923, until the date of the notice to rescind was given, namely, March 28, 1924, plaintiff had full knowledge of any and all rights he may have had to rescind said contract, and that his delay in attempting to rescind was inexcusable. Subdivision 1 of section 1691 of the Civil Code provides that the party seeking to rescind must do so promptly upon discovering the facts which entitle him to do so. Whether or not the defrauded party has rescinded promptly depends upon the circumstances of the particular case, and is a question primarily for the court, to whom a large discretion is confided, and the disposition of the appellate court is and should be to respect that discretion and not interfere with his conclusions unless manifestly an injustice has been done. Pratt v. Pratt, 43 Cal. App. 261, 184 P. 956; French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 217 P. 515. The courts have held that delay in rescinding from one to four months was too late. Schneider v. Henley, 61 Cal. App. 758, 215 P. 1036; Marten v. Paul O. Burns Wine Co., 99 Cal. 355, 33 P. 1107; Bailey v. Fox, 78 Cal. 389, 20 P. 868.

[7] At the time plaintiff served his notice of rescission, he had defaulted in payment of the balance owing on the purchase price of said land. This balance was due on July 1, 1923. In December, 1923, he tendered to defendants the balance of said purchase price, but coupled this tender with conditions. Defendants refused to accept the tender with the said conditions. Defendants were justified in refusing the tender which was made subject to conditions foreign to the contract for the purchase of the land. Section 1494, Civ. Code; Roffinella v. Roffinella, 191 Cal. 753, 218 P. 397.

[8] Rescission of a contract cannot be made by a party who is in default. Russell v. Penniston, 55 Cal. App. 492, 203 P. 813.

We think the judgment should be, and it is, therefore, affirmed.

GAUGER v. WESTBERG. (Civ. 3656.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 18, 1928.

1. Partnership ⚷64—Firm name, which is combination of partners' true names, is not "fictitious name," within statute as to filing and publishing certificate (Civ. Code, §§ 2466, 2468).

Where partners do business under a firm name which is the combination of their true names, it is not transacting business under a fictitious name, so as to require filing and publishing of certificate, under Civ. Code, §§ 2466, 2468.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Fictitious Name.]

2. Evidence ⚷413—Testimony as to manner of addressing bid for doing work held not testimony varying terms of written contract.

Where firm of G. & L. advertised for bids for work, and bid submitted by W. was addressed to Gauger Construction Company, name under which G., before forming the partnership, had done business, testimony that W. had previously done business with the partnership, and sometimes addressed it as G. & L., and sometimes as on the occasion of the bid in question, would not have been testimony varying the terms of a written contract; the address being no part of the bid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Action by Herbert E. Gauger against Ed Westberg. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Page, Nolan, Rohe & Freston and Barstow & King, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John F. Poole, Julius V. Patrosso, and Earle M. Daniels, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiff to recover damages by reason of failure and refusal of the defendant to enter into a contract for the doing of certain plastering on a certain building being erected by the plaintiff, according to the bid for doing such work presented by the defendant to the plaintiff. The defendant had judgment, and the plaintiff appeals.

The record shows that on or about June 29, 1923, the appellant, Herbert E. Gauger, a building contractor, having requested bids for plastering work on a certain building called the California Christian College dormitory, then being erected by the appellant, received a bid from the defendant for doing such work. The complaint alleges the calling for bids, the receiving of bids, that the defendant's bid was the lowest responsible bid received, was accepted by the plaintiff, and the refusal thereafter of the defendant to enter into the contract. The bid received from the defendant, Ed Westberg, was addressed to the Gauger Construction Company, but was delivered to and received by the plaintiff Herbert E. Gauger. At the time of receiving the bid, the plaintiff, Herbert E. Gauger, and one David S. Lockwood were copartners doing business under the name of Herbert E. Gauger and David S. Lockwood. The record also shows that at one time Herbert E. Gauger transacted business under the name of Gauger Construction Company. The record further shows that the claim upon which the action is based was assigned to the plaintiff by the copartnership.

At the trial of the action the plaintiff proposed to show by testimony that the defendant was familiar with the names and personnel of the partnership—that is, that he was acquainted with and knew both Herbert E. Gauger and David S. Lockwood; that the defendant had done business with the partnership on previous occasions, and sometimes addressed the partnership by the name of Gauger & Lockwood, and sometimes as the Gauger Construction Company. The court refused to admit this testimony, and also held that the partnership must have complied with the law relating to fictitious names before the action could be maintained. The findings are also to the effect that at the time of receiving the bid the plaintiff and David S. Lockwood were operating and doing business under the fictitious name and style of Gauger Construction Company, and that the Gauger Construction Company had never filed a certificate as provided by sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code. The findings to which the appellant takes exceptions are as follows:

"* * * That it is not true that said bid was the lowest responsible bid for said work, and it is not true that plaintiff or the Gauger Construction Company notified the defendant of its acceptance and reliance upon said bid of defendant, and it is not true that plaintiff entered into and signed a contract with said trustees for the erection and completion of said dormitory; that it is not true that said bid thus submitted and accepted was for the amount of $15,900; that plaintiff, at the time of the receiving of said bid from the defendant, was in partnership with one David S. Lockwood, operating and doing business under the fictitious name and style of Gauger Construction Company in the city of Los Angeles, Cal.; that Gauger Construction Company had never filed a certificate of doing business under the fictitious name and style with the county clerk of Los Angeles county, nor caused publication of said certificate as provided in sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code of the state of California; that the said David S. Lockwood assigned all his right, title, and interest in and to said contract and offer of the defendant to the plaintiff herein; that plaintiff herein has no legal capacity to sue or maintain this action, nor has the plaintiff's partner, David S. Lockwood, the assignor to plaintiff, the right to enforce or maintain this action; that said bid of the defendant was made to the Gauger Construction Company, which was a fictitious partnership composed of the plaintiff and David S. Lockwood, operating and doing business in the city and county of Los Angeles, state of California, and that neither said partners nor the said Gauger Construction Company has ever filed the certificate of fictitious name with the county clerk of Los Angeles county, nor caused the publication thereof, pursuant to the provisions as contained in sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code of the state of California."

There is absolutely no testimony in the record that Herbert E. Gauger and David S. Lockwood, at the time of receiving the bid from the defendant, were operating or doing business under the name of the Gauger Construction Company. The only testimony in the record on that subject is that they were not so doing business. The following questions, answers and statements of court and counsel illustrate the error under which the trial court was laboring in this case (question of the plaintiff by Mr. Daniels, counsel for defendant):

"Q. Mr. Gauger, at the time, June 29, 1923, the date of the bid that has just been handed me, you were a copartnership? A. Yes.

"Q. Who was your partner? A. David S. Lockwood.

"Q. Well, at the time when this bid was received, you were doing business as the Gauger Construction Company, you and Lockwood? A. No, sir.

"Q. Who were the members of the company? A. There was no Gauger Construction Company at that time, doing business at all.

"The Court: Do you contend that at this date, June 29, Lockwood and the plaintiff were doing business under any particular name?

"Mr. King (of counsel for the plaintiff): No; I don't think so.

"The Court: They must have been doing business under some name, and that name would have to be registered.

"Mr. King: They were doing business under the name of Herbert E. Gauger and David S. Lockwood at that time, and the defendant knew it.

"Mr. Daniels (counsel for the defendant): That is a fictitious name.

"The Court: The partnership must be a fictitious name.

"Mr. King (counsel for plaintiff): Not if they were under real names. There are two names. There is nothing fictitious about it.

"The Court: It is a fictitious name (pardon me), for this reason, that there is no human being of that name. If your name is Herbert E. Gauger, you can do business under that name; you do not have to comply with the statute, but, if Herbert E. Gauger and Mary Gauger want to do business as Herbert E. Gauger and Mary Gauger, that is the name of no human being; it is a fictitious name for the purpose of their going into business.

"Mr. King (counsel for plaintiff): I do not understand that two people could not do business under their own names together. As I understand the decisions, it must be a name which is different from their true names in order to come within the section.

"The Court: Let's get an understanding between court and counsel. You offer to show, as I understand it, from what you have said previously, that the defendant, Westberg, in presenting this bid to Herbert E. Gauger and David Lockwood, were doing business at that time as Herbert E. Gauger and David Lockwood? A. (by Mr. Barstow, of counsel for plaintiff): Yes, sir.

"The Court: And it is a partnership?

"Mr. Barstow: Yes, sir.

"The Court: That the defendant was and had been dealing with said Herbert E. Gauger and David S. Lockwood, under that name and title, for some time?

"Mr. Barstow: Yes, sir.

"The Court: And that name and title of Herbert E. Gauger and David S. Lockwood had not been filed as a fictitious name?

"Mr. Barstow: Your honor, that is correct.

"The Court: Then, if I let you go ahead and show all that, you will land, in my judgment, just where you are right now, because I would exclude the testimony then. I would hold as I have indicated before, and I will say it again, I will hold that, where two people join themselves together as partners doing business as Herbert E. Gauger and David S. Lockwood, that being the names of the two persons, that they have to comply with the fictitious name law in order to maintain an action in that name."

The testimony relative to the presentation of bids and the manner of addressing the bids by the defendant, Westberg, was excluded, and the court, without any testimony whatever to support the finding, held that the plaintiff and David S. Lockwood were doing business under the title of Gauger Construction Company, although the theory of the court at the time of the trial, as indicated by the foregoing, was that they were doing business as a copartnership under the name of Herbert E. Gauger and David S. Lockwood, and certificate would have to be filed.

[1, 2] There being no testimony to support the finding that business was being done under the name of Gauger Construction Company, by the appellant and his partner, David S. Lockwood, at the time of calling for bids, and at the time of the presentation and acceptance of the defendant's bid, the judgment of the court would have to be reversed for that reason; but, as the cause must go back for retrial, we cite the cases of Pendleton v. Cline, 85 Cal. 142, 24 P. 659, and Lamberson v. Bashore, 167 Cal. 387, 139 P. 817, which established the law in this state that, where partners do business under their true names, certificates do not have to be filed, by anything contained in sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code. In the last case cited the partners were doing business under the name of Lamberson & Lamberson. In the first case cited the partners were doing business under the name of Pendleton & Williams, one partner being C. W. Pendleton and the other W. J. Williams. These cases show clearly that the trial court was in error relative to the filing of a certificate, when the true names of the persons are disclosed, and it is therefore in error in excluding the testimony relative to the manner in which Westberg addressed his bid. We may further state that the address was no part of the bid, and testimony relative thereto, and the manner in which Westberg had previously addressed his bids, would not have been testimony varying the terms of a written contract.

For the reasons herein stated the judgment is reversed.

FIRPO v. SLYTER. (Civ. 6447.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 15, 1928.

1. Insurance 🔑188(2)—Defendant's denial that he applied for insurance, showing that application contained untrue statements, and testimony that premium was prohibitive, held to support finding that he did not sign application.

Insistent denial of defendant, sued for premium on life policy, that he made application for insurance, coupled with showing that application contained statements contrary to truth, concerning defendant and his financial ability and age, and testimony that amount of premium was prohibitive, held sufficient to support finding of court that application was never signed by defendant.

2. Insurance 🔑112—Defendant, sued for premium, held not to have ratified agent's act in procuring policy, by keeping policy when insurer returned it to him following defendant's rejection.

Defendant, sued for premium on life policy, held not to have ratified agent's act in procuring the policy insuring his life, by keeping policy after insurer returned it to him following defendant's refusal to accept it.

3. Insurance 🔑188(2)—Return of policy to defendant, who rejected it, held to justify conclusion that insurer tried to force policy on defendant.

Where insurer returned life policy to defendant, sued as the insured for premium after defendant's refusal to accept, conclusion was justified that insurer attempted to force on defendant policy against his wish and without his authority, expressed or implied.

4. Insurance 🔑231—Policy need not be physically delivered and surrendered to insurer to cancel it.

It is not necessary to valid cancellation of insurance policy that it be physically delivered and surrendered to the insurer.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by E. Firpo against Byron Joseph Slyter. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Raymond Perry, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Russell W. Cantrell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. The action is upon an assigned claim of one Frank De Patta against defendant Slyter. The complaint is on the common count for money laid out and expended by said De Patta for the use and benefit of defendant. Issue was joined by a specific denial. Judgment went for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

[1] In determining the questions presented, it becomes necessary to recite in a general way the facts involved in the controversy. De Patta was engaged in the business of soliciting life insurance. In the course of this work he approached the defendant Slyter and interested him to the extent of a consideration of the advisability of making certain changes in his insurance. Discussion was had concerning the policies being carried by Slyter, but apparently the matter went no further. Some time thereafter a physician called at the home of the defendant and stated that he had been sent by De Patta to make a physical examination of defendant. The testimony of the defendant is that he told the doctor that he had ordered no policy, and the doctor then assured him no obligation was being incurred, and that the examination was merely preliminary, so that it might be ascertained what company might accept defendant as a risk before Mr. De Patta would go to the trouble of submitting an application. The examination was had, and the defendant signed a medical report attesting as true the answers given by him in answer to the interrogatories listed in the form. This examination took place on November 20, 1925. There was nothing further done concerning the matter.

[2] Appellant contends that at the time defendant signed the medical report he signed an application for insurance specifying the character of policy applied for and the amount desired, namely $25,000. Evidence was offered by appellant supporting the contention. The evidence consisted of a written application for insurance in the amount named, at the bottom of which was, in writing, the name of defendant. Defendant denied that he had signed any such application and characterized the signature as fake. A handwriting expert was called, who gave his opinion that the signature was genuine. Examples of defendant's genuine signature were received in evidence and compared with the disputed signature. From all of the evidence the finding of the trial court is that no application for such or any insurance was ever signed by the defendant. Appellant urges this court to make an independent comparison of the exemplars and the disputed signature, and after such comparison make our own determination, regardless of the trial court's finding. This we decline to do. No reason appears to relax the well-established rule which precludes our inquiry into the domain of disputed fact. The insistent denial of the defendant was sufficient to support the finding of the lower court, particularly when coupled with the showing that the application contained statements contrary to the truth concerning defendant and his financial ability and his age. Further, defendant testified that the amount of premium was prohibitive. Without at all discrediting the testimony of experts, handwriting or others, we conclude for the instant case that the testimony of the expert did not conclude the inquiry, or render any finding opposed to such testimony, unsupported.

[3] Continuing the facts, on or about July 31, 1926, the agent De Patta offered to defendant a policy of life insurance covering the latter. This policy was in an amount of $25,000, and showed payment of $994.55 covering premium for one year from the date thereof, which was December 10, 1925. It will be observed that the delivery or offer on the policy was at a time almost eight months after its date. Defendant refused the proffered policy, and De Patta left it on the desk in defendant's place of business, in the absence of defendant. The same day defendant sent the policy to his attorney, and the latter, on August 19th, returned the policy to the issuing company with the statement that Slyter had never applied for any insurance, and refused to accept the policy, and that Slyter denied any liability thereunder. On September, 1926, the insurance company returned the policy to the attorney, advising him that the company would accept De Patta's statement of facts in the matter, and, that as De Patta had paid the full amount of the premium to December 10, 1926, the policy was in full force, and would not be canceled. The attorney for Slyter then retained the policy up to the date of trial, in April, 1927.

Appellant argues that this state of the record shows a ratification by defendant and acceptance of benefits under the policy to an extent which renders of no avail the attempted avoidance of liability for premium paid. He argues that defendant, after notice of policy and payment of premium by De Patta and of the further fact that the policy was continued in force, nevertheless retained the policy, and could have, in the event of death, through his beneficiaries, obtained the full benefit of the insurance. Supporting his contention, appellant cites many authorities, both local and from other jurisdictions. It appears, however, that the authorities cited, without consideration or analysis by us here, do not apply to the facts before us. It is conceded that, if an insurance agent, without the knowledge or consent of his client, obtain a policy of insurance concerning the latter, that alone gives no right to the agent to claim reimbursement for any outlay made. Therefore, the whole question here rests upon the conduct of defendant after issuance of the policy. The fact that the policy was not delivered until some eight months from issuance is a strong circumstance here. When it was finally tendered defendant he refused acceptance. The policy was then left in the office of defendant without his knowledge. He then notified the company of his nonacceptance and returned the policy. To this point he did everything possible to promptly disaffirm the policy and to refuse benefits thereunder. The company, refusing the returned policy, held the insurance to be in full force, and this closed the matter. We do not think that by his failure to act further defendant ratified the act of De Patta in securing the policy. What defendant could have done after the return of the policy is problematical. Possibly he should have returned the policy to the agent De Patta, but, in view of the fact that the premium was alleged to have been paid and the policy in effect, he had the right to conclude this to be a useless act. We decline to concede that, if the same state of facts as appears here was presented in behalf of the insurance company in resisting the claims of beneficiaries under the policy, the amount of the policy could be recovered.

[4] However, this question is not before us. We mention it only by reason of the fact that appellant seems to take for granted the right of the beneficiaries to recover should the insured have died before the end of the first year. From the facts here the trial court was justified in its conclusion that there was an attempt to force upon defendant an insurance policy against his wish and without his authority, express or implied. It is not necessary to a valid cancellation of a policy that it be physically delivered and surrendered to the insurer. Stevenson v. Sun Insurance Office, 17 Cal. App. 288, 119 P. 529. The cited case differs much from the case at bar, but holds that, where there is an actually outstanding enforceable policy, an agreement of cancellation may be effected without delivering up the policy. The effect of this holding obviously supporting the conclusion that, where no authority exists for issuing the policy and the insured upon a forced or fraudulent delivery having promptly expressed his refusal to accept, then his failure to act further upon the return of the policy to him, against his express objection, does not bind him to payment of premium. And this is particularly true here, where the policy is not offered until near the end of the term covered.

Incidentally, it may be noted that, while the record discloses evidence sufficient to sustain a finding that the agent De Patta did actually advance the premium, yet the evidence, while not characterized as inherently improbable, is very weak and unsatisfactory. In La Marche v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co., 126 Cal. 498, 58 P. 1053, plaintiff had received a policy different from the kind he had applied for, and when the company declined to return the premium plaintiff instituted suit therefor. In sustaining plaintiff's demand, the court makes no mention of the fact that the policy was or was not returned, but does say: "Plaintiff never applied for the policy which defendant assumed to issue, and, of course, his" beneficiary "could have no vested or other interest in a policy which he did not accept nor agree to accept." Here the company was not requested by defendant to issue any policy at all. In the case of Amory v. Hamilton, 17 Mass. 103, the court says: "The cases of ratification are, where the agent has gone beyond or beside his authority, for the benefit, as he supposes, of his principal, and gives him immediate notice. In such case, silence is construed acquiescence and ratification. But a delay of intelligence, until an election to approve or disapprove would be attended with no advantage to the principal, defeats the right to construe silence into ratification." This case of ancient origin (1821) is still accepted as excellent law, and cited in Joyce on Insurance (2d Ed.) § 642.

In the instant case, the policy, when delivered, had but a few months to run, and approximately two-thirds of the premium had then been earned, and the advantage to the principal was correspondingly reduced. We think that defendant was charged with no duty further than he performed. The appeal is wholly without merit.

Judgment affirmed.

OLSON v. OLSON. (Civ. 6293.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 20, 1928.

1. Divorce ⚷303(1)—Jurisdiction to award custody of minor children is continuing.

Where jurisdiction to grant a divorce and award custody of minor children of marriage once attaches, that jurisdiction is continuing one, so that power to amend, modify, or annul an order of custody for welfare of children as existing conditions may demand ever after remains.

2. Divorce ⚷303(2)—Change of circumstances arising after original divorce decree is necessary to justify modification thereof with respect to custody of minor children.

In order to justify a modification of divorce decree with respect to custody of minor children, there must be a change of circumstances arising after the original decree is entered, or at least a showing that facts were unknown to party urging them at time of prior order and could not with due diligence been ascertained.

3. Divorce ⚷312—Abuse of discretion is necessary to warrant interference by appellate court with order denying modification of decree with respect to custody of children.

In order to warrant appellate court in disturbing order of trial judge refusing to modify divorce decree with respect to custody of children, an abuse of discretion must be shown, since trial court, having the parties before it and able to act promptly and appropriately under changed conditions, has a very wide latitude of discretion.

4. Divorce ⚷298(1)—Interest of children is paramount consideration in controversy between divorced parents relative to custody.

In determining controversy relative to custody of minor children of divorced parents, the interest of children is the paramount question to be considered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Amelia Olson against Peter Olson, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint in divorce. Decree of divorce, and from a subsequent order refusing to modify the decree with reference to the care and custody of minor children, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John E. Carson and Munson T. Case, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Arvin B. Shaw, Jr., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This is an appeal from an order refusing to modify a divorce decree with reference to the care and custody of minor children. Plaintiff and defendant intermarried in the year 1900, and lived together as husband and wife until May 5, 1922. During that period plaintiff bore defendant seven sons, who at the latter date were of ages ranging from 6 to 20 years. At this time plaintiff filed her complaint for separate maintenance, alleging cruelty on the part of defendant toward herself and the children. On May 9, 1922, in pursuance of an order to show cause, Judge J. W. Summerfield ordered that defendant pay plaintiff alimony pendente lite, and the custody of the minor children were awarded to plaintiff. Defendant subsequently filed a cross-complaint in divorce charging desertion and cruelty. At the trial, with the approval of Judge Walton J. Wood, who presided, the complaint of separate maintenance and the cruelty charges of the cross-complaint were withdrawn by stipulation, and a divorce was granted to defendant upon the ground of desertion. An interlocutory decree was entered in which the custody of the children was awarded to plaintiff.

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

In August, 1924, defendant instituted proceedings to obtain a modification of this judgment. Hearings were held upon the application by Judge F. M. Jamison. Witnesses were sworn on behalf of each of the parties and evidence taken respecting their fitness to act. Defendant's application was denied. On February 3, 1925, on motion of defendant's attorney, a final decree of divorce was entered in which the provisions of the interlocutory decree, in respect to the custody of the children, were continued in force. In both decrees plaintiff was granted an allowance of $120 per month for their support. About a year after the hearing before Judge Jamison, defendant again applied for a modification of the decree respecting the children. A hearing was held thereon by Judge Hartley Shaw, at which defendant testified, and again his application was denied. Three months thereafter defendant once more obtained an order to show cause why the decree should not be modified in respect to the custody of the four youngest children. This hearing was had before Judge K. S. Mahon. In an affidavit filed by defendant in support of his motion, it was charged that Judge Wood in making his interlocutory decree acted without a careful regard touching the fitness of plaintiff to have the custody of the children, and defendant asked the court to receive evidence relative to her fitness at a time antedating the interlocutory decree. The court refused to hear evidence of facts occurring prior to the former hearings, but heard a number of witnesses produced by defendant in support of his motion. The application was again denied. It will thus be seen that the fitness of plaintiff to have the care and custody of her minor children has been passed upon by five different judges. Appellant appeals from the last order and claims that the court erred in not permitting him to introduce testimony which was or might have been introduced at the prior hearings.

[1, 2] There can be no doubt that where jurisdiction to grant a divorce and award the custody of the minor children of the marriage once attaches, that jurisdiction is, under our statute, a continuing one, so that the power to amend, modify, or annul an order of custody for the welfare of children as existing conditions may demand, ever after remains. But this does not mean the parties to such litigation may, after a court has once heard evidence upon the subject of their fitness to act and ruled upon the question, immediately again invoke the powers of the court to have it inquire into the same or other facts existing at the time of or prior to the former decree. Such holding would lay a foundation for interminable and vexatious litigation. Burns v. Shapley, 16 Ala. App. 297, 77 So. 447. The rule is stated to be that to justify a modification there must be a change of circumstances arising after the original decree is entered, or at least a showing that the facts were unknown to the party urging them at the time of the prior order, and could not with due diligence have been ascertained. 19 Cor. Jur. 350.

[3, 4] Then again, in proceedings of this character appellant must show abuse of discretion. The rule is elementary that in matters affecting custody of children the trial court has a very wide latitude of discretion. It has the parties before it, is able to act promptly and appropriately under changed conditions, and its decision cannot be altered by an appellate court unless it clearly appears that the court not merely erred, but has radically abused its discretion. Bancroft v. Bancroft, 178 Cal. 352, 173 P. 582; Black v. Black, 149 Cal. 224, 86 P. 505. In passing upon contests of this character, the interest of children is the paramount question to be considered, and these numerous and acrimonious applications add nothing to their welfare.

The order is affirmed.

SPARTER et al. v. MISSION MOTOR SERVICE, Inc., et al. (Civ. 6431.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 18, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Trial court's determination, supported by substantial evidence, is accepted by appellate court.

Determination of trial court, supported by substantial evidence, will be accepted by appellate court.

2. Brokers 🔑86(4)—Evidence held to warrant finding that brokers were procuring cause of sale of gasoline service station and entitled to commission.

In action to recover brokers' commission arising out of sale of gasoline service station and equipment, evidence held to warrant finding that plaintiffs were procuring cause of sale, and therefore entitled to commission.

3. Corporations 🔑410—President and general manager of corporation held authorized to bind corporation to sell gasoline service station.

President and general manager of corporation, authorized by resolution of board of directors to bind corporation in matter of sale of gasoline service station belonging to corporation without binding him to make sale to any particular person, held authorized to bind corporation to contract of sale.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by Louis Sparter, doing business as Sparter & Company, and another, against Mission Motor Service, Incorporated, and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Young & Hudson, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Skinner & Friedman, Monroe Friedman, and Howard H. Desky, all of Oakland, for respondents.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an action to recover broker's commission arising out of the sale of a gasoline service station and equipment. Judgment was for plaintiff against both defendants, and both defendants appeal. Two points are raised, namely:

(1) Plaintiffs and respondents were not the inducing or procuring cause of the sale so as to entitle them to receive the commission.

(2) No judgment is justified as against defendant and appellant Mission Motor Service, Inc., by reason of the fact that there was no antecedent authority to Waugh from the corporation to enter into the alleged contract.

No questions are raised as to the capacity of plaintiffs to act as brokers or the compliance by them with the laws governing. There is evidence to support the following statement of facts:

Defendant Mission Motor Service, in January, 1927, was the owner of the service station in question, and defendant Waugh was the president of said corporation and its general manager and acting as such in the management and conduct of the station.

As stated, plaintiffs are licensed brokers operating in Alameda county. In January, 1927, Waugh called at the office of plaintiffs and stated that the service station was for sale and asked one of those connected with the office to send Mr. Sheets, one of the plaintiffs, to the station for further discussion. At this first conversation defendant Waugh promised to pay a commission on the sale. Sheets subsequently, a few days later, called upon Waugh at the service station, and the matter of the sale was again taken up. Waugh at this time told Sheets that if he brought somebody out to purchase the station and a sale was made he would pay $1,000 commission irrespective of the price obtained. Some time during February, 1927, Sheets had another conversation with Waugh concerning the service station, during which Waugh confirmed his former offer and told Sheets to get him an offer, saying he would consider $18,000. Subsequent to the conversation in February, Sheets had several conversations with Waugh. All that was required under the offer was to secure a purchaser for the service station.

In April, 1927, Sheets took Stanley and Gallinatti to see the station. The last-named persons were introduced to Waugh by Sheets, and a general discussion was had on the subject of the station, its name, lease, rental, etc. Stanley and Gallinatti told Waugh they would get in touch with him later. The price named at that time by Waugh was $22,000. After then Sheets had several conversations with Stanley and Gallinatti concerning the service station, though not on the premises of the station. Many conversations were had thereafter between Sheets and Waugh, the latter constantly urging diligence on the part of Sheets and assuring him of his commission. In May, 1927, the station was sold to Stanley and Gallinatti for $15,000, and notice of the sale given. While notice was being given and the escrow yet unclosed, plaintiffs called upon defendant Waugh regarding the payment of their claimed commission and asking if they should take it up with the purchasers. Waugh stated to them at that time, and on other occasions pending the closing of the escrow, that he knew they were entitled to the commission and that he would pay it as soon as the deal was closed. However, he refused to pay any commission; hence the action. The trial court found that the services were rendered as alleged and a commission of $1,000 earned under the contract, and awarded plaintiffs judgment accordingly.

[1] It is perhaps needless to add that the evidence offered by defendant contradicted the foregoing statement in many of its essentials. It is more needless to point out the conflict. Bound by the rule which requires no citation, the determination of the trial court, where substantial evidence supports it, is accepted by us.

[2] From these facts we determine that the first ground of the appeal is without merit. Bail v. Glantz, 78 Cal. App. 49, 248 P. 258; Sessions v. Pacific Improvement Co., 57 Cal. App. 1, 206 P. 653; Roth v. Thomson, 40 Cal. App. 208, 180 P. 656; Contant v. Wallace, 62 Cal. App. 768, 217 P. 1081; Hill v. McCoy, 1 Cal. App. 159, 81 P. 1015; 9 Corp. Jur. 613, § 96; Twogood v. Monnette, 191 Cal. 103, 215 P. 542; Boland v. Ashurst Oil Land Co., 145 Cal. 405, 78 P. 871.

[3] This brings us to an inquiry concerning the power of Waugh to bind the corporation. Waugh was the president of the corporation and its general manager and the owner of 25 per cent. of the stock. There was a resolution passed by the board of directors authorizing him to bind the corporation in the matter of the sale of the premises. The resolution did not bind him to a sale to any particular person. Further, there was a resolution authorizing him to proceed with the sale of the station. Waugh talked frequently during the months of January, February, March, April, and May of 1927 with the directors, and they discussed all matters, and he told the others of his plans, and they told him to go ahead. They told him to go ahead and sell the place for any price he liked—any reasonable price. The board of directors passed a resolution authorizing the sale as made to Stanley and Gallinatti and accepted the offer of the buyers and authorized Waugh to execute the necessary instruments of conveyance.

From these facts the authority of President Waugh is manifest. Cases cited therein: Sessions v. Pacific Imp. Co., 57 Cal. App. 1, 24, 206 P. 653; Burns v. Valley Bank (Cal. App.) 271 P. 107, and cases cited therein; Hoffman v. Guy M. Rush Co., 27 Cal. App. 167, 149 P. 177; Pettibone v. Lake View Co., 134 Cal. 227, 66 P. 218.

Appellant presents no authorities in the place of the appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

CRESCENT BED CO. v. JONAS.

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 27, 1928.

1. Bailment 🔑31(3)—Evidence supported finding that bed springs had been damaged by bailee's negligence and carelessness.

Evidence held to support finding that bed springs, which were delivered to defendant on consignment, creating relation of bailor and bailee between defendant and plaintiff, had been damaged by reason of defendant's negligence and carelessness.

2. Bailment 🔑14(1)—Bailee, to whom bed springs were delivered on consignment, must exercise reasonable care in protecting springs from damage (Civ. Code, § 3300).

Bailee, to whom bed springs were consigned, was required to use reasonable care in protecting the springs while in his possession or be liable in measure of damages specified in Civ. Code, § 3300.

3. Bailment 🔑32—Damages from bailee's failure to properly care for bed springs would be difference between reasonable value of springs in good condition and condition when they were removed from bailee's premises (Civ. Code, § 3300).

Damages arising from bailee's negligence in failure to use reasonable care to protect bed springs consigned to him would, under Civ. Code, § 3300, be the difference between the reasonable market value of the springs in good condition and that in which they were at the time they were removed from defendant's premises.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Williams, Judge pro tem.

Action by the Crescent Bed Company against J. H. Jonas, doing business under the fictitious firm name and style of J. H. Jonas & Son. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. F. Gerecht and I. B. Benjamin, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Derthick & Hull, Theodore T. Hull, and William J. Cusack, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. The complaint in this action is in two counts. In the first the plaintiff sought to recover the balance due upon an open book account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold by plaintiff to defendant in an amount of $1,427.78; the second count was for damages sustained by plaintiff by reason of the negligent care given by the defendant to a consignment of wire bed springs, shipped by the plaintiff to defendant, and kept by the latter at his place of business. The amount of damages claimed under the second count was the sum of $2,490.54. The court gave judgment in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $1,373.57 under the first count, and the full amount sued for under the second count. The defendant has appealed.

The objection made by defendant to the judgment under the first count is that the cause of action stated therein is based upon an open book account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, but that at the trial the plaintiff failed to produce or offer in evidence any books of account showing said indebtedness. There was no dispute at the trial but that the appellant had purchased said goods, wares, and merchandise at the price stated in the complaint. The only controversy between the parties as to the amount claimed to be due respondent under the first cause of action arose over certain offsets, which the appellant claimed he was entitled to, and which he was not credited with in the account. Eight of these items, which appellant claimed as offsets to the respondent's account, amounting to $1,373.57, the court disallowed, and gave judgment for respondent under the first cause of action for said sum of $1,373.57, the precise amount of these eight items claimed by appellant as offsets. No question was raised during the trial that plaintiff had failed to produce its books of account, and there was ample evidence before the trial court to the effect that the account sued on was an open book account. This evidence was received without objection by the defendant, and was sufficient to prove the open book account upon which the cause of action set forth in the first count was based.

[1] As to the judgment rendered upon the second cause of action, defendant claims that there was no evidence to justify the findings upon which the judgment rests. It was claimed by plaintiff that defendant had stored a consignment of wire bed springs on a platform in defendant's yard and allowed them to remain there for a long period of time without any covering or protection against the weather, with the result that the springs became covered with rust, and were accordingly greatly damaged. Defendant admitted that he had stored the springs upon said platform, and that they were left in the open air without any covering against the weather. While there was some evidence that the springs, at the time they were delivered to the defendant, were in a damaged and rusty condition, there was a large amount of evidence contrary thereto. A number of witnesses testified that the springs were in good condition and free from rust at the time they were delivered to defendant. There was no question but that at the time the springs were removed from defendant's place of business they were in a damaged condition by reason of their being covered with rust at that time. This evidence was sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that the bed springs had been damaged by reason of the negligence and carelessness of the defendant.

[2, 3] Defendant also objects to the manner in which the trial court arrived at the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of defendant's negligence in caring for said springs. A portion of said springs, after their removal from defendant's place of business, on account of their then damaged condition, was sold at 50 cents on the dollar, and the balance at 44 cents on the dollar. The court found what the reasonable market value of the springs would have been had they not been damaged, and deducted from this amount the amount for which the springs were sold, and gave plaintiff judgment for the difference in these two amounts. It was further found that the amount for which they had been sold was their reasonable market value in their damaged condition at the time the springs were removed from defendant's premises. We find no objection, legal or otherwise, to the computing of plaintiff's damage by this method. The springs were delivered to defendant on consignment, and, as claimed by him, the relation of bailor and bailee existed between him and the plaintiff in reference to them. He was therefore required to use reasonable care in protecting the springs from damage while in his possession. For the breach of this obligation he would be liable in damages in an amount which would compensate the plaintiff for the detriment proximately caused by the defendant's failure to perform this obligation. Civ. Code, § 3300. This amount would be the difference between the reasonable market value of the springs in good condition and that in which they were at the time they were removed from defendant's premises. This method, as we have already noted, was the method adopted by the court in fixing the amount of damages sustained by plaintiff. In this connection the defendant contends that there was no evidence as to the market value of springs in good condition at the time said springs were removed from defendant's place of business, nor was there any evidence as to the market value of the springs in their damaged condition. There is no merit in either of these suggestions. There was positive evidence of the reasonable market value of the springs in their damaged condition, and there was also evidence, equally satisfactory as to the value of springs, free from rust or other damage, at the time in question.

The judgment is affirmed.

GODBER v. CITY OF PASADENA et al. (SWAN, Intervener). (L. A. 9505.) ★

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 27, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank Jan. 24, 1929.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑514(3)—Under statutes, city council may set aside assessment and make reassessment (St. 1913, p. 434, § 26a; St. 1903, p. 381, § 19).

St. 1913, p. 434, § 26a, providing that city council may set aside assessment and order new assessment, being in pari materia with St. 1903, p. 381, § 19, providing that action of council upon assessment shall be final and conclusive, city council may reassess property where proper conditions exist.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑63(1)—Every intendment must be indulged in favor of city's action in reassessing property, and all doubts resolved in favor of validity (St. 1913, p. 434, § 26a; St. 1903, p. 381, § 19).

Every intendment must be indulged that can be in favor of action of city directors in reassessing property, and all doubts resolved in favor of validity of action so taken under St. 1913, p. 434, § 26a, and St. 1903, p. 381, § 19.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑63(1)—Court will not declare reassessment void unless face of record or facts judicially known show city's action was incorrect (St. 1913, p. 434, § 26a; St. 1903, p. 381, § 19).

Court will not declare reassessment by city under St. 1913, p. 434, § 26a, and St. 1903, p. 381, § 19, to be void, unless it can plainly see from face of record or from facts of which court may take judicial notice that action taken by municipality was not correct.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑538—Burden was on taxpayer to show invalidity of reassessment by city (St. 1913, p. 434, § 26a; St. 1903, p. 381, § 19).

In action to enjoin enforcement of assessment for street work, burden to show invalidity of city's action in making reassessment under St. 1913, p. 434, and St. 1903, p. 381, § 19, was on taxpayer.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action to enjoin the enforcement of an assessment for street work by Harry H. Godber against the City of Pasadena and another, in which Frances B. Swan intervened. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied in bank: SHENK, J., voting for a hearing.

William J. Carr, of San Francisco, and Roy A. Linn, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. C. McAllaster, of Los Angeles, for respondent City of Los Angeles.

Wood, Janeway & Pratt and John Perry Wood, all of Los Angeles, for respondent intervener.

James H. Howard and Roscoe R. Hess, both of Pasadena, for other respondents.

PRESTON, J. This appeal questions the validity of a reassessment made by the city of Pasadena under a street proceeding authorized by the 1903 Street Opening Act (Stats. 1903, p. 376, amended; Stats. 1913, p. 429). The regularity of the proceeding in every respect other than as to the power of the city to order this reassessment is conceded. The facts are undisputed, but the parties draw opposite deductions therefrom. The same principles of law are likewise relied upon by all parties, but they differ as to their applicability or their application.

In 1923 the said city set about to open, extend, and widen Oakland avenue, a territory through a level area in about the center of the business district. After the construction of the new street, boundaries of the area benefited were established and a district organized, and on April 28, 1925, the directors of the city confirmed the assessment upon the property of the district made presumably consonant with the degree of benefit bestowed by the new improvement. Plaintiff owned two parcels of land in this district, known on the assessment roll as lots Nos. 84 and 85. He paid the assessments of $239.72 and $930.49, respectively. Thereafter, and on the 2d day of June, 1925, the city, purporting to act under section 26a of said above-mentioned statute, as amended, passed a resolution declaring the assessment of April 28, 1925, invalid because unreasonable and not levied in proportion to the benefits derived. The assessment was then set aside, and a reassessment was ordered pursuant to said section. Thereafter said reassessment was confirmed by said city and recorded on August 15, 1925. Under it $3,000 was added to said lot No. 84 and $4,000 to lot No. 85, a total increase of $7,000.

Plaintiff thereupon sought by the complaint herein an injunction against the enforcement of said second assessment alleged to be invalid solely by reason of the pre-existing assessment. There was no allegation of an entire lack of benefit, nor was there any allegation that the second assessment was in any way disproportionate, unfair, or arbitrary, nor was there any allegation that said first assessment was itself just and fair. In other words, the complaint rests plaintiff's cause solely upon the existence of said two assessments and the contention that the first assessment alone can be the valid one. The city answered, but did not enlarge the issue, nor did the intervener, a property owner in the district, who was allowed to become a party to the proceeding. The trial was short. The case was submitted on a stipulation of facts which carried the issues no further than as made by the pleadings. No evidence was offered by either side to show that either assessment was or was not disproportionate to the benefits conferred. The evidence, therefore, sheds no additional light upon the subject.

The court made findings to the effect that the first assessment was void because not levied in proportion to the benefits derived and that the new assessment was proper and valid because so levied and gave its judgment for the defendants. Plaintiff has appealed.

The effect of the judgment is that on the record as made the city acted within its powers in declaring the first assessment void and causing to be made the reassessment in question. We can see no escape from the conclusion that the judgment of the court below was proper and correct.

[1] Section 26a (Stats. 1913, p. 434) provides that the city council may "at the request of any interested party, or on its own motion * * * set aside any assessment or assessments * * * and order a new assessment or assessments * * * if in its opinion the assessment be invalid." Appellant's position seems to be that, inasmuch as section 19 (Stats. 1903, p. 381) of said act provides that "* * * the action of the council upon such objections and assessment shall be final and conclusive in the premises, * * *" the first assessment may not be disturbed under any circumstances by the city, but this conclusion entirely ignores said section 26a which was added by way of amendment to the act and is a provision in pari materia, and, as so construed, situations may exist where a reassessment is proper. How are we to say this is not a proper one? Said section 26a also contains language as follows: "[The approval and confirmation of the reassessment by the city council] * * * shall be a final determination of all matters relating to the actual benefits derived or to be derived from the improvement by the respective lots, pieces and parcels of land enumerated in the reassessment. * * *"

[2, 3] Appellant seems to overlook the fact that the court may take only a restricted view of the action of the city directors. We are required to look, therefore, upon the last action of the board with the same complacency that we would have looked upon the first assessment had there been no attempt to rescind it. The rules of law which guide the court in a proceeding of this character are well settled and are relied upon by both parties. The controlling principle, in a word, is that every intendment must be indulged that can be in favor of the final action of the city directors and all doubts resolved in favor of the validity of the action so taken. The court will not hear the opinions of witnesses and other evidence in any subsequent issue involving the assessment in order to determine whether or not it can plainly see that the action taken by the municipality was or was not correct, but the court can only view such facts as appear on the record of the proceedings taken in the light of those further facts of which we may take judicial notice. Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 686, 692, 76 P. 661; Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 404, 429, 14 P. 71.

This principle has also been stated in Larsen v. San Francisco, 182 Cal. 1, 15, 186 P. 757, 763, as follows: "In such a case the court will not declare the assessment void unless it can plainly see from the face of the record, or from facts judicially known, that the assessment so finally confirmed is not proportional to the benefits, or that no benefits could accrue to the property assessed. (Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 692, 76 P. 661; Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 429, 14 P. 71.)" See, also, Cutting v. Vaughn, 182 Cal. 151, 156, 187 P. 19, and Rutledge v. Eureka, 195 Cal. 404, 234 P. 82.

[4] If we must look at an assessment in this light, we must also look at a reassessment in the same light. Looking at the record before us, we see nothing to indicate invalidity in the action taken by the city. The burden in this respect rested upon appellant. The only thing that does appear is that it is manifest that either one or the other of the two assessments was invalid, but appellant made no claim that his property was not benefited, nor did he make any claim that the assessments were disproportionate to the benefits received. Consequently, if we make any deduction from the record, it must be in favor of the last action of the legislative body.

We can therefore find no merit in the appeal, and the judgment is affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., and Tracy Chatfield Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

PER CURIAM. In this case a hearing was granted after decision by the District Court of Appeal because of the earnest insistence of the Attorney General that the statute defining burglary in this state had been misconstrued. After a careful consideration of the authorities relied upon by petitioner, we are satisfied with the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, Second District, heretofore filed herein and written by the Honorable Justice Craig, and we adopt said opinion as the opinion of this court, as follows:

The appellant, Venice Gibbons, and two codefendants, Tippen and Simpson, were charged jointly by an information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county with burglary, with receiving stolen propey, and conspiracy to commit a felony. During the trial counts 2 and 3, charging receiving stolen goods and conspiracy to commit a felony, respectively, were dismissed. Appellant was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and from the judgment pronounced by the court thereon he appeals.

[1, 2] It is first contended that the verdict is contrary to the evidence because, it is said, the structure from which the evidence tended to show the stolen property to have been taken was not of such a nature as to permit of the crime of burglary being committed therein. In this regard the record discloses that certain aluminum was taken from a bin having three sides and a roof. However, the roof consisted of the floor of a building called by the witnesses a "bag house," which it was testified was completely inclosed. The side of the bin which was open faced on a yard which was entirely fenced, but there was no roof over the yard. In response to questions by the trial court, the witness Snyder, an officer of the corporation owning the premises from which the aluminum was taken, stated that the bin is not a cellar or basement; that it is on a level with the lot; that over this bin is "a bag house for the reception of all smokes"; that the floor of the bag house is up from the ground some six or eight feet, and forms the roof of the bin, "and it is walled in except one side."

It is true, as stated in People v. Coffee, 52 Cal. App. 118, 198 P. 213, that in this state the statutory definition of burglary is much more comprehensive than the definition of the same offense at common law. In that case a chicken house was held to be a structure which might be burglarized. The same was the ruling in People v. Stickman, 3 Cal. 242, and in People v. Franco, 79 Cal. App. 682, 250 P. 698, a showcase was broken open. It was held that the taking of shoes therefrom was burglary, because, it was pointed out, the showcase was a part of, and was under the roof of, the store building to which it was attached, and the court concluded that such a showcase was a "house" within the meaning of section 459 of our Penal Code.

However, in each of these cases, and others cited in People v. Franco, supra, the structure had four sides and a roof. The showcase was completely inclosed, and so were the chicken houses. We are cited to no case, and know of none, where the element of the definition of burglary which requires a breaking into some kind of structure has been held to be nonessential. The common law, of course, required that the building be a human habitation. This is not necessary under our statutes, but as said in People v. Coffee, supra, the structure need only be one having four sides and a roof. The bin in question being open on one side does not measure up to that definition. This case may be another example of a guilty man escaping punishment because the prosecuting officer has persisted in pressing a charge which is not justified under the evidence when apparently there was ample evidence to sustain a verdict of guilty of grand theft. It is the duty of this court, of course, to apply the law to the record before us, and since the testimony is uncontradicted in establishing the facts as above related, the defendant's contention is fully sustained.

It is not necessary to pass upon other points presented by the appellant.

The judgment is reversed.

SHENK, J. I dissent. I find myself unable to agree with the conclusions reached by a majority of the court to the effect that the offense proved was not burglary. The information charged the defendant with unlawfully entering "the outhouse and building" with the intent to commit larceny therein. The proof showed conclusively to my mind that the portion of the structure which was entered was an integral part of a building having four sides and a roof and satisfied the definition of numerous structures named in section 459 of the Penal Code. That section provides: "Every person who enters any house, room, apartment, tenement, shop, warehouse, store, mill, barn, stable, outhouse or other building, tent, vessel, railroad car, mine or any underground portion thereof, with intent to commit grand or petit larceny or any felony is guilty of burglary." The fact that the portion of the building entered was for convenience left open on the one side facing the private service yard would not, in my opinion, remove the structure from the definition of a "building" as contemplated by the code section. The structure described in the evidence is no more open than was the stairway leading to the store involved in People v. Franco, 79 Cal. App. 682, 250 P. 698. In that case the roof of the building covered the showcases from which the shoes were taken. Access to the showcases was by means of the open stairway. It was held, not that a showcase was a "house" as stated by the majority opinion, but that the said showcases were, in legal effect, part of the store proper. So, here, the storeroom for the metals beneath the main building was part and parcel of the building itself. Our present statutory crime of burglary is much more comprehensive than the offense of that name at common law. Breaking is not now an essential element of the crime. Entry only is required to be alleged and proved. The main opinion has, I think, placed a too narrow construction on those words as used in the statute, and has unduly limited the effect of the law relating to the crime of burglary.

COLLINS v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 13035.)★

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 15, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 14, 1929.

1. Master and servant 🔑414—Whether hazard of heat stroke, which painter working on roof suffered, was incidental to ordinary outdoor work, held question of fact for Industrial Commission.

Whether hazard to which painter working on roof and suffering heat stroke was that incidental to ordinary outdoor work, or whether it was one which was inseparably connected with and substantially increased by employment, held question of fact for Industrial Accident Commission.

2. Master and servant 🔑405(4)—Evidence sustained Industrial Commission's finding that painter suffering heat stroke was not subjected to exposure greater than that experienced by other people; "arise out of employment."

Evidence sustained finding of Industrial Accident Commission that painter working on roof and suffering heat stroke had failed to establish that he had been subjected to exposure greater than that experienced by the commonalty in that vicinity, and hence that danger of heat stroke did not constitute a hazard incident to his particular employment, which injury did not therefore "arise out of employment."

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Tom Collins, employé, opposed by Brown & McGrew, employer, and a Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company, insurer. G. C. Faulkner and R. P. Wisecarver, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This matter comes before us upon a petition for a writ to review a judgment of the Industrial Accident Commission, denying compensation to the petitioner. The facts of the case appear from the findings of said Commission, as follows:

Tom Collins was employed as a painter on the 2d day of July, 1926, at Sacramento, Cal., by defendants Brown & McGrew. The other defendant is the insurance carrier. Collins, during the course of his employment, suffered a heat stroke or heat exhaustion by reason of exposure to the heat and rays of the sun, resulting in intracranial damage of considerable severity. The Industrial Accident Commission found that the employé had failed to establish that he had been subjected to exposure greater than that experienced by the commonalty in that vicinity, and that therefore the danger of sunstroke, heat prostration, or heat exhaustion did not constitute a hazard incident to that particular employment, and therefore did not arise out of said employment.

The record discloses that the employé, a painter, started to work on a roof in the city of Sacramento, Cal., at about 8 o'clock a. m., using a roofing paint consisting of graphite, linseed oil, and some turpentine. Very noticeable symptoms of some disorder began to appear about 10 o'clock when the temperature was only 72 degrees, according to the United States Weather Bureau report introduced in evidence. This report shows temperatures as follows in Sacramento on the day in question: 63 degrees at 8 a. m., 67 degrees at 9 a. m., 72 degrees at 10 a. m., 77 degrees at 11 a. m., and 81 degrees at 12 noon. The humidity at noon was 42, at which time the employé collapsed after descending a ladder to the ground. He was taken to a hospital, where he became violent and irrational and continued so for some time. There is considerable question, from the evidence, as to whether employé's condition was caused from sunstroke or whether it was due to other causes, but the Commission has found this issue in favor of said employé.

The Commission took the position that the burden was upon the employé to establish that the temperature on the roof where employé was working was greater than the temperature on the street, and suggested to the representative of the employé that a test be made and the results submitted. This was not done, however, and there is no evidence appearing in the record from which it could be concluded that there was a higher temperature on the roof than the temperature in the city generally. On the other hand, the Commission takes the position that as the roof was a dark shingle roof, the radiation of heat would be less than from a light colored sidewalk; that employé was at a height where he would get any breeze there was; and that he was in as favorable a position, if not a more favorable one, than persons, generally, in the city.

[1, 2] The record merely presents a question of fact, which the Commission has properly decided against the employé in the absence of evidence, because upon him rested the burden of proof. There is no evidence in the record showing any special hazard of the employment with reference to heat prostration. Under such circumstances, the rule announced in volume 27, Cal. Jur. § 79, is applicable, as follows: "As a general rule injuries suffered from so-called 'acts of God,' such as sunstroke, freezing, lightning, wind, etc., are not compensable inasmuch as the casualties are risks taken by the entire community and ordinarily do not arise out of or happen in the course of the employment. But without doubt there may be conditions under which the employee performs his work which expose him peculiarly to the elements in a manner not common to the community in general. Thus disability by sunstroke is compensable when suffered by a workman employed in a superheated warehouse upon the roof of which the sun beats with great force so that he is, because of his employment, subjected especially to the danger of sunstroke. And when an employee, without acclimatization, is placed at work in a locality in which the heat is intolerable to one not acclimated, the special exposure is in excess of the risk of the commonalty, and death from sunstroke is compensable. Of course, in such cases the evidence should show the special exposure and that the injury and disability were caused thereby."

The rule is also announced in the recent case of London Guarantee & Accident Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com. (Cal. Sup.) 259 P. 1096: "The responsibility of an employer for an injury sustained by his employee resulting from an earthquake or other like peril has frequently been the subject of judicial determination, and the rule applied by the courts almost universally is as follows: 'As a general principle, the employer is not responsible for damages caused to his workmen by lightning, storms, sunstroke, freezing, earthquake, floods, etc. These are considered as "force majeure," which human vigilance and industry can neither foresee nor prevent. The victim must bear alone such burden, inasmuch as human industry has nothing to do with it and inasmuch as the employee is no more subject thereto than any other person. Every human being is liable to suffer from events in which he has no share of responsibility.'"

The question whether the hazard was that incidental to ordinary out of door work, or whether it was one which was inseparably connected with and substantially increased by the employment, was primarily a question of fact to be found by the Commission. The employé in this case has introduced no evidence justifying a finding other than the one made.

The judgment of the Industrial Accident Commission is affirmed.

Schweitzer & Hutton and H. F. Clary, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Geo. L. Sanders, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] This appeal is from an order of the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles, by the terms of which a receivership applied for and granted ex parte to the defendant was set aside and annulled upon the application of the plaintiffs, made promptly upon being advised of the making and entry thereof. The plaintiffs, as appears from the record, made two such applications, the first of which was, apparently for some defect in the form or sufficiency of the moving papers or of the notice given thereof, denied "without prejudice." The plaintiffs promptly renewed their motion, and upon a hearing thereon the trial court granted the same, and in so doing ordered, adjudged, and decreed that its former order for the appointment of a receiver be annulled, revoked, set aside, and canceled, and that the receiver appointed thereby and qualified thereunder surrender and deliver over to the plaintiffs all properties of every kind, nature, and description coming into his possession under and by virtue of said order appointing him such receiver. The appellant appeals from the order thus setting aside such receivership, and makes two points upon this appeal. The first is that the prior orders of the trial court appointing such receiver and thereafter, upon the plaintiffs' first motion, refusing to set aside its ex parte order made in that behalf, rendered the matter of the regularity of the appointment of such receiver res adjudicata. There is no merit in this contention. An order made ex parte appointing a receiver may be set aside by the trial court making the same, upon seasonable application of the parties injuriously affected by said order and who had been given no opportunity to resist the same upon the application for and the granting of such ex parte order. The action of the trial court in the instant case in refusing to set aside such order upon the plaintiffs' first application therefor was "without prejudice" to a renewal of such application, and, such renewal of the application having been seasonably made, neither the original order nor the order refusing to vacate the same without prejudice could be res adjudicata as to the rights of the plaintiffs upon proper application and notice to have vacated a receivership thus obtained. There is no merit, therefore, in appellant's first contention.

[3] Its second contention is also devoid of merit. It appears that the order vacating the receivership, from which this appeal has been taken, was made by a judge of the said superior court other than the judge who originally granted the receivership, and the appellant contends that the order of the judge in setting aside such receivership was invalid, for the reason that in making the same he was exercising appellate jurisdiction over the order of the judge who granted the receivership. This contention is without merit. The superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles is a single court, and the judges of the various departments thereof, in making or in vacating orders therein, are acting in the same capacity as though said court had but one judge, exercising all of its jurisdiction, and in so doing vacating whatever orders he might have theretofore inconsiderately made.

We therefore conclude that, upon the face of the record as presented by the appellant's brief alone, this appeal is without merit, and that the order assailed thereby should be, and the same is hereby, affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by William H. Moore, as trustee in bankruptcy in the matter of the bankruptcy of Edith F. Neighbours, against Edith F. Neighbours and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Goodspeed & Pendell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Burrel D. Neighbours and F. A. Jeffers, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. An order was made and entered on September 14, 1923, in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California, Southern Division, adjudging the respondent Edith F. Neighbours a bankrupt. The scheduled liabilities amounted to $2,314.10, though it appears that but one claim, consisting of a judgment amounting to $1,764.10, was filed, approved, and allowed. There being no assets scheduled in said proceeding, appellant as trustee in bankruptcy commenced an action in the superior court of Los Angeles county, alleging that the respondents herein were husband and wife; that they owned community property of a value of about $10,000; that the defendant Edith F. Neighbours' bankruptcy estate had no assets other than her interest in said community property; and that "it is necessary, therefore, to resort to the interest of said Edith F. Neighbours in the community property of said Edith F. Neighbours and her said husband with which to pay said claim." It was further alleged that said community property was in part acquired by the defendants between August 17, 1923, and September 14, 1923; that it is all in the custody and control of Burrel D. Neighbours. Upon information and belief it was alleged, also, that all of the proceedings in bankruptcy were taken and had by and on behalf of Edith F. Neighbours with "full and complete knowledge, consent and approval of her said husband, Burrel D. Neighbours, and with his help and financial assistance, pursuant to a common understanding and agreement between said defendants," and that they are estopped to claim or assert that said Edith F. Neighbours does not have any interest in said community property, and that the same is not subject to administration in the bankruptcy proceeding. The plaintiff prayed that the defendants be required to account as to the community property; that its value be decreed, and that the same be divided and one-half be delivered to the plaintiff up to the amount of the alleged judgment; that it be adjudged that one-half of the community property is owned by Edith F. Neighbours, and that the same is an asset of her bankruptcy estate, and that it be subjected to the payment of said claim. The defendants demurred to the complaint, and to each count thereof, upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained, judgment went for the defendants, and the plaintiff appealed.

It was contended below, and is insisted here, that the plaintiff and appellant cannot compel an accounting and division of the community property, for the reason that the husband is invested with the entire title, possession, and control during the life of both spouses, and that the wife has no more than an expectancy. Appellant concedes that prior to 1923 the provisions of the Civil Code were held to vest in the wife a mere expectancy, but contends that, since the amendments of the year last mentioned, the law is otherwise, and that the wife has a present, vested interest. The sections relied upon by appellant are 161a (added by St. 1927, p. 484), 682, 700, 1045, 1401, and 1402, of the Civil Code. It is at once observed, however, that the two latter sections are contained in title 7, div. 2, pt. 4, of the Civil Code, relating to succession, when one of the spouses is presumed to be dead. Section 1045 provides that a mere possibility, not coupled with an interest, cannot be transferred. Section 700 deals with a mere possibility such as the expectancy of an heir apparent, which is not an interest. Section 682 defines ownership by several persons, one of which is the "community interest of husband and wife." Section 161a of the Civil Code was enacted nearly three years after the commencement of this action, and yet, since it became effective, our Supreme Court, in Stewart v. Stewart (Cal. Sup.) 269 P. 439, referring to a previous appeal of the same case, said:

"In that opinion we held that the long-established doctrine of this state was, as reiterated and confirmed by this court in Spreckels v. Spreckels, 172 Cal. 775, 158 P. 537, that the husband was during marriage 'the sole and exclusive owner of all of the community property, and that the wife had no title thereto, nor interest or estate therein, other than a mere expectancy as heir, if she survived him.' We further pointed out, what was declared in more recent decisions of this court, that legislation enacted subsequent to the rendition of said last-mentioned decision had not in any manner changed or modified said doctrine as to the wife's right in community property acquired in, or prior to, the year 1918, the year the parties hereto purchased the real property described in the complaint herein. We saw no escape from that conclusion at the time of the rendition of that opinion, and nothing has since been brought to our attention to cause us to doubt the correctness of our views as thus expressed. The opinion as then rendered must now stand as a correct embodiment of the views of this court upon the questions therein considered and determined."

Hence it was further held that "the interest of the wife during marriage in the community property is a mere expectancy, to be realized only upon her surviving her husband, or upon the earlier dissolution of the marriage by divorce proceedings." Further discussion of this question is therefore not here necessary.

From what has been said upon the principal argument advanced for reversal, other points attempted to be made by appellant at once become untenable.

The judgment is affirmed.

95 Cal. App. 476

HEFFNER v. JACKSON. (Civ. 5034.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 13, 1928.

1. Automobiles 🔑19—Conditional sales contract and stipulation that it had passed to plaintiff by assignment warranted recovery in claim and delivery, notwithstanding noncompliance with vehicle act.

In claim and delivery, conditional sales contract covering automobile, and stipulation that, by assignment by vendor, contract had passed to plaintiff, established a cause of action in plaintiff's favor, even though there had been no assignment or transfer of certificate of registration under California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517, as amended).

2. Sales 🔑452—Attachment against conditional purchaser could not be levied on property sold conditionally prior to statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 689a).

As Code Civ. Proc. § 689a, enacted in May, 1921, specifically provides that it relates only to contracts subsequently entered into, conditional vendor under contract made prior to enactment of the statute did not have a mere lien, but retained title, and attachment against purchaser could not be levied on the property.

3. Bankruptcy 🔑20(1)—Pendency of bankruptcy proceedings does not affect jurisdiction of state court when it could determine rights of parties without interfering with jurisdiction of federal court.

When state court assumes jurisdiction in a case in which it can completely determine the rights of the parties without interfering with the federal court's jurisdiction, pendency of bankruptcy proceedings does not affect jurisdiction of the state court.

4. Bankruptcy 🔑156—It was duty of trustee to intervene in claim and delivery action if he desired to defend on behalf of estate.

In claim and delivery action by assignor of vendor's interest under conditional sale contract against sheriff taking property under attachment against conditional purchaser, purchaser's trustee in bankruptcy should have intervened if he desired to defend on behalf of the bankrupt estate.

5. Bankruptcy 🔑299—Trustee's presence was not necessary to complete determination of claim and delivery action when no judgment was sought against him.

In claim and delivery action by assignee of conditional sales contract against sheriff taking property under attachment against purchaser, no personal judgment being sought against purchaser's trustee in bankruptcy, his presence was not necessary to complete determination.

6. Appearance 🔑12—Claimant of property appearing only to ask that order to show cause be dismissed as to her held not estopped.

Where assignee of conditional sales contract appeared on bankruptcy court's order to show cause why property should not be decreed to be that of purchaser's bankrupt estate, only to ask that the order be dismissed on ground that she had judgment in claim and delivery for recovery of property or its value, she was not estopped by her appearance, though judgment referred to was subsequently set aside.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by M. C. Heffner against C. E. Jackson in claim and delivery for an automoble. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Phil S. Gibson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

V. F. Bennett, of San Diego, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. An action in claim and delivery was commenced by plaintiff against the defendant, as sheriff of Orange county, for the recovery of an automobile. Judgment went for the defendant, and the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal from that judgment.

The following facts were stipulated to at the opening of the trial: L. J. Heffner purchased a Chevrolet automobile from the Taggart Motor Company on January 8, 1921, on a conditional sales contract, the monthly payments of which were $94.81. The contract was assigned to the Merchants' Finance Company by the Taggart Motor Company. On December 6, 1921, the contract was assigned by the Merchants' Finance Company to the plaintiff and appellant, who paid the Finance Company therefor an amount equal to the two payments which were to become due on December 8, 1921, and January 8, 1922, respectively. The plaintiff then offered in evidence the contract, which contained the following clause: "* * * in the event that the party of the second part shall become financially involved, or insolvent, all payments herein provided for shall be due and payable at once, or the party of the first part may immediately take possession of said property whenever and wherever found with or without process of law," etc.—and also containing the usual stipulation in contracts of this character that title shall remain in the seller until all of the payments are made. An objection was interposed by respondent to this contract. On November 30, 1921, an attachment was issued in an action by one F. L. Hinckley, as assignee of the Spreckles "Savage" Tire Company, against L. J. Heffner, by virtue of which writ the respondent attached and took into his possession the automobile in question. On December 9, 1921, the appellant served upon respondent a third party claim. On December 20, 1921, L. J. Heffner filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy and was shortly thereafter adjudged a bankrupt. On January 27, 1922, the automobile was delivered by the respondent to the trustee in bankruptcy without order therefor. In the meantime and on December 15, 1921, this action was commenced. Judgment on the pleadings in favor of plaintiff was entered on April 24, 1922, for the return of the car or for its value, which judgment was subsequently set aside by the trial court on its own motion.

While this judgment was outstanding and on April 27, 1922, the trustee in bankruptcy secured an order from the referee in bankruptcy directed to the appellant, the respondent, F. L. Hinckley, and the Spreckles "Savage" Tire Company, commanding them to appear and show cause why the automobile should not be decreed to be property of the bankrupt estate. The appellant here made a motion to dismiss the proceedings before the referee as to her, on the ground that her rights had been determined by the judgment of the state court just mentioned. The referee made an order dismissing as to the appellant and adjudging that the respondent, Spreckles "Savage" Tire Company, and F. L. Hinckley, did not have nor did any of them have any right or title to the automobile, but that L. J. Heffner was the owner and entitled to possession. The respondent offered this order in evidence, and an objection was interposed by appellant. The appellant then offered in evidence all of the proceedings before the referee in bankruptcy for the purpose of showing that they were not precluded of their rights and respondent interposed an objection. Evidence was adduced that the Spreckles "Savage" Tire Company tendered to appellant the payment due December 8, 1921, in the sum of $94.81, which tender was refused. We have not said what disposition was made of the three objections interposed for the reason that they were all treated alike and disposed of by one order. When made, the court announced that it would reserve the ruling and on September 18, 1924, and prior to judgment the trial judge made a written ruling sustaining each and every of the objections. The record was then left without evidence of the order of the referee in bankruptcy, or the proceedings before him, or the substance matter of the contract. The only evidence left was the stipulation, the tender and refusal, testimony relative to the condition of the automobile and its value, the fact that an attachment was run, and that L. J. Heffner was adjudged a bankrupt.

[1] It is obvious under this state of the record that much of the argument of both appellant and respondent cannot be considered for the reason that it assumes testimony to be in evidence which is not. It is also apparent that a reversal must result. The foundation of appellant's claim to possession was the contract between the Taggart Motor Company and L. J. Heffner. Even assuming that there had not been an assignment or transfer of the certificate of registration in accordance with the provisions of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517, as amended), yet the contract and the stipulation that by assignment it had passed to appellant would under the authority of Parke v. Franciscus, 194 Cal. 284, 228 P. 435, establish a cause of action in claim and delivery in favor of plaintiff. The case just cited establishes the rule that the seller in a conditional sales contract of this character has such a property right as to entitle him to maintain the action. There is in the instant cause no question of estoppel such as was considered in the Parke Case, nor the rights of an innocent purchaser intervening.

[2] As is pointed out in Bice v. Harold L. Arnold, Inc., 75 Cal. App. 629, 243 P. 468, the right of the conditional vendor is not a mere lien, but he retains title, and, as the law was at the time, this attachment could not be levied. Section 689a of the Code of Civil Procedure, which was enacted in May, 1921, specifically provides that it only relates to the interest of the conditional purchaser under those contracts entered into subsequent to the time of the going into effect of the act. This contract was entered into before the section took effect and is therefore governed by the rule announced in Morris v. Allen, 17 Cal.

App. 684, 121 P. 690, to the effect that a conditional purchaser acquires no attachable interest. Therefore the respondent had no right of possession under the writ.

[3-5] In view of the necessity for a new trial, we must say something concerning the effect of the adjudication of bankruptcy and the order of the referee. In so far as the jurisdiction of the state court is involved we find the general rule stated in 4 Cal. Jur. 69, as follows: "When the state court assumes jurisdiction in a case in which it can completely determine the rights of the parties without interfering with the jurisdiction of the federal court, a plea of the pendency of bankruptcy proceedings is of no avail. Thus the court may settle property rights where it is alleged that the property involved never belonged to the bankrupt or to his estate, and therefore never passed to the trustee." To the same effect is Collier on Bankruptcy (12th Ed.) p. 554. Had the trustee desired to defend on behalf of the bankrupt estate it was his duty to intervene. However, no personal judgment was sought against the bankrupt, and therefore the presence of the trustee was not necessary to a complete determination of the controversy. Kritzer v. Tracy Engineering Co., 16 Cal. App. 287, 116 P. 700.

[6] Nor can it be successfully urged that appellant is estopped by appearing before the referee and asking that the order to show cause be dismissed against her on the ground that she had a judgment for the recovery of the automobile or its value. She did. The fact that it was subsequently set aside was the result of no action taken by her. She had a right at the time to rely upon the judgment, and so expressed herself to the referee and no further.

Judgment reversed.

PUGH v. DAWSON. (Civ. 3587.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 15, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 14, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 11, 1929.

1. Bills and notes 🔑155—Note due one year after date was negotiable, notwithstanding clause that makers, sureties, guarantors, and indorsers consented to extension of time at or after maturity.

Where note by its terms became due one year after date, and thus definitely fixed date on which it was to mature and become payable, it was negotiable, notwithstanding provision that makers, sureties, guarantors, and indorsers of note thereby consented to extensions of time at or after maturity, since such provision did not require holder or any other person who by indorsement became payee to consent to or agree to extension of time fixed for payment.

2. Bills and notes 🔑160—Provision in note for payment of attorney's fees of 10 per cent. on amount unpaid, if placed in attorney's hands, did not render note nonnegotiable (Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3083, subd. 5).

Provision in note for payment of attorney's fees of 10 per cent. on amount then unpaid, if placed in hands of attorney for collection, or if suit were commenced for enforcing payment, did not render note nonnegotiable, under Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3083, subd. 5.

3. Bills and notes 🔑158—Where word "no" was inserted in note in space for interest rate, note was not uncertain as regards payment of interest, notwithstanding printed interest clauses.

Where promissory note was prepared by use of printed form, and word "no" was inserted with pen and in ink in space provided for rate of interest, note was not uncertain, in that it was uncertain under its terms whether interest should be paid thereon from and after date of its maturity until paid, notwithstanding printed provisions, relating to effect if interest should not be paid when due.

4. Bills and notes 🔑287—Where note was payable to order, indorsement of indorsee of payee to plaintiff was sufficient indorsement (Civ. Code, § 3112).

Where note was payable to order, and bore indorsement of indorsee of payee to plaintiff, indorsement was sufficient, under Civ. Code, § 3112.

5. Bills and notes 🔑524—Possession of commercial paper with indorsement makes prima facie case of delivery by indorser to holder and of latter's ownership (Civ. Code, §§ 3099, 3111).

Possession of commercial paper with indorsement makes prima facie case of delivery by indorser to holder, and of ownership of latter, under Civ. Code, §§ 3099, 3111.

6. Bills and notes 🔑523, 525—Evidence showed note sued on was transferred to plaintiff, and that he was holder in due course, without knowledge of legal infirmity.

In action on note, evidence held to show that note was transferred to plaintiff, and that he was holder of note in due course without knowledge of any legal infirmity which might have grown out of transaction leading to and attending its execution and delivery.

7. Bills and notes 🔑493(1)—Absent evidence to contrary, presumption that note and mortgage given for note sued on were given for valuable consideration must prevail (Civ. Code, § 1614).

There being no evidence to contrary, presumption that note and mortgage which plaintiff gave in consideration for note sued on were given for valuable consideration must prevail, under Civ. Code, § 1614.

8. Bills and notes 🔑496(2)—Note and mortgage given for note sued on having been in plaintiff's possession, and he having exercised acts of ownership, presumption he was owner must prevail, absent evidence to contrary (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 11, 12).

Note and mortgage, which plaintiff gave in consideration for note sued on, having been in possession of plaintiff, and he having exercised acts of ownership over them, presumption that he was owner of them must prevail, in absence of evidence to contrary, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 11, 12.

9. Bills and notes 🔑434—Plaintiff, under legal obligation to pay note given for note sued on, was not "volunteer" in paying note.

Where plaintiff was under legal obligation to pay another's note, which he gave in consideration for note he was suing on, he was not "volunteer" in payment of such note.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Volunteer.]

10. Appeal and error 🔑994(1)—Appellate court cannot declare plaintiff's testimony is entitled to no weight.

Appellate court cannot declare as matter of law that testimony of plaintiff in action on note is untrue and entitled to no weight or credit.

11. Bills and notes 🔑334—Statute relating to effect where transferee receives notice of infirmity of instrument held inapplicable, where transferee had no notice before paying note given for note sued on (Civ. Code, § 3135, as amended in 1917).

Civ. Code, § 3135, as amended in 1917, providing that, where transferee receives notice of any infirmity in instrument or defect in title of person negotiating same before he has paid full amount agreed to be paid therefor, he will be deemed holder in due course only to extent of amount paid by him, held inapplicable, where court found on sufficient evidence that transferee had no notice, before paying note given as consideration for transfer of note in suit to him, that latter note was procured from defendant by fraud.

12. Bills and notes 🔑373—After court's decision on plaintiff's testimony on defendant's examination that note was negotiable and that plaintiff was holder in due course, testimony regarding fraud in procurement held properly excluded (Code Civ. Proc. § 2055).

After case was submitted by both parties for decision practically on testimony alone of plaintiff, through examination by defendant's counsel under Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, and after court had decided that note was negotiable instrument, and that plaintiff purchased and received it from indorser of original payee in due course without notice of any infirmity in instrument or notice of defendant's equities, testimony offered, tending to prove fraud in procurement of note from defendant by payee, was properly excluded.

13. Trial 🔑397(1)—Where defendant attempted to prove issue of fraud in action on note as set up in answer, court was required to make finding on issue (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 632, 633).

In action on note, fact that defendant attempted to prove issue of fraud in procurement of note as set up in his answer, even though he failed in attempt, necessarily required that court make finding on issue, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 632, 633.

14. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)—Findings, where there is no evidence on issue made by pleadings, will not vitiate judgment.

Where findings are made, where there is no evidence whatever on material issue made by pleadings, such findings will not have effect of vitiating judgment, where the other findings are sufficient to support it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

Action on a promissory note by L. R. Pugh against John B. Dawson. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Judgment modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Edward Winterer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert J. Gardner and Bordwell, Mathews & Wadsworth, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HART, J. The brief of counsel for the plaintiff contains a correct general statement of the facts of the case and the proceedings at the trial culminating in the rendition of judgment for the plaintiff and we herein adopt said statement, which is as follows:

"The basis of this action is a promissory note for the sum of $2,000, made by the defendant, the appellant herein, in favor of R. B. Coleman, dated January 10, 1924, and due one year after date. The plaintiff, the respondent herein, claims to have acquired the note in due course, before maturity, for a valuable consideration, and without notice of any infirmity in or defense to it. The defendant seeks to escape his liability on the note on the ground that it was obtained fraudulently and without consideration, and maintains that the note is not negotiable in form and that the plaintiff did not acquire it in good faith, before maturity, and for value. The execution and nonpayment of the note are admitted by the defendant's answer, and upon the trial, under examination by plaintiff's counsel, the defendant admitted the execution and nonpayment of the note.

"Plaintiff, as a witness on his own behalf, testified that he acquired the note from O. J. Wigdal prior to its maturity; that he was the owner of it and that it had not been paid. The note was introduced in evidence and the plaintiff then rested.

"The plaintiff was then called by the defendant for examination under a provision of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure in an effort to prove that he did not acquire the note prior to maturity for value and without notice. After an extended examination of the plaintiff, counsel for the defendant stated that he had no further testimony to offer on the question as to whether or not the plaintiff acquired the note prior to maturity, in due course and for value, and offered to introduce testimony to the effect that the defendant received no consideration for the execution of the note and that he was induced to execute it by fraud. The court then ruled that the note involved is a negotiable instrument and that the plaintiff is a bona fide holder thereof. Counsel for plaintiff thereupon moved the court for judgment in favor of the plaintiff as prayed for in the complaint, which motion was granted."

The note declared upon is in the following language:

"$2000.00

"Los Angeles, California, Jan. 10, 1924.

"One year after date, for value received, I promise to pay to R. B. Coleman or order, at Bank of America, in the City of Los Angeles, Two Thousand Dollars, with interest, payable at the rate of no per cent. per annum from date until paid, and attorney's fees of ten per cent. on the amount then unpaid, if placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, or if suit be commenced, or other proceeding be taken to enforce the payment of this note. Should the interest not be paid when due, then both principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of this note.

"Should the interest not be paid when due, it shall be compounded monthly thereafter, and bear the same rate of interest as the principal. Principal and interest payable in Gold Coin of the United States of America of the present standard. The makers, sureties, guarantors and indorsers of this note hereby consent to extensions of time at or after the maturity hereof, and hereby waive diligence, protest, demand and notice of every kind.

"Should this note be signed by more than one person, firm or corporation, all of the obligations herein contained shall be considered joint and several obligations of each signer hereof.

"John B. Dawson."

The note was indorsed as follows:

"Pay to the order of O. J. Wigdal, without recourse.

"R. B. Coleman.

"Pay to the order of L. R. Pugh, without recourse.

"O. J. Wigdal."

[1] The appellant contends that the note is a nonnegotiable instrument for two reasons: (1) Because of the following provision contained therein: "The makers, sureties, guarantors and indorsers of this note hereby consent to extensions of time at or after the maturity hereof." (Italics ours.) (2) Because it contains a provision for attorney's fees in case the note was turned over to an attorney for collection by suit or otherwise. The specific contention as to the proposition first stated is that the agreement obliging the maker or indorsers or others who might become obligors in some form or another on the note to consent to the postponement of the payment of the obligation to some future time or times after its maturity renders the time of payment uncertain and undeterminable, and the instrument, therefore, nonnegotiable. Civ. Code, §§ 3055 and 3265.

We cannot acquiesce in that contention. The note, it will be perceived, definitely fixes the date on which it was to mature and become payable, to wit, one year after the date of its execution, which was January 10, 1924. The provision does not require the holder, or any other person who has by indorsement become the payee, to consent to or agree to any extension of the time fixed in the note for its payment, nor, in fact, does it give or purport to vest in the makers, sureties, guarantors, or indorsers any right or authority to postpone or to compel postponement of the date definitely fixed in the instrument for its payment. Obviously, the purpose and the only purpose of the provision was to permit the holder and subsequent indorsees of the note to extend the time of payment, at or after maturity, without releasing the maker or any persons who may have indorsed the instrument prior to its maturity of the liability which has attached to them as indorsers. The question, however, is not new, although California cases in point have not been cited. In Nat. Bank of Com. v. Kenney, 98 Tex. 293, 300, 83 S. W. 368, 371, the action was to enforce a chattel mortgage given to secure a promissory note which named a certain time for its payment, but which contained a provision similar to the one in question. Holding against the contention that the effect of said provision was to render the note a nonnegotiable instrument, the court, among other things, said:

"It does not say that either the holder or the maker may extend the note. It merely makes a provision in case the time of payment may be extended. How extended? It seems to us the extension meant is that which takes place when the debtor and creditor make an agreement upon a valuable consideration for the payment of the debt on some day subsequent to that previously stipulated. The obvious purpose of the provision, taken as a whole, was merely to relieve the holder of the paper from the burdens made necessary by the rigid requirements of the mercantile law in order to secure the continued liability of the indorsers and sureties upon the paper. Therefore what was meant by the stipulation as to the extension of time was simply that, in case the holder and the maker should agree upon an extension, the sureties and indorsers should not be discharged. The holder and maker of any note may at any time agree upon an extension; therefore the fact that they may have that right does not affect the negotiability of the paper. * * * The maker of such a note has the right to pay before the day named, but the holder cannot demand payment before that day."

In First National Bank of Pomeroy v. Buttery, 17 N. D. 326, 116 N. W. 341, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 878, 17 Ann. Cas. 52, the note sued on was, by its terms, made payable "on or before the 1st day of October, 1903," but contained the following stipulation, which, it will be noted, was substantially the same as the one contained in the note in suit: "The makers and indorsers herein, severally waive presentment of payment and notice of protest, and consent that the time of payment may be extended without notice." The court, in that case, answering the contention that said stipulation or provision removed the note from the negotiability class of instruments of that character, said, inter alia:

"We are of the opinion that this provision does not extend the time of payment indefinitely or render it uncertain. The time of payment is already fixed. * * * To us it is clear that it has the same effect as though the note read 'on the 1st day of October, 1903, or thereafter on demand,' in which case there would be no question of its negotiability. Holders of notes do not by a secret mental process make an extension of the time of payment, but such extension, if made at all, is made by an agreement between the principal debtor and the holder of the paper, either with or without the consent of the indorsers. This provision seems to us to have been inserted to protect the holder against any release of indorsers or others, by an extension without their assent, and the word 'makers' is evidently included to prevent any misunderstanding or misconstruction of the contract or failure to distinguish between makers, indorsers, sureties, and any other parties who might be or become liable thereon under certain contingencies as makers. 7 Cyc. 614. This phrase does not express an agreement to extend time, but leaves the matter of extension optional with the holder, and not obligatory upon him, and the note on its face fixes the time when it becomes due."

See, also, City Nat. Bank v. Commission Co., 93 Mo. App. 123, dealing with a like provision in the note here sued on, and in which it was held that such a provision in a promissory note, which fixes a definite or certain time for its payment, does not make the instrument nonnegotiable.

Here it may be stated that, at the time the North Dakota case from which the foregoing excerpt is taken was decided, the Uniform Negotiable Instrument Law was in force in that state. We are, as we intimated above, in accord with the reasoning and the conclusion following therefrom in the above cases.

Counsel for the defendant cites a number of cases upon the claim that the provision in question imparted to the note herein declared upon the character of nonnegotiability. But an examination of some of the cases so cited has disclosed a clear line of distinction between them and the case at bar in the respect now being considered. One of the cases so mentioned by counsel is Cedar Rapids National Bank v. Weber, 180 Iowa, 966, reported in 164 N. W. at page 233, L. R. A. 1918A, 432. The note sued on in that case contained the following provision: "All parties to this note, including sureties, indorsers, and guarantors, hereby severally waive presentment for payment, notice of nonpayment and protest, and consent to extensions of time on this note." The court, with unquestioned legal propriety, held that the payee or holder of the note came within the purview of the terms of said provision.

That case is peculiarly interesting in that it exhaustively reviews many cases involving discussions of the precise question now in hand. Some of the cases so reviewed involved promissory notes containing provisions substantially in the language of the one in question, while others involved like instruments in which the stipulation for the extension of the time for the payment of the note beyond the date of its maturity as specifically fixed therein was broader in scope or legal effect, in that they included, with the indorsers, sureties and guarantors, the payee or holder of the instrument. In all the cases cited in said case the decision was planted upon the solution of the question whether the stipulation for the postponement of payment of the note beyond the date of its maturity as fixed by the instrument itself either expressly or under a rational interpretation of its language included, with the indorsers, sureties and guarantors, the payee or holder of the note. In all those cases where it appeared or it was concluded that the indorsers or sureties or the guarantors were alone bound by the extension clause, it was held that the date of payment of the note was not uncertain and that it was, therefore, negotiable in form and character. If, on the other hand, the payee or holder was found also to be a party to the extension agreement, then, obviously, the note was not negotiable in form and character.

In Glidden v. Henry, 104 Ind. 278, 1 N. E. 369, 54 Am. Rep. 316 (cited by the defendant here), the note upon which recovery was sought provided that "the payee, or his assigns, may extend the time of payment thereof from time to time indefinitely, as he or they may see fit, and receive interest in advance, or otherwise, from the maker or indorsers, for any extension or forbearance so made." The court in that case held that, notwithstanding that the note contained a promise to pay in 12 months, the provision as to the postponement of the date of its payment to an indefinite time made the time of payment uncertain and hence rendered the instrument nonnegotiable.

The other cases to which attention is called by the defendant are as readily to be distinguished from the instant case as are the above cases likewise cited. We need not specially review them herein.

[2] The contention that the provision in the note in suit for the payment of the fees of an attorney of "ten per cent. on the amount then unpaid, if placed in the hands of an attorney for collection," or if suit be commenced for enforcing the payment thereof, renders the note nonnegotiable, is devoid of merit. Section 3082 of the Civil Code, after providing that an instrument to be negotiable must be in writing and signed by the maker or drawer, declares that, among other ingredients, it must contain an unconditional promise or order to pay a sum certain in money, and must be payable on demand, or at a fixed or determinable future time. Section 3083 provides that "the sum payable is a sum certain within the meaning of this act, although it is to be paid— * * * (5) With costs of collection or an attorney's fee, in case payment shall not be made at maturity." This provision of the Civil Code itself answers the point. But it may be added that subdivision (5) of section 3083 has been considered by the reviewing courts, and it has been held that a provision in a promissory note for attorney's fee for the collection or the enforcement by legal proceedings of the payment thereof after dishonor or a default in payment at maturity, as authorized by said provision, does not destroy the negotiability of the note, notwithstanding that such a provision involves a contingent agreement. See 19 Cal. Jur. § 15, p. 810; Glenn v. Rice, 174 Cal. 269, 274, 162 P. 1020; Eastman v. Sunset Park Land Co., 35 Cal. App. 628, 170 P. 642; Fox v. Crane, 43 Cal. App. 559, 185 P. 415. See, also, in the footnotes under subdivision (5) of section 3083, in Kerr's Civil Code of the Cyclopedic Code series, cases cited from other state jurisdictions and decided after the adoption in said states, respectively, of the Uniform Negotiable Instrument Law.

[3] It is next urged that the note is uncertain because it is uncertain whether, under its terms, interest is to be paid thereon from and after the date of its maturity until paid. It is clearly certain, and, in truth, not disputed, that the instrument does not provide for or contemplate that the note should bear interest before the date of its maturity. The trial court, however, construed the language of the stipulation in the note relative to interest to mean that the instrument was to bear interest from and after the date of its maturity until paid, and so concluded as a matter of law. We think it quite clear that the trial court's construction of the instrument in that particular is incorrect. It seems plain to us that a careful reading or fair consideration of the language of the note regarding interest must lead to the conclusion that it was not intended by the original parties to the instrument that it should bear interest either before or after the date of its maturity. It was expressly stated by the attorney for the plaintiff in his brief and not denied by defendant's counsel in either of his briefs that the note was written in or prepared by the use of a printed form of promissory note, "with blank spaces to be supplied in writing," according to the terms to be embraced therein; that in the blank space for the insertion of the rate of interest, if interest was to be charged, the word "no," written with pen and in ink, was inserted. As so prepared, the note, it will be perceived, reads: "* * *, with interest payable at the rate of no per cent until paid." It will also be noted that the same paragraph of the instrument contains this provision: "Should the interest not be paid when due, then both principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of this note." The second paragraph, it is to be observed, contains the following provision: "Should the interest not be paid when due, it shall be compounded monthly thereafter, and bear the same rate of interest as the principal. Principal and interest payable in gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard."

These several provisions of the note, say counsel, were intended to provide for interest from and after the maturity of the note, if it was not paid at maturity. Those provisions do not say so in terms, and if that meaning is to be given them, it must be by construction and in plain opposition to virtually an express stipulation in the instrument that no interest is to be charged either before or after the maturity of the note. We have been and are unable to conceive a sound reason for holding that the parties meant or intended that any other effect should be imparted to the note as to interest than that of the express provision that the instrument should bear "no interest until paid," plainly meaning, we think, that no interest was to be charged whether the note was paid at the date of its maturity or at some time thereafter. The provision that, "should the interest not be paid when due, then both principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of this note," is meaningless, in so far as it concerned the period of time intervening between the date of the execution and delivery and the date of the maturity of the note, for, as seen, no interest was to be charged for that period. And it would equally be meaningless after the date that it became due and payable, since, under what we conceive to be its intended meaning, the note provides that it was not to bear interest whether paid at the time of or subsequent to the date of its maturity. What we here say concerning the said provision of the note is true of the stipulation as to the compounding of interest in the second paragraph of the note as it is hereinabove quoted. That stipulation is as meaningless as the first considered. It is probable that those provisions were parts of the printed matter in the blank printed form used for writing the note on and were by inadvertence caused to remain therein. This statement is to some extent fortified by the consideration that the word "no" inserted in the blank space reserved for the specification of the rate of interest, where the note was to bear interest, was written with pen and ink, which is indicative of a deliberate purpose to charge no interest, and from this it would seem probable that, if it was the understanding by and between the original parties to the note that it was to draw interest from and after the date of its maturity, if not then paid, the parties would have caused to be likewise written in the instrument, in language too plain to be misunderstood, a provision to that effect. This would be the course naturally adopted and followed by men of long experience in business activities in all their multifarious forms, as the evidence here shows that the parties to the transactions involved herein were and are.

[4-6] There is no merit in the contention that it was not shown that the note was transferred to the plaintiff, or that he was not a holder of the note in due course or without knowledge of any legal infirmity which which have grown out of the transaction leading to and attending its execution and delivery. The note, of which a copy is hereinabove set forth, was made and is payable to order, as will be perceived. It will further be noted that it bears the indorsement of Wigdal, indorsee of the payee, to the plaintiff. This was, of course, a sufficient indorsement. Civ. Code, § 3112. The answer admits that the note was executed by the defendant, and the latter testified that the signature to the note was his. The note was offered by plaintiff and received in evidence.

"Possession of commercial paper, with indorsement, makes a prima facie case of delivery by the indorser to the holder and of ownership of the letter. In Pastene v. Pardini, 135 Cal. 431, 67 P. 681, the court said: 'The delivery was prima facie established by plaintiff's production and proffer of the note.' See note to Bedell v. Herring, 77 Cal. 572, 20 P. 129, 11 Am. St. Rep. 323, where the cases are collected. The proposition there laid down and supported by numerous cases is thus stated: 'It is well established that the mere possession of a negotiable instrument by the indorsee, or by the transferee where no indorsement is necessary, imports prima facie that he is the lawful owner, and that he has acquired it before maturity, bona fide, for value, in the usual course of business, and without any circumstances impeaching its validity.'" Linder Hdw. Co. v. Pac. Sugar Corp., 17 Cal. App. 81, 92, 118 P. 785, 789. See, also, Civ. Code, §§ 3099 and 3111; Hall v. Thurston, 176 Cal. 738, 171 P. 285; Story on Prom. Notes, § 196; Braly v. Henry, 71 Cal. 481, 482, 483, 11 P. 385, 12 P. 623, 60 Am. Rep. 543.

Besides the prima facie showing of the plaintiff's ownership of the note, the latter testified that he purchased the note from Wigdal, an indorsee, paying $1,600 therefor.

The answer sets up fraudulent representations as the means whereby Coleman, the payee, procured the execution and the delivery of the note by the defendant to him (Coleman), and alleges that the plaintiff, prior to and at the time he took the note from Wigdal, had full knowledge of such fraud or false representations, and, further, had knowledge at said time of the asserted fact that the defendant repudiated and rescinded said note. There is no evidence that Wigdal was not a holder and owner of the note, or that he did not acquire it in due course and for value. There is no evidence that either Wigdal or the plaintiff had any knowledge of any legal infirmity in the instrument or of any claim of any such infirmity at the times, respectively, that each acquired the note, Wigdal from the payee Coleman, and the plaintiff from Wigdal. If there was in point of fact fraud at the bottom of the transaction culminating in the execution and the delivery of the note to Coleman, there is absolutely no evidence that either Wigdal or the plaintiff was a party to such fraud, or knew anything of it when each in turn became the owner thereof or at any subsequent time.

"It is a rule of the law merchant, and it is provided by the Code in adopting the uniform law, that 'a holder who derives his title through a holder in due course, and who is himself not a party to any fraud or illegality affecting the instrument, has all of the rights of such former holder in respect to all parties prior to the latter.'" 19 Cal. Jur. p. 860, § 53; Civ. Code, § 3139.

[7-9] The point next discussed is that the plaintiff did not give a valuable consideration for the note. The evidence shows that the plaintiff gave Wigdal for the note $100 in money and a promissory note, secured by a mortgage on certain real property, for $1,500. This note and mortgage were executed by one Lottie Ahlstrom in favor of Wigdal and delivered by the plaintiff to said Wigdal, the indorser of the note in suit to plaintiff, on the 6th day of January, 1925, which was the date of said (Ahlstrom) note and mortgage. An effort was made by the plaintiff's counsel to obtain an explanation from both Miss Ahlstrom and the plaintiff of the connection the latter had with that transaction, but the trial court sustained objections of counsel for defendant to questions directed to the disclosure of the latter's relation thereto. The plaintiff, however, did testify that he had possession of the note and mortgage, that he did deliver them to Wigdal as in part payment for the note in suit, and that he, at some time after purchasing the note sued on, paid the Ahlstrom note to Wigdal. There was no other testimony on that question received.

In that state of the record as to the Ahlstrom transaction it cannot be said that the plaintiff was under no obligation to pay and satisfy the said note and the mortgage to secure its payment, or repay Miss Ahlstrom if she had been compelled to pay and discharge that obligation. As counsel for the plaintiff in their brief well say: "There being no evidence to the contrary, the presumption that the Ahlstrom note and mortgage were given for a valuable consideration must prevail (Civ. Code, § 1614), and they having been in the possession of the plaintiff, and he having exercised acts of ownership over them, the presumption that he was the owner of them must prevail," there being no evidence to the contrary (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 11 and 12), "and this irrespective of the question of his ownership of the property mortgaged." If, as is thus to be presumed, the plaintiff was under legal obligation to pay the Ahlstrom note, he certainly could not be a mere volunteer in the payment of said note, as counsel for the defendant contends.

[10, 11] The defendant's counsel makes a large number of points upon the question of the good faith of the transfer of the note in suit by Wigdal to the plaintiff. We will not attempt herein to follow the ramifications of his argument in that regard and notice specially all of the many points so made. The argument, if sustained, would require us to declare, as a matter of law, that the testimony of the plaintiff is untrue, and entitled to no weight or credit. This we cannot do. While there were developed in his examination by defendant's counsel a few circumstances in connection with the transaction eventuating in the acquisition of the note by him which, unexplained, might justify suspicion that said transaction was not bona fide either on the part of the plaintiff or his indorser Wigdal, yet there was an explanation by the plaintiff of the circumstances referred to, and whether it was or was not satisfactory was a question for the trial court to determine.

We have heretofore in effect declared that the findings upon all the vital issues herein derive sufficient support from the evidence. The findings are to the effect that, before and at the time of purchasing the note in suit and so securing its transfer to him, the plaintiff had no knowledge that the transaction in which the execution and the delivery of the note by the defendant to Coleman, the payee, was characterized by fraud or malversation of any character on the part of Coleman, if such was the fact. And the findings further show that the plaintiff, after purchasing the note in suit and before paying the Ahlstrom note, received and had no notice of any infirmity in the instrument or any defect in the title of Wigdal or any other person previously owning the same. Hence, as counsel for plaintiff contend, the attempt of counsel for the defendant to invoke the application herein of section 3135 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1917, is abortive. That section provides:

"Where the transferee receives notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating the same before he has paid the full amount agreed to be paid therefor, he will be deemed a holder in due course only to the extent of the amount theretofore paid by him."

It is claimed by counsel for the plaintiff that that section "has no application whatever in any case where (as they claim is true here) the assignee has given the full consideration agreed to be given for a negotiable instrument," or where, as here, the transferee gives as the consideration for the transfer of the note the note of a third party to the transferor and which the transferee promises to pay or assumes the obligation to pay. As to instances where the section has application, counsel for plaintiff cite the case of Griswold v. Morrison, 53 Cal. App. 93, 200 P. 62. It is not necessary, however, that we should pause to inquire whether the postulate of counsel's proposition here is or is not sound, for it is obvious that the section is not applicable here, since as above pointed out, the record shows that the trial court found upon sufficient evidence that the transferee had no notice, before paying the note given as a consideration for the transfer of the note in suit to him, that the latter note was procured from the defendant by means of fraud or fraudulent representation by the payee therein named.

[12] The next assignment of alleged error to be considered needs but brief consideration herein. It involves an attack upon the ruling of the court refusing to allow the defendant to introduce proof in substantiation of the allegations of the answer that the defendant was induced by the original payee of the note to execute and deliver the same to the latter through fraudulent representations. As is above shown, the offer of such proof was made after both the plaintiff and the defendant had submitted the case for decision practically upon the testimony alone of the plaintiff as it was brought into the record through an extended and exhaustive exam ination of plaintiff by defendant's counsel under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and after the court had decided in favor of the plaintiff the question of the negotiability of the note and the question whether the latter acquired the instrument in due course and without notice of any infirmity in the instrument. The ruling complained of was obviously sound. After the decision that the note was a negotiable instrument and that the plaintiff purchased and received it from the Wigdal, the indorsee of the original payee, in due course and without notice of any infirmity in the instrument, or notice of the defendant's equities, if any he had any testimony tending to prove fraud in the procurement of the note from the defendant by Coleman would be wholly immaterial or to no purpose.

Upon this question, the case of Goodale v. Thorn, 199 Cal. 307, 312, 313, 249 P. 11, which was an action to recover on certain assigned trade acceptances, presents a situation substantially, if not precisely, the same as the one with which we are here confronted, and settles the question here against the position of the defendant. But the defendant had an opportunity to present all the testimony available to him to support his defense of fraud, but his attorney, it seems, was perfectly willing to submit the issue of fraud upon the testimony he brought out through the examination of the plaintiff under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. He, in fact, insisted upon a decision upon the testimony of plaintiff of the question of good faith of the latter in the acquisition of ownership of the note. That question having been determined against his position, it is, indeed, strange that he should now insist that his offer to prove fraud involves a legally sound proposition. It may be suggested that had he there and then applied to the court, upon a proper showing, for an order reopening the case for the purpose of enabling him to introduce further evidence in support of his special plea in bar, refusal by the court to grant such application might present here a question of abuse of discretion on the part of the court.

There are certain other rulings on questions of the legal propriety of the examination in certain particulars of plaintiff by defendant's counsel under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure which are assigned as erroneous and prejudicial. These rulings were upon objections by plaintiff to certain questions propounded by the counsel for the defendant to the plaintiff and which the court sustained. The assignments need not be specially noticed herein. The whole examination of plaintiff by the defendant's counsel was to show, if thus it could be done, that he took the note in suit with notice of its alleged invalidity, and counsel exhaustively went into that question in such examination, covering, as to most of the instances in which the rulings now referred to were made, the points which the interdicted questions were particularly designed to develop. The defendant was not prejudiced by said rulings. But we are not to be understood as holding that all the rulings now referred to were incorrect. Some of them, indeed, were technically proper, the objections thereto being addressed to the form rather than the relevancy and materiality of the testimony which it was their evident purpose to bring out.

[13, 14] Counsel for defendant asserts that, "notwithstanding the fact that there is no evidence at all in the record on the matter of fraud, the court erroneously in its findings found that the allegations in defendant's answer as to said fraud are untrue"; that "there is absolutely no evidence at all to support such findings." As seen, the issue of fraud was introduced into the case by the defendant's answer, in the form of a plea of confession and avoidance, and, as repeatedly stated herein, the defendant, as in support of that plea or issue, called the plaintiff to the witness stand under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure and examined him at great length regarding the circumstances under which he took the note, the obvious object of such examination being to show by the plaintiff himself, if he could, that plaintiff took the note with notice of the asserted invalidity of the instrument by reason of fraud practiced upon the defendant by the original payee in the procurement by said payee of the note. Upon that testimony counsel for the defendant submitted the issue of fraud to the court for determination and decision. Evidently counsel believed, when so submitting that issue, that through his examination of the plaintiff he had brought forth facts and circumstances sufficient in probative force to warrant a finding that the note was the offspring of the fraud or false representations of the original payee, and that the plaintiff took the note with knowledge or notice of such fraud. In his brief filed here it is clearly shown that he still believes that the testimony of plaintiff as he (counsel) brought it out fully supports the allegations of the answer on the issue of fraud. Indeed, as shown, he insists here that this court can so hold as a matter of law.

But, however this all may be, the fact that the defendant attempted to prove the issue of fraud as set up in his answer, even though he failed in the attempt, necessarily required that the court should dispose of that issue in its decision. "Under the system of express findings now provided for (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 632 and 633), full findings, unless waived, are required on all material issues raised by the pleadings and evidence. And this is true, even though no evidence has been introduced in support of an issue, or the evidence is insufficient to sustain the issue, for in such cases the findings of fact should be against the party who has the burden of proof thereon." 24 Cal. Jur. p. 935 et seq., § 183; see, also, 2 Hayne on New Trial (Rev. Ed.) § 240, p. 1319; Taylor v. Taylor, 192 Cal. 71, 81, 218 P. 756, 51 A. L. R. 1074; 24 Cal. Jur. § 182, p. 935. It is true that where there is no evidence whatever upon a material issue made by the pleadings, omission to make a finding upon such issue will be held not to be sufficient to justify a reversal. But if findings are, nevertheless, made in the latter case, as counsel claims is true here, such findings will not have the effect of vitiating the judgment, the other findings being sufficient to support it. This rule is obviously not inconsistent with the rule first above stated with relation to the question in hand.

Our conclusion is, as is apparent from the foregoing discussion, that the findings are well supported by the proofs and that the findings support the judgment, save so much thereof as relates to interest.

In accord with the views above expressed, as to the matter of interest on the note in suit, the judgment is hereby modified, by striking therefrom the sum of $198, the sum thereby allowed as interest on said note, and, as so modified, the judgment is affirmed, appellant to recover costs.

SILVERBERG v. BAUM. (Civ. 5001.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 17, 1928.

1. Brokers 🔑82(1)—Complaint, not alleging plaintiff was licensed, does not state cause of action (Real Estate Broker's Act, § 20).

Under Real Estate Broker's Act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 112) § 20, requiring issuance and possession of license to be alleged and proved in action for compensation, complaint for services as realty salesman, not alleging plaintiff had license, did not state a cause of action.

2. Pleading 🔑34(7)—When broker's complaint did not allege he had license, there was no doubt to resolve against appellant.

Where real estate salesman suing for services did not allege that he was licensed, there was no doubt as to sufficiency of the complaint to be resolved against appellant on appeal by defendant.

3. Brokers 🔑82(1)—Complaint not alleging possession of license was not sufficient on ground that services may have been rendered in another state.

In action for services as realty salesman, complaint not alleging plaintiff had license was not sufficient on ground that services might have been performed in another state, in absence of any allegation to that effect.

4. Evidence 🔑80(1)—In absence of allegation to contrary, law of another state as to necessity of license by broker will be presumed same as that of state of suit (Real Estate Broker's Act, § 20).

Even though services as realty salesman for which action was brought were rendered in another state, it would be assumed, in absence of allegations to the contrary, that laws of such state were the same as Real Estate Broker's Act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 112) § 20, requiring allegation and proof that salesman had license.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by A. J. Silverberg against Harry Baum for services as real estate salesman. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. W. Sorenson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Leland J. Allen, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. Plaintiff brought an action in the court below to recover the sum of $1,000, in which sum he alleged the defendant had become indebted to him "for services rendered by plaintiff as a realty salesman." The defendant denied that he had become indebted to plaintiff for such or any services in any amount. There was no allegation that the plaintiff had ever procured a license as a real estate salesman. Judgment founded upon findings which are also silent upon the point was rendered for plaintiff in the sum of $750 and the defendant appeals therefrom upon the judgment roll maintaining that the complaint fails to state a cause of action.

[1] Section 20 of what is commonly known as the Real Estate Broker's Act (Deering's General Laws 1923, p. 25) reads as follows: "No person, copartnership or corporation engaged in the business or acting in the capacity of a real estate broker or a real estate salesman within this state shall bring or maintain any action in the courts of this state for the collection of compensation for the performance of any of the acts mentioned in section two hereof without alleging and proving that such person, copartnersip or corporation was a duly licensed real estate broker or real estate salesman at the time the alleged cause of action arose." It will be immediately observed that this act, unlike many others adopted for somewhat similar purposes, requires the issuance and possession of the license to be alleged and proved. Hence it may not be argued that it is a matter of defense. Appellant's contention must be upheld upon the authority of a number of precedents. Wise v. Radis, 74 Cal. App. 765, 242 P. 90; Gittelson v. Gandolfo (Cal. App.) 259 P. 340;

Wilson v. Earp (Cal. App.) 267 P. 112; Haas v. Greenwald, 196 Cal. 236, 237 P. 38.

[2] Nor does it avail respondent to argue, in the language of Houston v. Williams, 53 Cal. App. 267, 200 P. 55, that "any doubt as to the sufficiency of the complaint in the respect indicated should, of course, be resolved against the appellant" for the reason that in the instant case there is no doubt to resolve.

[3, 4] Equally untenable is his suggestion that the services may have been performed in another state, for, in the absence of an allegation to bring the plaintiff outside of the limitations, he cannot escape the language of the act. Even if the complaint alleged that the services were rendered in another state we would be obliged to assume, in the absence of allegations to the contrary, that the laws of the sister state were the same as ours. PEOPLE v. LA VERNE. (Cr. 1062.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 20, 1928.

1. Rape 🔑51(1)—Evidence held sufficient to support conviction of rape.

Prosecutrix's and physician's testimony held sufficient to support conviction of rape.

2. Criminal law 🔑829(1)—Refusal of instructions covered by instructions given is not error.

Refusal of requested instructions fully covered by instructions given is not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. R. Hughes, Judge.

James La Verne was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John A. McGilvray, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of rape, accomplished with a girl of the age of 14 years. He has appealed from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

[1] Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict and judgment. The prosecuting witness testified that: The defendant "attacked" her in his automobile; that "when I was screaming * * * he told me to shut up, and he slapped me. * * * He threw me down in the seat * * * and he had intercourse." She gave other testimony of similar import. While the witness did not use the term "sexual intercourse," it is perfectly clear that she did not employ the word "intercourse" to mean merely an "interchange of thought." A physician testified to physical facts showing that some person had had sexual intercourse with the girl. The evidence is amply sufficient to show the defendant's guilt.

[2] Complaint is made of the court's refusal to give certain instructions requested by the defendant. Every proposition of law contained in the instructions so refused was fully covered by instructions which were given. Much of the argument of counsel for appellant is based on the erroneous assumption that section 1096 of the Penal Code, relating to the presumption of innocence and the question of reasonable doubt, was not read to the jury. That section is set forth at length on pages 75 and 76 of the reporter's transcript as one of the instructions given to the jury.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

PACIFIC FINANCE CORPORATION v. LAUMAN et al. (Civ. 3570.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 17, 1928.

Usury 🔑32—Dealer selling automobiles on time, price exceeding cash price by more than 12 per cent. per annum, does not violate Usury Law (Usury Law).

Dealer selling automobiles on time payments for more than he would sell same automobiles for cash, where difference between the two prices, if considered as interest on cash price, would amount to more than 12 per cent. per annum on such cash price, does not violate Usury Law (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry R. Archbald, Judge.

Two actions on a guaranty for payment of money by the Pacific Finance Corporation against Roy R. Lauman and others, which were consolidated and tried together. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Perry F. Backus, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Overton, Lyman & Plumb, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in two actions originally commenced on the same guaranty. The cases were consolidated and tried by the court together.

The defendants and appellants, on May 23, 1923, guaranteed to respondent, Pacific Finance Corporation, the payment of all moneys due, or to become due, from the Wilshire Motor Company. The complaint in both cases states a cause of action on this written guaranty. The Wilshire Motor Company sold automobiles to purchasers on time, under conditional sales contracts. Some 30 or 40 of these contracts were assigned by the Wilshire Motor Company to respondent, Pacific Finance Corporation, by separate assignments made at different times, each of which provided that the Wilshire Motor Company guaranteed the payment, by the purchaser of the automobile, of all moneys due, and to become due, under the conditional sales contract. In 30 or 40 cases the purchaser of the automobile defaulted in his payments. In these cases the respondent, Pacific Finance Corporation, repossessed the automobiles and sold the same pursuant to the terms of the various assignments. The automobiles did not sell for enough to pay out the original contracts. The Wilshire Motor Company refused to pay the deficiencies, and respondent commenced this action against appellants, the original guarantors of the Wilshire Motor Company, and recovered a judgment for the total deficiencies remaining due under said conditional sales contracts.

Appellants pleaded in their answer, and now contend, that each one of the conditional sales contracts between Wilshire Motor Company and the purchaser is usurious, under the California Usury Law (Stats. 1919, p. lxxxiii). The trial court found that there was no usury in any of these conditional sales contracts. One of the contracts in question, actually executed, with all the terms and conditions, was introduced in evidence, and it was stipulated that, if this contract was usurious, all of the other 30 or 40 were also usurious. Therefore we will consider the case as if this was the only contract involved. The contract in evidence recites delivery of the automobile to the purchaser at the time the contract was executed. No interest is provided for in the contract. It provides: "The seller hereby agrees to sell, and the purchaser agrees to buy, the following described personal property * * * for the sum of $532.24, gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard, payable as follows: $190.00 upon the signing of this contract, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the balance as follows: $28.57 on January 2, 1924; $28.57 on February 2, 1924; $28.57 on March 2, 1924; $28.57 on April 2, 1924; $28.57 on May 2, 1924; $28.57 on June 2, 1924; $28.57 on July 2, 1924; $28.57 on August 2, 1924; $28.57 on September 2, 1924; $28.57 on October 2, 1924; $28.57 on November 2, 1924; $28.57 on December 2, 1924." In other words, the contract entered into provides for the sale of the automobile for the sum of $532.84, payable $190 in cash, and the balance, in the sum of $342.84, payable in 12 monthly installments of $28.57 each. On the reverse side of the conditional sales contract is found what is termed "Dealer's Statement," which was filled out by Wilshire Motor Company, and which designates the purchase price of $532.84 as the "time selling price," and recites that $475 is the "cash selling price," and shows the method used by the dealer in fixing the "time selling price."

The evidence clearly shows that the sale made by the Wilshire Motor Company to the purchaser in the contract in question was a bona fide sale. There is no claim that the purchaser had any right to the automobile prior to the execution of the conditional sales contract, or that the transaction was intended to take the place of a loan. In other words, the evidence is uncontradicted that it was a legitimate business transaction, involving a straight sale of personal property under a conditional sales contract, and there is no evidence that the purchaser of the automobile borrowed any money from any source. Appellants do not contend that there was a loan of money, but insist that there was a "forbearance" on the part of the Wilshire Motor Company. This claim is based entirely upon the evidence, which shows that the automobile sold had a "cash selling price" and a "time selling price," and that the difference between the cash selling price and the time selling price, if looked upon as interest, exceeded 12 per cent. per annum on the "cash price."

No agreement was entered into for a cash selling price. The only agreement entered into was for a time selling price. Therefore this question is squarely presented: Does an automobile dealer violate the Usury Law if he charges one price for an automobile when the sale is for cash and another price for the same automobile when the sale is made upon time payments, when the difference between the two prices exceeds 12 per cent. per annum? Or, to state it another way: Does the owner of property, whether it be real or personal, violate the Usury Law if he sells his property on time payments for more than he would sell the same property for cash, and the difference between the two prices, if considered as interest on the cash price, would amount to more than twelve per cent. per annum on such cash price? We think not.

When this case was tried in the court below, and when the appeal was taken, the question as to whether a transaction of this character came within the provisions of the Usury Law of this state had not been specifically passed upon by the Supreme or appellate courts. The Supreme and appellate courts have recently definitely and finally determined that, under conditions disclosed by the evidence in the case at bar, there is no infringement upon or invasion of our Usury Law. Verbeck v. Clymer et al. (Cal. Sup.) 261 P. 1017; Berger v. Lodge et al. (Cal. App.) 265 P. 515.

The judgment of the trial court was therefore correct, and should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

LAACK et al. v. DIMMICK et ux.
(Civ. 5813.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 13, 1928.

1. Husband and wife 🔑138(9)—Wife held to have ratified husband's contract with brokers by authorizing tender of deed and signing notice canceling agency contract.

Where, after brokers had procured purchaser, owner authorized husband and attorneys to tender deed signed by her, and signed notice canceling and revoking the agency contract, because payment was not made in cash forthwith upon tender of the deed, she ratified her husband's execution of agency contract with the brokers.

2. Principal and agent 🔑137(1)—Party may be estopped without writing to deny authority of agent, though act requires writing (Civ. Code, § 2310).

Though, under Civ. Code, § 2310, act which requires written authority can be ratified only in writing, party may be estopped to deny agent's authority by acts without writing.

3. Husband and wife 🔑138(8)—Wife held estopped by her acts to deny husband's authority to contract with brokers.

Where owner of property whose husband signed contract employing brokers to find purchaser, after purchaser had been found and part of payment sent her and her husband, signed deed and writing revoking and canceling the brokers' agency, because of nonpayment of price upon tender of deed, she was estopped to deny her husband's authority to sign the agency contract.

4. Principal and agent 🔑166(1)—Ratification must be with full knowledge of all material facts (Civ. Code, § 2310).

Under Civ. Code, § 2310, confirmation and ratification of unauthorized acts of agent, to be effectual and binding on principal, must be made with full knowledge of all material facts, or its equivalent, and ignorance, mistake, or misapprehension of essential circumstances will absolve principal from liability.

5. Principal and agent 🔑166(6)—Ratification is presumed to have been with knowledge of facts, and mistake or misapprehension must be proved by person alleging them.

When ratification of agent's acts is proved, inference necessarily follows that it was with knowledge of facts, and any mistake or misapprehension must be shown by the party who claims the mistake or misapprehension.

6. Husband and wife 🔑138(8)—Wife held to have had full knowledge of material facts when she did acts estopping her to deny husband's authority to contract with brokers.

Owner of property held to have had full knowledge of all material facts at time she did acts which estopped her from denying her husband's authority to contract with brokers to find purchaser for property.

7. Husband and wife 🔑138(8)—Matters omitted from letter from brokers to owner held not to prevent owner being estopped by acts, from denying authority of husband to contract with brokers.

That letter from brokers to owner of property, advising her that sale had been negotiated and inclosing part of down payment, did not state full selling price or full amount received from purchaser, or name of one interested with ostensible purchaser, or that insurance, rents, interest, and taxes would be prorated, held not to prevent owner from being estopped by subsequent acts from denying husband's authority to contract with the brokers to find a purchaser.

8. Vendor and purchaser 🔑207—Contract was assignable by purchaser without vendors' consent.

Contract for sale of realty was assignable by the purchaser to any one without consent of the vendors.

9. Vendor and purchaser 🔑207—Assignment does not release assignor's personal liability to vendor.

While assignment of contract for purchase of real estate by purchaser carries with it the assignor's rights, it does not release assignor's personal liability to vendor.

10. Vendor and purchaser 🔑214(6)—When assignee of contract claims performance, he is subject to liability imposed by contract on assignor.

While mere assignment of contract for purchase of real estate does not cast upon assignee personal liabilities imposed by contract on assignor, it is otherwise if assignee claims benefits of performance.

11. Brokers 🔑84(1)—In absence of showing to contrary, it will be presumed that principals were not interested in persons who would receive title.

In real estate brokers' action for commission on sale of real estate which principals refused to consummate, it will be presumed, in absence of showing to the contrary, that principals were interested in receiving purchase price, and not in person or persons who would ultimately receive the title.

12. Vendor and purchaser 🔑3(4)—Broker's sale deposit receipt bearing purchaser's agreement to conditions was contract of sale and not option.

Where broker's sales deposit receipt, providing for payment of balance of purchase price "within * * * days" and for forfeiture if broker did not complete purchase within 30 days, bore indorsement signed by purchaser, by which he agreed to conditions therein contained, it was a binding agreement of sale and not a mere option.

13. Vendor and purchaser 🔑196, 197—Law prorates rent and interest on mortgage between parties.

Upon sale of real estate subject to mortgage, the law would prorate rents and interest between vendor and purchaser.

14. Brokers 🔑54—Purchaser need not have money in his immediate possession or to his credit to be "able" to purchase.

While purchaser procured by broker must be able to buy, and "able" means financially able, he need not have all the money in his immediate possession or to his credit at a bank, if he is able to command the necessary funds to close the deal within the time required.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Able.]

15. Brokers 🔑54—Purchaser is able to pay if he has assets of value greater than price and financial rating enabling him to command funds.

Rule that purchaser procured by broker must be able to buy is satisfied if purchaser has assets of greater value than purchase price and financial rating which will enable him to command funds when needed.

16. Vendor and purchaser 🔑75—Reasonable time for payment is allowed when contract does not fix time.

Where contract for sale of realty does not fix time for final payment, as where it provides for payment "within * * * days," a reasonable time is allowed.

17. Brokers 🔑54—When no time for payment is fixed, purchaser must be ready, willing, and able to purchase within reasonable time.

Rule that purchaser procured by broker must be ready, willing, and able, means, where no time for payment is fixed in contract, that he must be ready, willing, and able to carry out purchase within reasonable time.

18. Brokers 🔑86(5)—Evidence held to show purchaser and his assignee were able to pay.

In brokers' action for commission, evidence held to show that purchaser procured by broker and one to whom he assigned contract were able to pay for the property.

19. Brokers 🔑54—Inconvenience to purchaser of raising money does not affect ability to pay.

If purchaser procured by broker is able to command necessary money to carry out purchase, the cost or inconvenience to the purchaser of raising the money is immaterial to the seller.

20. Brokers 🔑63(5)—Tender of cash not necessary to bind sale when contract repudiated on different ground.

Where owners' repudiation of contract for sale of realty made by brokers was not based on inability of purchaser to complete the purchase, but on brokers' lack of right to make the contract of sale, tender of cash by purchaser was not required to bind the sale.

21. Brokers 🔑54—Readiness and willingness to pay is shown by entering into binding contract.

Readiness and willingness to purchase of person procured by broker is shown where he enters into contract binding him to purchase.

22. Brokers 🔑50—Contract held not to require sale to take place within time limited.

Contract employing brokers for 30 days and until agreement was canceled in writing to negotiate sale of real estate with authority to execute an agreement of sale with purchaser obtained within time specified, did not require that sale itself, as distinguished from agreement of sale, should actually take place within the time limit of the contract.

23. Brokers 🔑14—Brokers held authorized by contract of employment to arrange for transfer of title through medium of escrow.

Contract employing brokers to negotiate sale of property with power to enter into contract of sale and requiring owners to furnish guaranty certificate of title showing title in owner at time of sale, authorized broker to arrange for transfer of title through medium of an escrow.

24. Vendor and purchaser 🔑76—Tender in afternoon of certificate of title brought down to date held not to put purchaser in default.

In view of custom of title companies in limiting their guaranties to 8:30 a. m. of day certificate of title is dated, vendor's tender in afternoon of certificate of title brought down to that date was not such a tender as would put purchaser in default.

25. Evidence 🔑21—Court will not assume ignorance of custom of title companies as to limiting guaranties of certificate of title.

Custom of title companies in limiting their guaranties to 8:30 a. m. of day certificate is dated is so universal and well known in state that court will not assume to be ignorant of it.

26. Husband and wife 🔑25(1)—Husband signing as wife's agent contract, stating title was in wife, when it was owned in joint tenancy, was liable thereon.

Where contract employing brokers to negotiate sale of property stated that property was owned by wife and for that reason it was made in name of wife and signed by husband as her agent, but property was in fact owned by husband and wife in joint tenancy, the husband was liable on the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliott Craig, Judge.

Action by A. H. Laack and another, doing business as Laack & Williams, against Frank M. Dimmick and another, to recover real estate broker's commission. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Meserve & Meserve, of Los Angeles (Timon E. Owens, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles (B. R. Ware, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

CRAIL, Justice pro tem. This is an action to recover a real estate broker's commission arising out of the sale of real estate. Judgment was entered in favor of both defendants, and the plaintiffs appeal.

On February 1, 1923, F. M. Dimmick individually entered into an "exclusive agency contract" with Laack & Williams by which they were employed for 30 days and until the agreement was canceled in writing to negotiate the sale of certain real property located at the northwest corner of Sixth and Westlake, in the city of Los Angeles, which real property the owner agreed to sell to such purchaser as the agents might procure within the time aforesaid, at the price of $100,000 net to the owner. The terms of sale were to be $40,000 in cash, buyer to assume a mortgage of $60,000; and further terms were that the agents were appointed attorneys in fact of the owner, with full power to execute an agreement of sale with any purchaser obtained within the time aforesaid, binding the owner to sell said property upon the terms aforesaid and to convey same to the purchaser by deed of grant and to furnish, without expense to the purchaser, a guaranty certificate of title showing title in the owner at the time of sale; also, that the agents should be entitled to a commission equivalent to the difference between the purchase price above specified and the price at which the agents might procure a purchaser, which commission the owner agreed to pay the agents when a purchaser was obtained; also, that said commission, at the option of the agents, might be retained by them out of the moneys of the owner coming into their possession on account of the purchase price; and that the title to said property then stood in the name of Lucile M. Dimmick. Later, after it became apparent that the plaintiffs would be unable to sell the property within the time agreed. Mr. Dimmick inserted a figure "5" after the "1" in the date of the contract, thereby giving an apparent additional 10 days' life to the agreement, although, as heretofore stated, the agreement was to remain in effect until canceled in writing. The contract was signed, "Lucile M. Dimmick, per F. M. Dimmick," and there was sustantial evidence that Mr. Dimmick was not authorized in advance to append her name thereto; but it is the contention of the appellants, both that she ratified the contract, and that the circumstances were such that she is estopped from denying her signature to the agreement. These matters will be hereafter discussed in this opinion.

After the execution of the contract, the plaintiffs used their best efforts to sell the property, listing and advertising the same and showing it to prospective buyers.

In a few days the plaintiffs interested George A. Eastman in the property, and thereafter persuaded C. G. Becker to join him in the purchase of it. The contract of purchase was entered into on March 16, 1923, signed by the plaintiffs on behalf of the owner and by C. G. Becker as purchaser, and was designated a "sales deposit receipt." It complied in all respects with the terms upon which the plaintiffs were authorized to sell the property, unless it were with respect to an escrow and with respect to the time within which the escrow was to be completed. These two matters will be taken up later. Eastman and Becker paid to Laack & Williams $2,500 as part payment on the purchase price; but the transaction was handled in Becker's name, although Eastman in fact was interested in the purchase. On the same day Laack & Williams mailed a letter addressed to both of the defendants and included a check for $1,000 payable to them. The check was dated March 16th, and was cashed March 20th. It was payable to the order of both defendants and had on its face a notation, "Deposit and part payment of Becker offer on northwest corner Sixth and Westlake." The letter which accompanied the check was addressed to both of the defendants. In it they were advised of the sale to Becker, and their attention was called to the fact that the sale was made under the exclusive agency contract given plaintiffs, dated February 15, 1923, and they were notified that the terms of the sale were those embodied in said exclusive agency contract; they were also advised that the necessary instructions to the title company, together with the necessary papers, would be submitted to them on the following day, and were told that the instructions provided that the escrow must be closed in the usual 30 days provided by the title company; they were also told that the $1,000 check was inclosed as deposit and part payment of the purchase price. On March 23, 1923, C. G. Becker assigned all his right, title, and interest in the contract of purchase to Eastman upon the payment to him of $1,250. On March 27th Laack & Williams gave written escrow instructions to the Title Insurance & Trust Company, and on the same day C. G. Becker, as purchaser, gave his instructions to the title company.

Two days later, March 29, 1923, defendant Dimmick and attorneys on behalf of both defendants called at the office of plaintiff Ralph O. Williams. At that conference Mr. Dimmick tendered a deed executed by both of the defendants, conveying the property described in the exclusive agency contract and in the sales deposit receipt to C. G. Becker. At the same time a certificate of title to the property, "brought down to date," was tendered to the plaintiffs. Defendants did not introduce this certificate in evidence, and it is not in the record. Later in the conference said Williams was served with a written notice addressed to Laack & Williams of the cancellation of the agency contract. This notice was signed by both defendants; and at the same conference Mr. Dimmick offered to return the $1,000. The next day, March 30, 1923, plaintiffs addressed a letter to both defendants inclosing escrow instructions dated March 27, 1923, for their signatures, and respondents received this letter on the day it was mailed. On April 12, 1923, the full amount of money necessary to complete the deal, $46,250, was deposited with the title company, as escrow holder, to complete the purchase, and on the same day the plaintiffs wrote the defendants a letter in which they advised them that on that day the purchasers had placed with the title company the necessary cash to complete the sale under the contract and demanded that the respondents immediately place in said escrow, of which they had theretofore been advised, the deed and certificate of title. Six days after the money was so deposited, the attorneys for the defendants wrote a letter to the plaintiffs, reminding them that Mr. Dimmick had tendered a deed to the property described in plaintiffs' letter of April 12th, and had given them ample time to make good on the purchase price thereof. In the same letter they also referred to the purchaser as a dummy purchaser and refused to go ahead with the deal. It will be noted that at this time all of the money was in escrow and the refusal is in a letter in which there is a reference to appellants' letter of April 12th, in which the Dimmicks were notified that the money had been deposited with the title company. On May 8, 1923, Becker and Eastman tendered performance on their part through escrow, and finally, on May 23d, upon Dimmicks' refusal to proceed, the escrow was closed and all money withdrawn.

The complaint alleged that both of the defendants entered into the exclusive agency contract, and the court found that defendant F. M. Dimmick entered into the same, and that "said F. M. Dimmick at the same time signed the said agreement with defendant Lucile M. Dimmick's name by himself, without authority." The court further found "that at the time of the execution of said agreement (sales deposit receipt or contract of sale dated March 16, 1923) by said Laack & Williams and said C. G. Becker, said C. G. Becker was not ready or able to purchase the said property by the payment of $40,000 cash therefor, and at no time or at all did C. G. Becker or George A. Eastman or anyone else ever agree to buy the said property for the sum of $40,000 cash and the assumption of a $60,000 mortgage thereon, or in accordance with the terms and conditions of the agreement (exclusive agency contract) marked Exhibit A. and attached to said complaint, and that said George A. Eastman at the time of the execution of said contract (of sale of March 16, 1923) above set out in hæc verba, was not able or ready to purchase said property by himself or in connection with said C. G. Becker, and said C. G. Becker would have been obliged to sell and dispose of certain securities before he would have been ready or able to purchase said property upon any terms whatsoever, and said George A. Eastman would have had to sell certain real property before he would have been ready or able to consummate said sale in accordance with the terms of the contract marked Exhibit A; [therefore] it is not true that said plaintiffs obtained as purchaser for said property any person who was ready or willing or able to carry out and perform the terms and conditions upon which said property could have been sold by said plaintiffs."

The findings of the court were such that judgment should have been entered in favor of the plaintiffs against both of the defendants for the full amount prayed for, except a necessary finding that Mrs. Lucile M. Dimmick was bound by the exclusive agency contract and a finding that the purchaser or purchasers were ready, willing, and able to buy upon the terms set forth in the contract of employment; and as to both of said matters we have set out above the findings of the court substantially in full.

Two questions are before us for consideration: First. Was the exclusive agency contract binding on defendant Lucile M. Dimmick, either by reason of ratification or by way of estoppel? Second. Was the purchaser whom plaintiffs obtained for the defendants able, ready, and willing to purchase the property on the terms for which defendants had authorized the plaintiffs to sell?

[1] In addition to the matters heretofore set out, there are other facts and circumstances in evidence bearing upon the question whether or not the exclusive agency contract was binding on Mrs. Dimmick. On March 29, 1923, she authorized her husband and her attorneys as her agents to tender to the plaintiffs a deed to the property which she herself had signed. On the afternoon of that date they tendered to one of the plaintiffs this deed, together with a certificate of title. And, upon his failure to produce $40,000 in cash forthwith, presumably out of a blue sky, they served upon him the following writing which Mrs. Dimmick had also signed for the purpose: "You are hereby notified that the exclusive agency contract executed by the undersigned Lucile Dimmick * * * to you, dated February 1st, 1923, * * * is hereby cancelled and revoked. [Signed] Frank M. Dimmick, [Signed] Lucile M. Dimmick." This was not a repudiation of the due execution of the exclusive agency contract, but a direct acknowledgment of it in writing. Furthermore, this acknowledgment, in the light of the tender of the deed which preceded it, was a ratification in writing of the contract down to the time of the revocation of it. Or if it be not a clear ratification in writing, then it is so nearly such that it will weigh heavily in the scales on the question of whether Mrs. Dimmick was estopped from denying the due execution of the contract. This we will next consider.

[2] It is the law of California that a ratification can be made only in the manner that would have been necessary to confer an original authority for the act ratified. Civ. Code, § 2310. Since the authority to sign Mrs. Dimmick's name to the contract was required to be in writing, it follows that, to be valid, a ratification of the contract must be in writing. Herein lies the chief distinction between an authority by ratification and an authority by estoppel. Such a writing is not required in an estoppel, even though the original authority required it. 1 Cal. Jur. 731. It has been said that the statute of frauds was intended as a shield and not as a sword. And courts will not permit a litigant to use that statute as an instrument with which to perpetrate fraud or oppression. It is on this theory largely that, although an act which requires written authority can be ratified only in writing, a party may be estopped to deny his agent's authority by acts without writing. Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 221, 41 P. 1017, 45 P. 252; Karns v. Olney, 80 Cal. 90, 22 P. 57, 13 Am. St. Rep. 101.

[3] In this case the brokers went ahead under the terms of their contract, assuming that it was entered into by authority of Mrs. Dimmick. They spent much time and money in finding a purchaser. They bound the purchaser in a written instrument to purchase the property, and took his money as a deposit on the purchase price. They sent $1,000 to Mr. and Mrs. Dimmick as a part of the purchase price, and defendants retained the same. Mrs. Dimmick signed a deed conveying the property to the purchaser, and insisted upon the payment of the balance of the purchase price forthwith. She acknowledged in writing the execution of the contract as binding upon her, and in the same writing revoked and canceled the same. She was not depending upon the statute of frauds at that time. Rather she was seeking a stealthier method of escape from performance on her part of a solemn covenant which had already been performed in full by the other parties to it. To permit her thereafter to escape by the avenue of the statute of frauds would be to permit the perpetration of a fraud. Our courts will not sanction such a procedure.

[4-7] Respondents contend that to properly establish either a ratification or an estoppel, the action of Mr. and Mrs. Dimmick must have been predicated upon a full understanding of the facts (citing Schader v. White, 173 Cal. 441, 160 P. 557; Civ. Code, § 2310; Munroe v. Fette, 1 Cal. App. 333, 82 P. 206, and other cases). It is the rule that a confirmation or ratification of the unauthorized acts of an agent, in order to be effectual and binding on the principal, must have been made with a full knowledge of all material facts, or its equivalent, and that ignorance, mistake, or misapprehension of any of the essential circumstances relating to the particular transaction alleged to have been ratified will absolve the principal from all liability by reason of any supposed adoption of or assent to the previously unauthorized acts of an agent. 1 Cal. Jur. 778, and cases cited; Munroe v. Fette, 1 Cal. App. 333, 82 P. 206. There are three answers to this contention: (a) When ratification is proved, the inference necessarily follows that it was with knowledge of the facts, and, if there was any mistake or misapprehension, that fact must be shown by the party who claims the mistake or misapprehension. 1 Cal. Jur. 778, and cases cited. (b) Mrs. Dimmick, as well as Mr. Dimmick, had full knowledge of all material facts. The check for $1,000 of March 16, 1923, with the reference on its face to the contract of sale to Becker was made payable to both the Dimmicks and was indorsed by both. The check came in a letter addressed to both defendants, advising both that the contract of sale was made by the authority given the plaintiffs in the exclusive agency contract, and that the terms of sale were those provided in that contract. Reference was also made in the letter to the check. It necessarily follows that the payees of the check knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known, the terms of the contract, in the absence, of course, of fraud or concealment, neither of which is supported by any substantial evidence. The evidence is to the contrary. Mrs. Dimmick admitted in her testimony a conversation with her husband on the evening of March 16, 1923, in which he showed her the letter and the check; and Mrs. Dimmick testified that he showed her a copy of the contract on that occasion, and also that a few days later and before the tender of the deed of March 29, 1923, he went over the letter with his wife. (c) The contract of sale entered into by the plaintiffs on behalf of the defendants complied with the terms of, and the authority vested in them by, the exclusive agency contract. There was no substantial difference in their terms, and therefore no mistake, inadvertence, or misapprehension on the part of the defendants. But this phase of the case will be more properly discussed in that part of the opinion which deals with the question whether the purchaser was able, ready, and willing to buy on the terms provided in the exclusive agency contract. And there is no substantial difference between the terms of sale as disclosed in the letter of March 16, 1923, and either or both of said instruments. Respondents have undertaken to set out these differences, and, as is our duty, we will discuss them. Respondents contend that they were not informed by the letter and should have known: (a) That the sale price was $107,250 instead of $100,000, as stated in the letter; (b) that George A. Eastman was an interested party; (c) that the sales deposit receipt constituted a mere option to buy, and was not in itself a binding agreement of sale; (d) that $2,500 was the amount received by plaintiffs upon account, and not $1,000; and (e) the injection of the prorating of insurance, rents, interest, and taxes. There is no merit in any of these contentions.

[8-13] (a) The letter did not state the sale price at $100,000, but "at a price of $100,000 net to you," which was the sum provided for in the exclusive sales contract. (b) While the letter did not state that Mr. Eastman was an interested party, the contract of employment provided for a contract of sale with "any purchaser." Furthermore, the contract of sale held by Mr. Becker was assignable to Mr. Eastman or to any one else without the consent of the defendants. Harris v. Miller, 196 Cal. 8, 235 P. 981; Kemp v. Enemark, 194 Cal. 748, 230 P. 441; Rued v. Cooper, 109 Cal. 682, 34 P. 98. And the assignment carries with it all of the rights of the assignor (25 Cal. Jur. 700), but in no wise releases the personal liability of the assignor to the vendor. And, while the mere assignment of such a contract does not cast upon the assignee any of the personal liabilities imposed by the contract on the assignor, it is otherwise if the assignee claims the benefits of performance. Wilson v. Beazley, 186 Cal. 437, 199 P. 772. And, where the assignee stands able, ready, and willing to perform, there remains no question as to personal liability. In the absence of some showing to the contrary, it will be presumed that the defendants in selling the property were interested in receiving the purchase price, not in the person or persons who would ultimately receive the title to the property. (c) The sales deposit receipt contained an indorsement, signed by the purchaser, by which he agreed to all the conditions therein contained. It was a binding agreement of sale and was not in any sense a mere option to buy. (d) The contract of employment provided that the commission, at the option of the agents, might be retained by them out of the moneys of the owner coming into their possession on account of the purchase price. (e) As to the prorating of the rents and interest, the law would have done the same. As to the prorating of the insurance and the taxes, these were details of the contract which were beneficial, not detrimental, to the defendants. Not to have prorated these items would have caused the defendants loss, and we cannot take seriously the defendants' claims that the doctrine of estoppel does not apply, because they were not informed as to these matters.

The question whether the purchaser whom the plaintiffs obtained for the defendants was able, ready, and willing to purchase the property on the terms for which defendants had authorized the plaintiffs to sell easily divides itself into two parts. (a) Was the purchaser able to buy the property; and (b) was he ready and willing to buy the property on the terms for which defendants had authorized the plaintiffs to sell?

[14-17] It is the contention of defendants that "under the circumstances of the instant case it is apparent that the purchaser must not only be ready at the time of his announced desire to purchase, but continue to be able to respond as and when the seller presents his deed and certificate of title." It seems to be the idea of defendants that, in order for a purchaser to be able to buy, he must have the purchase price on hand in the form of money or to his credit at a bank at the time of his announced desire to purchase the property, and continue to keep it ready to respond as and when the seller presents his deed and certificate of title. Even at the time of the tender of the deed, the defendant Dimmick spoke up and said: "You can't buy this property. You haven't got the $40,000 here today." Such is not the law in California. That "would be to lay down too drastic a rule governing business transactions of the kind presented." Russell v. Ramm, 200 Cal. 348, 254 P. 532. Few except bank messengers or crooks carry around with them so large a sum as $46,250. The true rule in the instant case may be stated as follows: The purchaser must be able to buy; and the word "able" means financially able. This does not mean, however, that such purchaser must have all the money in his immediate possession or to his credit at a bank, but only that he must be able to command the necessary funds to close the deal within the time required. Even where the purchaser was not personally able to buy, it was said that "it is sufficient if [he] has arranged so that these funds will be available for payment when the time comes to close the transaction, although part of it be obtained on the purchased property itself." Pellaton v. Brunski, 69 Cal. App. 301, 231 P. 583. It is much more clearly sufficient if the purchaser has assets of greater value than the purchase price and a financial rating which will enable him to command the funds when needed. For in such event the purchaser is not only able to purchase, but is able to respond in damages if he refuse to go ahead with the contract. Furthermore, the contract of sale provided that the balance of the purchase price was payable "within * * * days" from date upon the execution and delivery of a deed and a guaranty certificate of title showing title in the owner. Where a contract for the sale of realty does not fix the time for final payment, a reasonable time is allowed. McGibbon v. Schmidt, 172 Cal. 70, 75, 155 P. 460. Or, to state it in other words, the rule that a purchaser must be ready, willing, and able means, where no time is fixed in the contract, that he must be ready, willing, and able to carry out the purchase within a reasonable time. Bunyard v. Farman, 176 Mo. App. 89, 161 S. W. 640.

[18, 19] Measured by the rules above set forth, both Mr. Becker and Mr. Eastman under the evidence were able to purchase the property, and there was no evidence to the contrary. Mr. Becker testified that he could have paid the purchase price on the day the contract was signed upon presentation to him of the deed and certificate of title; that his ability to have met the purchase price would not necessarily have depended upon some one else lending him the money; he had mortgages and clear land; he could have sold his mortgages and he could have sold his land; Mr. Eastman had just sold property on Berendo street for $110,000; he (Becker) had personally sold over $10,000,000 worth of property, and it had always been agreed and understood that a man was to have time to effect title; he would not pay $40,000 or $50,000 over to some one whom he did not know anything about, or when he did not know whether the title was all right without going through escrow. Mr. Eastman testified that Mr. Becker told him prior to the assignment that the discount asked on his mortgages was so big that he did not wish to sacrifice, and asked him to carry the deal, which he agreed to do, and thereupon the written assignment was made; that on April 12th he deposited the $46,250 in escrow; that, if he had known on March 29th that a tender was to be made to him, it would probably have taken him a day or two to raise the money to close the deal, and in that case he would have taken steps to raise the money and could have used the other escrow (Berendo street) as collateral. It is the sole contention of respondents in this regard that, because Becker expressed an intention to "discount his securities in San Francisco," and because Eastman "had to sell some of his property or negotiate a loan," it is apparent that neither or both were able to pay $40,000 cash. But the cost or inconvenience to the purchaser of raising money is immaterial to the seller, provided the purchaser is able to command the money. Cases which seem to lay down a different doctrine are usually cases in which the purchaser has not assets sufficient to command the purchase price or cases where this distinction is not fully discerned.

[20] There is another reason why it was not necessary for the purchasers to have the cash on their persons at the very instant of the tender of the deed. This reason is best stated in the words of respondents' brief, which are in bold black type, as follows: "Tender of March 29, 1923, was in Effect a Repudiation of Laack & Williams' Claimed Right to Make Contract Disclosed by Sales Deposit Receipt." The repudiation of defendants at that time was not based on the inability of the purchasers to complete the purchase, but upon the precedent requisite—the right of the plaintiffs to make the contract of sale. Such repudiation rendered it unnecessary for the purchasers to tender the cash required to bind the sale. Merzoian v. Kludjian et al., 183 Cal. 422, 191 P. 673; 9 Corp. Jur. 600; Smith v. Tatum, 140 Ga. 719, 79 S. E. 775; McDermott v. Mahoney, 139 Iowa, 292, 115 N. W. 32, 116 N. W. 788; Fiske v. Soule, 87 Cal. 313, 25 P. 430.

[21] Were the purchasers ready and willing to purchase the property on the terms for which defendants had authorized the plaintiffs to sell? This is the final question for consideration. The readiness and willingness of a person to purchase is shown where he enters into a contract binding him to purchase. 4 Cal. Jur. 592, and cases cited. And it remains only to consider whether the terms of the sales deposit receipt were authorized by the exclusive agency contract.

[22] One of the contentions of respondents in this regard is stated as follows: "The brokers were hired to make a sale within thirty days, and not an agreement of sale, and if an agreement of sale was made, it was essential that the sale itself actually take place within the time limit of the contract." We have set out the terms of the contract regarding this matter in full in the early part of this opinion. The contract speaks plainly for itself. It does not so read.

Another contention of respondents is that "the contract executed by Laack & Williams was not authorized because the buyer was given a thirty-day option with many other advantages." But here again the contract of sale speaks for itself. It was not an option to buy, but a binding contract of sale. It was not for 30 days, but was a contract for cash payable within a reasonable time, as we have heretofore seen, the 30-day clause being a mere forfeiture clause against the purchaser declaring a dead line beyond which a reasonable time might not extend; and there were not many other advantages or any other advantages, as we have also seen.

[23-25] The final contention of respondents in this regard, and the one most relied upon, is this, that "a transfer through escrow was not contemplated by the agency agreement." This is the last trench to which respondents run for cover from the assaults which are hurled against the judgment of the trial court. By the exclusive agency contract, the plaintiffs were authorized to execute in behalf of the defendants an agreement of sale binding the owner to convey the property to the purchaser "and to furnish, without expense to the purchaser, a guarantee certificate of title showing title in the owner at the time of sale free and clear," etc. The fundamental difference between a sale and an agreement to sell is that in the former the title passes when the contract is made, while in the latter it does not pass until later. Rosenberg Bros. & Co. v. Beales, 56 Cal. App. 212, 205 P. 18; Blackwood v. Cutting, etc., Co., 76 Cal. 212, 18 P. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199. The contract of employment therefore contemplated that the plaintiffs would execute a contract of sale under the terms of which the title would pass at some future time upon the payment of the purchase price by one party and the delivery by the other of a deed and a certificate of title showing title in the owner at the time title passed from the owner to the purchaser. Obviously a certificate showing title at any instant prior to the time title passed would not be one showing title in the owner at the time of sale. Obviously also the payment of the money and the delivery of the deed and certificate of title were to be simultaneous. The only practical way, known to us, by which this could be done, was by recourse to an escrow. It is common knowledge that this is the general custom used in California for the completion of such contracts. Andrews v. Waldo (Cal. App.) 265 P. 532. Escrows are continually used in such transactions to insure safety and the exercise of good faith. The escrowee is the agent of both parties. Having in its possession both the purchase price and the deed, it (usually a title company or bank) selects an instant when it can determine that title is in the vendor as the terms of the contract require; thereupon it accepts a delivery of the deed to itself as agent for the vendee and records the same and as agent of the vendor receives the purchase price, at the same time in its dual capacity delivering and receiving the certificate of title. Strictly speaking, a certificate of title brought "down to date" is not a certificate of title "showing title in the owner at the time of sale," although the words are sometimes loosely used as synonymous. Only an instant is required to record an instrument affecting the title to real estate, by which the property might be, even the property in question might have been, heavily incumbered or sold outright to an innocent purchaser. Thus it is apparent that under the terms of the contract of employment an escrow was contemplated and the demand for an escrow was not a departure from the authorized terms of sale. For the same reasons the tender in the afternoon of March 29, 1923, of a certificate of title brought down to date was not such a tender as would put the purchaser in default. The custom of title companies in limiting their guaranties to 8:30 a. m. of the day the certificate is dated is so universal and so well known to every one dealing in real property in this state that this court will not assume to be ignorant of it.

[26] While the contract of employment made the positive statement that the property was owned by the wife and for that reason it was made in the name of the wife and signed by her husband as agent, yet it developed at the trial, and the court found the fact to be, that the property was owned by husband and wife in joint tenancy. To permit the husband to escape liability under the contract upon the theory that he was not a party to it, when his sole reason for attaching his wife's name to it and not his own as principal was the false one that his wife was the sole owner of the property, would be to permit the husband to profit by his own fraud. Our courts are not so inefficient nor so futile in their efforts to dispense justice between litigants that they would permit this. To do so would be not dispensing justice but dispensing with it.

The findings of fact of the trial court which have been quoted in this opinion within quotation marks are hereby set aside. This court finds that the exclusive agency contract, dated February 15, 1923, is binding on the defendant Lucile M. Dimmick, and that she is estopped to deny the authority of her husband to sign the contract for her. This court further finds that the plaintiffs found purchasers for the defendants who were able, ready, and willing to purchase the property on terms for which defendants had authorized the plaintiffs to sell, and the plaintiffs are entitled to their commission.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs against both defendants in the sum of $7,250, with interest from April 12, 1923.

Points made for first time on petition for rehearing will not be considered.

2. Appeal and error 🔑882(14)—Proponent, objecting to submitting question of execution of will to jury, could not complain on appeal that question was not submitted.

Where proponent objected during will contest to submitting question of execution of will with required formalities to jury, he could not complain on appeal that question was not submitted to jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

On petition for rehearing. Petition denied. For former opinion, see 271 P. 923.

Winslow P. Haytt, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hibbard & Kleindienst, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. [1] In his petition for a rehearing in this matter, the appellant argues that the court below assumed to decide matters that proponent was entitled to have determined by a jury. He asserts that, when the proponent has introduced sufficient testimony upon the question of the execution of a will with due formality to establish a prima facie case, the probate judge must submit the question of the due execution of the will to the jury. It would constitute a sufficient answer to appellant's contention to say that the point raised by him is now suggested for the first time. Not a word is said concerning the question in the briefs upon which the cause was submitted. "It has been repeatedly held that where a case has been decided, a rehearing will not be granted for the purpose of considering a suggestion of error made for the first time in the petition therefor," says 2 California Jurisprudence, at page 786. A number of authorities are cited to the point, from which we select only two: Prince v. Hill, 170 Cal. 192, 149 P. 578, and Estabrook Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 177 Cal. 767, 177 P. 848. In the latter of these precedents it is said: "It is the settled rule of this court that points made for the first time on petition for rehearing will not be considered."

[2] In addition to this rule, however, and if we were to pass upon the point, we should be obliged to call attention to the fact that it was appellant who objected during the contest to submitting the question of execution of the will with the formalities required by law to the jury. Upon the call of the contest, counsel for contestants asked leave to amend his pleading by denying the due execution of the will, asserting as his reason that he desired that issue to go to the jury. To this proposal the proponent and appellant interposed vigorous objections, on the ground that the due execution had not been made one of the grounds of contest, and insisted upon a continuance for further preparation if the court should permit the amendment. Finally, when it appeared that the court was about to grant proponent a continuance if he permitted the amendment, counsel for contestants decided to waive their request and the argument was terminated as follows:

"The Court: Now just one minute. It is understood that when we close the evidence on the contest that then the court will take up the matter of the proof as to the probate.

"Counsel for proponent: That will be very satisfactory, and that is what we expected."

Under this state of facts, appellant may not be heard to complain that the question was not submitted to the jury.

Petition for rehearing denied.

BAYER et al. v. HOAGLAND et al.† (Civ. 3641.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 12, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 11, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 7, 1929.

1. Mortgages 🔑386—Under special circumstances, suit may be brought to foreclose deed of trust.

Deed of trust in form of absolute conveyance to trustee to secure debt with power of sale upon default may be foreclosed in court of equity when some special reason exists, as where trustee fails or refuses to act, repudiates his trust, or is guilty of breach of trust.

2. Mortgages 🔑414—Where trustee denied that there had been default, demand and refusal were not conditions precedent, and it was immaterial that demand was not in writing.

In secured creditor's suit to foreclose deed of trust, where trustee's answer denied that there had been any default, demand on trustee to sell and refusal by him were not conditions precedent to right to sue, as demand would have been unavailing, and it was immaterial that demand was oral when deed provided for written demand.

3. Mortgages 🔑414—Where notice of default and election to sell had not been recorded, there was no failure or refusal by trustee which would authorize suit to foreclose (Civ. Code, § 2924).

Under Civ. Code, § 2924, prohibiting sale by trustee under deed of trust until after recording of notice of breach and election to sell, where trust deed provided that beneficiary should record such notice, until such notice was recorded, refusal of trustee to sell on demand was not such failure or refusal to carry out duties as authorized beneficiary to sue for foreclosure.

4. Mortgages 🔑386—Action to foreclose deed of trust as though it were a mortgage cannot be maintained, in absence of special facts.

Deed of trust to secure debt conveys the title and not a mere lien as does a mortgage, and, in absence of special features, cannot be foreclosed by action in equity as though it were a mortgage.

5. Mortgages 🔑446—Action to foreclose deed of trust cannot be maintained on allegation that it was intended as a mortgage (Code Civ. Proc. § 744).

Though under Code Civ. Proc. § 744, suit may be maintained to have absolute deed declared a mortgage on allegation that it was intended as such, allegation that deed of trust was intended as a mortgage will not warrant foreclosure in equity, the remedy being by way of reformation if instrument does not embrace true agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Otto Bayer and another against Mary Hoagland and others to foreclose deed of trust. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Max Schleimer, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

O'Melveny, Millikin, Tuller & Macneil and Arthur Crum, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought to foreclose a deed of trust. The trial court refused to permit plaintiff to introduce any evidence, upon the ground that the complaint did not state a cause of action. Plaintiff was given an opportunity to amend his complaint, but he did not do so, and judgment was entered for defendant. From this judgment the appeal is taken.

The complaint alleges the execution of a promissory note for $4,000, and a deed of trust for the payment of the same (a copy of each of said instruments is attached to the complaint); that plaintiffs had expended the sum of $27 for insurance upon the premises described in the trust deed, and that the trustees had refused to pay the same, as provided in said trust deed; that the trustors had failed to pay two installments of $38 each, due under the terms of the promissory note in connection with which the trust deed was executed; that that trust deed was intended, and agreed by the parties to be and operate simply as a first lien or a first mortgage upon said premises, and as security for the payment of the debt; that plaintiff had requested the trustee to foreclose said trust deed, in the nature of a first lien or a first mortgage, and to sell said real estate and apply the proceeds thereof in payment of the amount due plaintiffs, and said trustee refused to do so unless it was first paid the sum of $150 on account of its fees and disbursements; that plaintiffs elect that the balance of principal and interest be immediately due and payable. Judgment is prayed that said deed of trust be adjudged to operate simply as a first lien or mortgage and as security for the payment of the debt due plaintiffs; that a commissioner be appointed to sell the premises; and that defendants be foreclosed of all equity of redemption.

A number of points are urged by appellants, but the matter to be decided is whether or not the complaint stated a cause of action. The error must be predicated upon the ruling of the trial court that plaintiffs could not introduce any evidence in support and proof of the allegations of their complaint. This ruling was based upon the ground that the complaint did not state a cause of action.

It is not contended by appellant that the trust deed contains any unusual features or provisions, nor do we find that it does. We shall proceed upon the premise that said instrument is the usual form, to wit, a conveyance, absolute in form, to a trustee, for the purpose of securing a debt, with a power of sale upon default.

[1] There is no doubt that a deed of trust such as the one we have before us may be foreclosed where some special reason exists which will justify a court of equity in exercising its peculiar powers. Instances of this character are where there are accounts to be settled or where the trustee fails or refuses to act or repudiates his trust or is guilty of a breach of trust. Curtin v. Krohn, 4 Cal. App. 131, 87 P. 243. The cases of Smith v. Davis, 90 Cal. 25, 27 P. 26, 25 Am. St. Rep. 92, and Davies v. N. Y. Cercert Co., 41 Hun (N. Y.) 492, are of this character.

[2, 3] It is contended by appellant that the complaint does come within the foregoing rule, in that it is alleged that the trustee refused to sell the property upon his demand to do so. The parties stipulated at the trial that the said demand was oral. The trust deed provides that it shall be in writing. The answer, however, denies that there was any default under the deed of trust. Under such circumstances a demand to sell would have been unavailing, and a demand and refusal would not be a condition precedent to the right of plaintiff to commence the action. Cox v. Delmas, 99 Cal. 104, 33 P. 836. While it will thus be seen that the matter of the demand upon the trustee to proceed under the deed of trust becomes immaterial because of the position taken by it in the answer, we are inclined to the view that something more was required to be done by plaintiff before the trustee could be called upon to take any steps toward the sale of the property. The trust deed contains the following provision: "Four: Should a breach or default be made in the performance of any obligation for which this deed of trust is a security, then the holder or holders of any note or notes or indebtedness mentioned, as secured hereby, may declare all sums secured hereby immediately due and payable, and shall execute and deliver to the trustee, a written declaration of default hereunder and demand for sale, and shall thereafter record, in the office of the Recorder of the County wherein said property, or some part thereof, is situated, a notice of such breach, and of election to cause said property to be sold to satisfy said obligations." The plaintiffs stipulated in open court that they had recorded no notice of breach and of election to cause the property to be sold, as required by the terms of the trust deed upon which the action was brought, and, further, that they had made merely an oral demand upon the defendant bank, as trustee, and not a written demand, as required by said trust deed.

Section 2924 of the Civil Code provides:

"Where, by a mortgage created after July 27, 1917, of any estate in real property, other than an estate at will or for years, less than two, or in any transfer in trust made after July 27, 1917, of a like estate to secure the performance of an obligation, a power of sale is conferred upon the mortgagee, trustee, or any other person, to be exercised after a breach of the obligation for which such mortgage or transfer is a security, such power shall not be exercised, except where such mortgage or transfer is made pursuant to an order, judgment, or decree of a court of record, or to secure the payment of bonds or other evidences of indebtedness authorized or permitted to be issued by the commissioner of corporations, or is made by a public utility subject to the provisions of the public utilities act, until (a) the trustee, mortgagee or beneficiary shall first record, in the office of the recorder of the county wherein the mortgaged or trust property or some part thereof is situated, a notice of such breach and of his election to sell or cause to be sold such property to satisfy the obligation; (b) not less than three months shall thereafter elapse; and (c) the mortgagee, trustee or other person authorized to make the sale shall give notice of the time and place thereof, in the manner and for a time not less than that required by law for sales of real property upon execution."

The trust deed, as authorized by said section, provides that the holder of the note (i. e., the beneficiary) shall record the notice mentioned therein. The complaint is silent upon this point, while the answer sets up the failure of plaintiff to record said notice as a special defense. Until the said notice was recorded by plaintiff, the trustee was not called upon to take any action whatever in reference to the sale of the property under the power. There is, therefore, no showing that the trustee failed or refused to carry out and perform any duty imposed upon him by the instrument in question.

[4] We have before us, then, the bare proposition: Can a beneficiary, under an ordinary deed of trust, upon default on the part of the trustor, proceed in equity to foreclose that instrument in the same manner as though it were a mortgage? The nature of a deed of trust, and the distinction between it and a mortgage, were pointed out in the early case of Koch v. Briggs, 14 Cal. 256, 73 Am. Dec. 651, where the court, per Field, C. J., said:

"It [the trust deed] has no feature in common with a mortgage, except that it was executed to secure an indebtedness. * * * Where there is a mortgage there is a right, after condition broken, to a foreclosure on the part of the mortgagee, and a right of redemption on the part of the mortgagor. * * * These two rights are mutual and reciprocal. When the one cannot be enforced, the existence of the other is denied, and when either is wanting, the instrument, whatever its resemblance in other respects, is not a mortgage. In reference to the deed in question, no suit for a foreclosure, as in cases of mortgage in England, would lie, for there could be no forfeiture of the estate to enforce, and of course no equity as against such forfeiture to foreclose. Nor would a suit lie for a foreclosure under our system—that is, for a decree adjudging a sale of the premises and the application of the proceeds to the payment of the debt, as such suit could only be based upon the contract of the parties, and the contract here is only that, upon the happening of a certain event, the trustee shall sell. Equity could not adjudge a sale, as in case of a mortgage, without disregarding the express contract of the parties, and making a new and different one."

The foregoing decision has never been questioned in this state. It has been cited numerous times with approval. In the case of Kraft Co. v. Bryan, 140 Cal. 73, 73 P. 745, the reference is as follows:

"There are one or two other questions discussed by counsel which perhaps should be briefly noticed. One of these is as to the difference between a deed of trust and a mortgage. There are cases where the question was whether a certain particular instrument was a trust deed or a mortgage; but the instrument involved in the case at bar is a typical trust deed—running not to the creditor, but to a third party as trustee—such as the one passed on in the early case of Koch v. Briggs, 14 Cal. 256 [73 Am. Dec. 651]. It was held in that case that such a trust deed 'has no feature in common with a mortgage, except that it was executed to secure an indebtedness'; that on such an instrument a suit for a foreclosure and sale will not lie, for the contract of the parties is, that upon default the trustee should sell, and there is no equity of redemption to foreclose. This view of the nature of such a trust deed, and the difference between it and a mortgage, has not been departed from, and its validity as an instrument passing title, and not merely creating a lien as a mortgage to be foreclosed, has been constantly upheld. See Savings & Loan Society v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514 [39 P. 922], and the many cases there cited; Grant v. Burr, 54 Cal. 298."

It will be observed that in both of the foregoing cases it is held that foreclosure will not lie upon an ordinary deed of trust. Our appellate court has taken the same view in the case of Galusha v. Meserve, 58 Cal. App. 174, 208 P. 348, where it is stated:

"We are unable to agree with the contention of appellant that the trust deed was a mortgage, under which there could be no sale without foreclosure. The instrument is a typical trust deed, running not to the creditor but to a third party as trustee. 'It has no feature in common with a mortgage except that it was executed to secure an indebtedness.' On such an instrument a suit for foreclosure and sale will not lie, for the contract of the parties is that upon default the trustee shall sell, and there is no equity of redemption to foreclose. Koch v. Briggs, 14 Cal. 256, 73 Am. Dec. 651; Herbert Kraft Co. v. Bryan, 140 Cal. 73, 80, 73 P. 745." In the case of Kinard v. Kaelin, 22 Cal. App. 383, 134 P. 370, the court states: "Finally an attack is made upon the legality of deeds of trust. In this behalf it is urged that the power of sale usually granted in such instruments, and appearing in the deed of trust in controversy here, is voidable and legally nonavailable unless preceded by proceedings to foreclose as in the case of an out and out mortgage. In short, it is the plaintiffs' contention that the deed of trust in question must as a matter of law be construed and considered as a mortgage with all of the rights, incidents, and obligations thereof. Practically this same point was presented fourteen years ago in the case of Sacramento Bank v. Alcorn, 121 Cal. 379. 53 P. 813, and there finally and definitely decided adversely to the contention made by the plaintiffs here. The decision in that case has never been overruled, modified, or criticized. On the contrary it has since been continuously adhered to, and it stands today as the settled law of this jurisdiction." In the case of Grant v. Burr, 54 Cal. 298, the court said: "The instrument annexed to the complaint, and marked 'Exhibit D,' is a deed of trust, which authorizes the trustees therein named to sell and convey the lands described, upon default in the payment of the note or interest, and is not a mortgage requiring judicial foreclosure. Koch v. Briggs, 14 Cal. 256 [73 Am. Dec. 651]. The doctrine of Koch v. Briggs has never been overthrown by subsequent decisions."

We do not agree with appellant when he states that the case of Cormerais v. Genella, 22 Cal. 116, upholds his position. That case held that a mortgage with power of sale could be foreclosed in a court of equity, and that the power of sale is a cumulative remedy. The distinction lies in the fact that a mortgage with power of sale does not vest the title in a trustee, while under a trust deed the legal title actually passes to the trustee. Powell v. Patison, 100 Cal. 234, 34 P. 676, and cases cited, supra. Where a foreclosure is allowed in other jurisdictions, it will be found that a different view relating to the effect of deeds of trust prevails. In many they are construed as mortgages with power to convey, and nothing else, and foreclosure is permitted. The cases relied upon by appellant and arising in other states are all based upon the theory that a deed of trust creates a lien and does not actually pass title. Under those conditions the lien may be foreclosed, the remedy being cumulative. It is true that in this state a deed of trust has been loosely referred to as, in effect, a mortgage with power to sell. The Supreme Court has construed this language as follows:

"In Hodgkins v. Wright, 127 Cal. 688, 60 P. 431, in speaking of such deeds, and evidently intending to epitomize the above passage from Sacramento Bank v. Alcorn, to which reference is made, the court says: 'In effect, they are mortgages with power to sell.' The statement that they are in effect, or practically, mortgages with power to sell, means only that the practical result of the enforcement of either is the same; that is, the estate held by the mortgagor at the time of the execution of the mortgage, in one case, and that of the trustor at the time of the execution of the deed of trust, in the other case, are by the respective conveyances of the sheriff on foreclosure sale, and of the trustee on trustee's sale, transferred to the respective purchasers at such sales and that in the meantime the mortgagor and trustor, respectively, have the use and enjoyment of the property. All this is true, and yet the entire estate of the trustor, for the purposes of the trust, must during the intervening period be vested as an estate, and not as a lien, in the trustee, otherwise he could not legally convey it in execution of the trust." Weber v. McCleverty, 149 Cal. 316, 86 P. 706.

It is earnestly contended by appellant that what was said by the court in the Koch Case on the question of the foreclosure of a deed of trust was not necessary to the decision. That is a debatable question. Conceding that such matter was not authoritative, we believe we have shown that the doctrine laid down in said case has been ingrafted into our system of jurisprudence so many times by judicial interpretation that it is now a firmly established rule of property. It is, as we be lieve, a natural outcome of, and corollary to, the "title" theory as applied to deeds of trust in this state.

Appellant relies upon the case of Bell Silver & Copper Mining Co. v. First National Bank of Butte, 156 U. S. 475, 15 S. Ct. 440, 39 L. Ed. 497. The opinion in that case is by Justice Field, who also wrote the opinion in the case of Koch v. Briggs, supra. The former case arose in the territory of Montana. The defendant had executed an instrument purporting to convey title to its properties, to secure the payment of certain bonds. The grantees were certain parties called trustees. It was provided that upon default in performance on the part of the trustor, the trustees should proceed to sell the property and execute a deed to the purchaser. The bonds were not paid when due, and the trustees sold the properties to plaintiff in the action, who relied upon the deed obtained under said sale, in ejectment. It was contended by defendants that foreclosure proceedings in equity were required under the said instrument, and that the power of sale conferred upon the trustees was void under the statutes of Montana, which declared that a mortgage of real property should not be deemed a conveyance, whatever its terms, so as to enable the owner of the mortgage to recover possession of the real property without foreclosure and sale. (This statute is identical with California Code Civ. Proc. § 744.) Justice Field concluded that "there is nothing in the law of mortgages, nor in the law that covers what are sometimes designated as trust deeds in the nature of mortgages, which prevents the conferring by the grantor or mortgagor in such instrument of the power to sell the premises described therein upon default in payment of the debt secured by it, and if the sale is conducted in accordance with the terms of the power the title to the premises granted by way of security passes to the purchaser upon its consummation by a conveyance. Grant v. Burr, 54 Cal. 298; Bateman v. Burr, 57 Cal. 480." Throughout the whole opinion the instrument is referred to as a "mortgage or deed of trust." No attempt is made to differentiate the two. The instrument involved is treated in all respects as a mortgage with power of sale. While several quotations are made from the Koch Case, they all had to do with defining a mortgage. The definition of the nature of a deed of trust which is found in the California case was not touched upon, but studiously ignored. The "lien" theory of a deed of trust was adopted by Justice Field, while in this state we have adhered strictly to the "title" theory, with the entire estate of the trustor, for the purposes of the trust, vesting in the trustee, nor does it vest as a lien or incumbrance. Weber v. McCleverty, 149 Cal. 316, 86 P. 706. While it is true that in California we are confronted with the anomaly of applying by statutory enactment, the "lien" theory to mortgages, and by judicial construction, the "grant" theory to deeds of trust, the two theories have become and are, the settled law of property here, and titles innumerable have been built upon them. The arm of equity is invoked where mortgages are concerned, to preserve the lien of the mortgagee and enforce the same. This is the basis of the jurisdiction in equity coupled with solicitude for the mortgagor in preserving to him his equity of redemption. As to the deed of trust such as we have here, there is no lien, and equity has no concern and no jurisdiction, in the absence of special or extraordinary features which we have pointed out. This must necessarily follow by reason of the broad construction our courts have placed upon the nature of deeds of trust.

[5] Appellant urges that the allegation in the complaint that the deed of trust was intended as a mortgage would give the court jurisdiction to proceed and would come to his aid in stating a cause of action. He points out that a complaint setting up a deed with this allegation, states a cause of action, and that the same rule should apply to a deed of trust. No authorities are cited. We are unable to agree with this contention. In an action to have a deed declared a mortgage, there is an absolute conveyance of title, with no mention made of any indebtedness or security, and consequently, no right reserved in the grantor to a defeasance. In law the grantee is the owner in fee. Equity is appealed to, so that the deed may be proved to be only part of the transaction, and evidence aliunde may be introduced to show an agreement that the deed was intended merely by way of security, and that there was a defeasance. Such suits have been brought in this state under the provisions of section 744 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It has been held that said section does not apply to deeds of trust. Bateman v. Burr, 57 Cal. 480. Furthermore, the primary object of such suits is to establish a defeasance. In the instant case the copy of the trust deed attached to the complaint preserves, by analogy, the defeasance of the mortgage. It provides that upon payment of the indebtedness the trustee shall reconvey the estate granted. This is a condition defeating the title of the grantee. 18 C. J. 457. Under these circumstances equity will not interpose, as the terms of the instrument in question preclude it from doing so. If the terms of the instrument do not embrace the true agreement made by the parties, through mistake or fraud, a remedy by way of reformation might be available to appellant. No attempt is made to state such a cause of action.

The judgment is affirmed.

95 Cal. App. 452

GOLDBERG v. REMPP et al. (Civ. 5334.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 13, 1928.

1. Attachment 🔑344, 349—Issuance of execution was sufficient demand for redelivery, and allegation of issuance and return was sufficient allegation of demand.

In action on bond given to release property from attachment so conditioned as to require demand on principal for redelivery, issuance of execution was sufficient demand, and allegation that it was issued and returned unsatisfied was sufficient allegation of demand to sustain judgment on appeal.

2. Pleading 🔑129(2)—Denial of demand on surety on bond to release property from attachment without denial of refusal to pay judgment admitted such refusal.

In action against surety on bond to release property from attachment where complaint alleged demand for payment of judgment which was refused, answer denying demand but not denying refusal to pay was equivalent to admission of refusal to pay.

3. Appeal and error 🔑916(1)—Pleading 🔑129(1)—It is presumed on appeal that appellant has alleged case as favorably as possible, and failure to deny material averment is conclusive.

On appeal, it will be presumed that appellant in his pleading has stated his case as favorably to himself as the facts will justify, and failure to deny material averment is conclusive admission of its truth.

4. Attachment 🔑344—Refusal of surety to pay judgment waived demand and relieved plaintiff from making it.

Where surety on bond given to release property from attachment refused payment of the judgment recovered, such refusal was waiver of demand of payment and released plaintiff from necessity of making demand.

5. Attachment 🔑349—Denial of demand on surety for payment of judgment raises no issue when refusal to pay is admitted.

In action against surety on bond given to release property from attachment, where answer, by failing to deny, admitted refusal to pay judgment, denial of demand for payment raised no issue.

6. Attachment 🔑344—Where bond was joint and several, demand on one surety was not necessary to warrant judgment against another.

Where bond given to release property from attachment was a joint and several bond, demand for payment on other sureties was not necessary to support judgment against particular surety.

7. Appeal and error 🔑917(1)—On appeal from judgment after refusal to amend, every possible intendment and presumption is indulged.

On appeal from judgment rendered after refusal to amend pleading to which demurrer has been sustained, every intendment and presumption not contradicted by or inconsistent with record must be indulged in favor of judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliott Craig, Judge.

Action by Nathan Goldberg against A. Rempp and others on a bond given to release property from attachment. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant Thelma H. Davis appeals. Affirmed.

L. E. Dadmun, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Nathan Goldberg and Burnett Wolfson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIL, Justice pro tem. This is an action upon a joint and several bond given to release certain property from an attachment. The conditions of the undertaking were such that in order to maintain the action against appellant it was necessary for the plaintiff to demand of the principal in the bond the redelivery of the attached property and to demand of the sureties the payment of the amount of the judgment in the original action. It was necessary also to allege such demands.

[1] In lieu of an allegation of the demand for the redelivery of the property the plaintiff alleged: "That on the 5th day of March, 1925, an execution was issued the sheriff of said Los Angeles County, against the property of the said A. Rempp (the principal) under said judgment, but that the sheriff made return on the 6th day of June, 1925, that no property was found and that writ of execution is wholly unsatisfied."

The facts as stated constitute a sufficient demand for the redelivery of the attached property. Hammond v. Starr, 79 Cal. 556, 21 P. 971; 3 Cal. Jur. p. 520. And the allegation of the facts was a sufficient allegation of the demand for the purpose of sustaining the judgment on appeal. No stereotyped form of allegation of demand is necessary. Mullally v. Townsend, 119 Cal. 51, 50 P. 1066. It follows that the court's order overruling appellant's demurrer to the complaint, based on the failure to allege such demand, will not be disturbed.

The allegation of the complaint with reference to the demand on the sureties is as follows: "That on the 5th day of July, 1925. the plaintiff demanded of the defendants herein (including the sureties) the payment of said judgment, which was by each and all of them refused."

After the demurrer to the complaint was overruled, the appellant filed an answer denying on information and belief certain parts of plaintiff's complaint containing matters of public record. The answer also contained the following denial: "Denies that on the 5th day of July, or any other time, plaintiff demanded of said defendant, Thelma H. Davis, the payment of said judgment." But she did not deny the remainder of plaintiff's allegation, to wit, "which was by each and all of them refused." To this answer the plaintiff interposed a general demurrer. The demurrer was sustained and defendant was given 10 days to amend, which defendant declined to do. Thereafter default was entered, and judgment rendered against the defendants. Appellant's second and last contention is that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the answer.

[2, 3] Coupled with the allegation of demand on the sureties in plaintiff's complaint it was necessary to allege the refusal to pay; otherwise, it could not be determined that the demand had not been complied with. Thus the refusal to pay was a material allegation of the complaint. The failure to deny the allegation that payment "was by each and all of them refused" was equivalent to an admission that appellant refused to pay. For upon appeal it will be presumed that appellant in his pleading has stated his case as favorably for his side of the controversy as the facts will justify, and the failure to deny a material averment in a complaint is an admission of the truth of the fact stated, which is conclusive against the pleader. 21 Cal. Jur., sec. 29, p. 51, and sec. 106, p. 155; Code Civ. Proc. § 462.

[4] Since appellant admits in her answer that she refused to pay the judgment, a demand would have been useless and the law does not require the performance of a useless act. Northern Light Min. Co. v. Blue Goose Co., 25 Cal. App. 282, 288, 143 P. 540; Cox v. Delmas, 99 Cal. 104, 33 P. 836; Smith v. Dorn, 96 Cal. 73, 30 P. 1024. If one refuses to pay without a demand, this is a waiver of demand, an act that releases the plaintiff from the necessity of making one. Ferguson v. Hull, 136 Ind. 339, 348, 36 N. E. 254.

The legitimate object of a demand is to enable a party to perform without a suit at law. Mullally v. Townsend, 119 Cal. 47, 50 P. 1066. It is sometimes unjust and inequitable to subject a defendant to litigation without first notifying him of plaintiff's claim. Cox v. Delmas, 99 Cal. 104, 33 P. 836. But where the defendant has refused to pay, the defense of want of demand becomes a technical one; and it has been held that where it is plain from the answer that if a demand had been made it would have been refused, it does not lie in the mouth of an appellant to object that no demand was made. Turton v. Shinn, 32 Cal. App. 751, 164 P. 38; Ashton v. Dashaway Association, 84 Cal. 61, 22 P. 660, 23 P. 1091, 7 L. R. A. 809; Parrott v. Byers, 40 Cal. 614.

[5] It is equally true that where it is plain from the answer that a demand has been waived, a denial of demand will not raise an issue and will not constitute facts sufficient to raise a defense.

[6] There was also a denial in the answer, based on information and belief, that demand was made on the other defendants. But the bond was a joint and several bond; and for the purposes of a judgment against appellant, no demand for payment upon them was necessary. Ward v. Massachusetts B. & I. Co., 57 Cal. App. 623, 208 P. 188; 3 Cal. Jur. p. 519.

[7] The demurrer was properly sustained. Appellant should have availed herself of the opportunity which the trial court gave her to plead. Upon appeal from a judgment rendered after refusal to amend a pleading to which a demurrer has been sustained, every intendment and presumption not contradicted by or inconsistent with the record on appeal must be indulged in favor of the judgment of the trial court. 2 Cal. Jur. p. 852, and cases cited.

The judgment is affirmed.

WOLFE et al. v. MORGAN et al. (Civ. 5898.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 21, 1928.

1. Reformation of instruments ⚷16—Right to reform contract lies when contract does not express parties' intention either because of fraud or mistake (Civ. Code, § 3399).

Right to reform contract under Civ. Code, § 3399, applies when a written contract does not truly express the intention of the parties either because of fraud or mistake.

2. Reformation of instruments ⚷16—Whether misrepresentation inducing signature to contract is result of fraud or mistake is immaterial as regards right to reformation.

As regards right to reform contract, when a party is induced to sign through a misrepresentation as to the meaning and effect of a writing, it is immaterial whether the representation is a result of fraud or mistake, since the concern of equity is to make the contract express parties' true intention.

3. Reformation of instruments ⚷11—Purchasers held entitled to reform purchase contract to include vendor's agreement to pay assessments for street improvements either on theory of fraud or mutual mistake (Civ. Code, § 3399).

Purchasers held entitled to reformation of contract for purchase of lot to conform to representations of vendor's agent that vendor would pay for cost of street improvement then contemplated by city, since if agent's representations were fraudulent, vendor was chargeable therewith and reformation would be justified, but if representations were not fraudulent, failure to provide in contract for payment of improvements was a mutual mistake authorizing reformation under Civ. Code, § 3399.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by A. D. Wolfe and another against Carrie M. Morgan and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ward & Hutchinson, of Oakland, for appellants.

Chaplin & Jones, of Oakland (W. W. Laidley, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs sued for the reformation of a written contract for the purchase of a lot of real property. They had judgment and the defendant has appealed on a typewritten record.

The contract was executed by respondents and the agents of appellant, who had theretofore been authorized in writing by appellant to execute such contracts with purchasers of lots owned by appellant and placed in the hands of her agents for sale. As an inducement for the sale these agents assured respondents that the cost of street improvements then contemplated and proposed by the city had been or would be paid for by the owner (appellant) and that the purchasers would be required to meet the cost of future assessments for future street improvements. The contract between respondents and appellants' agents merely provided that "said buyer shall pay all assessments which may be levied on the premises." The theory of the complaint is that, through the mistake of the parties, the contract failed to express their real intention, and the respondents prayed that it be reformed accordingly.

On October 10, 1922, appellant entered into a written contract of employment with her agents for the subdivision and sale of a tract of land which was conditional upon appellants securing a loan in the sum of $6,900 to defray expenses to be incurred by her agents, included in which was the cost of the street improvements which is the basis of this controversy. Paragraph 7 of this contract provided that of this loan "4000 should be available when needed to pay the cost of the improvement now pending to the portion of Peralta Avenue adjoining the said property." Paragraph 4 of this contract provided that all contracts of sale of the lots should obligate the purchaser to pay all "assessments of every kind thereafter levied or thereafter becoming a lien" upon the lot sold. Paragraph 8 of this contract provides that it is "understood and agreed * * * that in the event * * * the payment of the cost by the party of the first part of the improvement of Peralta Avenue, shall exceed the said sum of $6900, then any excess cost, plus the cost of any sewer improvements and of any and all other improvements" shall be added to the price of the lots in such manner as the contracting parties should agree. Before any lots were offered for sale the appellant and her agent discussed the cost of the street work then pending on Peralta avenue and other contemplated improvements, and fixed the sale price of each lot accordingly.

[1-3] On this appeal the appellant has designated 16 specifications of error, no one of which has a shadow of merit. The only issue in the case is whether a written contract may be reformed to express the true intention of the parties when the mistake of one party has occurred through oral representations of the agent of the other. It seems to be the theory of appellant that, because the purchasers called particular attention to the clause in the contract relating to payment of assessments and objected to it until assured by appellants' agents that it referred to future assessments only, there is no mistake in the contract which would support an action to have it reformed. The right of action is statutory. Section 3399, Civ. Code. It lies when a written contract does not truly express the intention of the parties either because of fraud or mistake. When a party is induced to sign through a misrepresentation as to the meaning and effect of the writing, it is immaterial whether the misrepresentation is the result of fraud or mistake. The concern of the court of equity is to make the contract express the true intention of the parties. If the agent's representations that the cost of the Peralta avenue improvements had been paid by the owner were false or fraudulent, the fraud goes back to the appellant because of the express terms of her contract with the agent, and the respondents were entitled to have the contract reformed, because of the fraud. On the other hand, if these representations were neither false nor fraudulent, and the appellant herein intended to obligate herself to pay for the Peralta avenue improvement, the failure to so provide in the contract was a mutual mistake of the parties, which would warrant a reformation of the contract under the Code section.

For the reasons given the judgment must be affirmed, and it would serve no purpose to discuss the other points raised. In the main they are based on the false premise that the agency contract did not cover the matter of the payment of the cost of the Peralta avenue improvement and that the agent's representations relating thereto were unauthorized by the appellant.

Judgment affirmed.

TISCHHAUSER v. JARVIS. (Civ. 6483.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 17, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 15, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 14, 1929.

1. Contracts 🔑108(2)—Agreement to indemnify surety on bail bond is not against public policy.

An agreement to indemnify a surety on a bail bond is not against public policy.

2. Contracts 🔑108(2)—Agreement permitting surety on bail bond to employ attorney to represent accused and enter guilty plea without accused's knowledge violates public policy.

Provision in contract to indemnify surety on bail bond, permitting surety's employment of an attorney to represent accused in substitution of his own attorney and to appear in accused's absence and enter a plea of guilty without accused's knowledge, and authorizing attorney so employed by surety to plead accused guilty to any other offense carrying a less or the same penalty as that prescribed for offense with which he is charged, is against public policy.

3. Criminal law 🔑641(1)—Absconding accused ceased to be in court's actual or constructive custody, and could not appear by own counsel or by counsel employed by surety on bail bond.

Where accused had absconded he ceased to be in actual or constructive custody of court, and had no authority to appear either by his own counsel or by counsel substituted for him by surety on his bail bond, at least not until he surrendered to the actual or constructive custody of the court.

4. Principal and surety 🔑175—Expenses of surety on bail bond in searching for accused were voluntary and not recoverable from surety's indemnitor without express agreement.

Where agreement in which defendant contracted to indemnify surety on accused's bail bond contained no express provision to indemnify surety for expense incurred for services of detectives, traveling expenses, and long distance telephone tolls in searching for accused, who had absconded, such payments, if made by surety, were purely voluntary and could not be recovered from defendant indemnitor.

5. Principal and surety 🔑175—On forfeiture of bail bonds there was no further obligation on surety's indemnitor to pay premiums or service fees, without allegation or showing additional sums were due.

After bail bonds were forfeited when accused absconded, there was no further obligation on one who agreed to indemnify surety on bail bond to pay premiums or service fees, and, in absence of allegation in surety's complaint against indemnitor or anything in record showing additional sums due therefor, it must be presumed that no such additional payments were owing, since every presumption not contradicted by or inconsistent with record on appeal must be indulged in favor of judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Charles R. Barnard, Judge.

Action by E. A. Tischhauser against Leo Jarvis. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court: PRESTON, J., dissenting.

Samuel F. Hollins, of Fresno, for appellant.

B. M. Benson, of Fresno, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant, the action being one instituted by plaintiff against defendant on an alleged agreement to indemnify plaintiff and the New Amsterdam Casualty Company of New York against loss suffered in executing a bail bond to secure the appearance of one Henry Simon before the justice court of the fourth township of Fresno county, wherein Henry Simon was charged with "manufacturing intoxicating liquor" and "possessing apparatus for the manufacturing of intoxicating liquor," and who failed to appear for preliminary examination on the former and trial on the latter charge.

The second amended complaint alleges that one Henry Simon was arrested under a complaint charging him with the manufacture of intoxicating liquor, also under another complaint charging him with possessing apparatus for the manufacture of intoxicating liquor, and that he was admitted to bail in the sum of $750 under the first charge and in the sum of $250 under the second charge; that for the purpose of securing the release of Henry Simon the defendant Leo Jarvis and Henry Simon executed and delivered to this plaintiff, E. A. Tischhauser, a certain indemnity agreement, "a true copy of which said application and agreement is hereto attached and marked 'Exhibit A' and is hereby referred to and made a part hereof," wherein Leo Jarvis and Henry Simon agreed to indemnify plaintiff against all claims, demands, loss, expenses or damage which he might incur, or for which he might become liable by reason of the execution by the New Amsterdam Company of New York of such undertaking of bail; that pursuant to the application and indemnity agreement this plaintiff caused the New Amsterdam Casualty Company of New York to make, execute and acknowledge before the said justice court its undertaking of bail in the sum of $750, and that thereupon the said Simon was discharged from custody. It is further alleged that he was admitted to bail on the second charge, and thereupon the New Amsterdam Casualty Company of New York made, executed, and acknowledged before the justice its undertaking of bail in the sum of $250, and that thereupon Simon was discharged from custody; that at the time set for the hearing

Simon failed to appear and the bail was declared forfeited. The complaint then alleges the expenditure by the plaintiff of the sum of $574.80 in an effort to find Simon and produce him for trial, but that he was unable to find him; that thereafter he, the plaintiff, "appointed an attorney to represent the said Henry Simon; that said attorney caused to be entered on behalf of said Simon a plea of guilty to said charge of possessing apparatus for the manufacture of intoxicating liquor, and the court thereupon sentenced the said Simon to pay a fine of $100.00, which the plaintiff then and there paid; that by reason of the payment of the said fine the said attorney obtained from the said court a dismissal of the charge of manufacturing intoxicating liquor and an order revoking the forfeiture of the said bonds and exonerating the said bail; that plaintiff paid to the said attorney for his services the sum of $5.00, which said sum was a reasonable fee for said services."

"Exhibit A" attached to the second amended complaint contains the following provisions: "The undersigned jointly and severally covenant and agree to at all times indemnify and keep indemnified and save and hold the company and E. A. Tischhauser, or either of them, harmless from and against any and all claims, demands, loss, expenses or damages which they may sustain or incur, or for which they may have become liable by reason of the execution by them of said bond or undertaking, and to make good and reimburse to the company and E. A. Tischhauser all sums of money, which they, or either of them, may pay or become liable to pay in consequence thereof, including counsel and attorneys fees incurred or paid by them. It is understood and agreed and it is hereby made a condition and a part of the consideration hereof that for the purposes of this application and indemnity agreement, and of the undertaking of the undersigned to indemnify and save harmless the company and E. A. Tischhauser, or either of them, liability for claims, demands, loss, expenses or damages, shall be considered to attach to or be incurred by the company and E. A. Tischhauser, or either of them, as soon as the bail or surety bond, or either of them, herein referred to, shall have been declared forfeited by the court having jurisdiction of said cause or matter. * * * The undersigned hereby makes, constitutes and appoints any attorney at law admitted to practice in the courts of the State of California, who is selected by the New Amsterdam Casualty Company of New York or by E. A. Tischhauser, to legally represent me in substitution of my Attorney or Attorney of Record, and, if the charge be, or be reduced to a misdemeanor, to appear and go to trial in my absence, or to appear and enter a plea of guilty to the offense with which I am charged, or to any other offense included therein or to any other offense which carries as a sentence therein less or the same penalty as is prescribed for the offense or offenses with which I am now charged." etc. The prayer of the complaint is for $814.80, made up of the following items: $135 balance due as premium on bonds; $514.80 money expended in searching for Simon; $100 fine paid by the casualty company; and $5 attorney's fee.

Defendant filed a demurrer, assigning numerous reasons why the second amended complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer being overruled, defendant answered admitting the allegations of the complaint with the exception of the allegations as to the money spent in prosecuting search for Simon; the services of detectives, traveling expenses and long distance telephone calls; the appointment of an attorney to represent Simon and the payment of the fine—all of which are denied on information and belief.

When the case was called for trial the defendant objected to the introduction of any evidence on the ground that the complaint failed to state a cause of action against the defendant upon several specific grounds. The court sustained the objection and entered judgment for defendant, and from which judgment plaintiff has appealed.

[1-3] We agree with appellant that an agreement to indemnify a surety on a bail bond is not against public policy, but we are not in accord with his claim that public policy sanctions that clause in the contract of indemnity which permits the employment by the surety of an attorney to represent the defendant in substitution of his own attorney and to appear in the defendant's absence and enter a plea of guilty without the knowledge of the defendant, and which authorizes the attorney so employed by the surety to plead the defendant guilty to any other offense which carries as a sentence less or the same penalty as that prescribed for the offense with which he is charged. Such a contract permits the surety to dicker, deal and traffic with the court in order to minimize the loss which the bondsman or surety might suffer. According to the allegations of the complaint, Simon, the defendant in the criminal action, had absconded, and therefore ceased to be in the actual or constructive custody of the court. As was said in People v. Redinger, 55 Cal. 290, 36 Am. Rep. 32, in which case the court dismissed an appeal because the defendant was a fugitive:

"It would be a farce to proceed in a criminal cause, unless the court had control over the person charged, so that its judgment might be made effective. It is true that an indictment may be found against one not in custody, but steps are directed to be taken in such case to secure his person. Pen. Code, §§ 945, 979–984. And unless an arrest is effected, the cause can proceed no further. The defendant is arraigned in person, and pleads in person (section 977, Pen. Code) unless in case of misdemeanor (Id.). Every plea must be oral. Pen. Code, § 1017. By section 1253 of the Penal Code, it is provided, as to criminal causes, that 'the judgment may be affirmed if the appellant fail to appear, but can be reversed only after argument, though the respondent fail to appear'; and by section 1255, that 'the defendant need not personally appear in the appellate court.' It may be urged that, inasmuch as the defendant need not personally appear in the Appellate Court (section 1255, Pen. Code, ut supra), he has a right to appear by counsel, whether he is in custody or not. For the reasons here given, sustained by the cases cited, we think the defendant has no longer a right to appear by counsel, when he has escaped from custody, until he has returned into custody. By breaking jail and escaping, he had waived the right to have counsel appear for him. Commonw. v. Andrews, 97 Mass. [543] ut supra. In fact, his right to constitute counsel and invest him with authority no longer exists while his absence from custody continues."

In Smith v. United States, 94 U. S. 97, 24 L. Ed. 32, the court says:

"In this case it is admitted that the plaintiff in error has escaped, and is not within the control of the court below, either actually, by being in custody, or constructively, by being out on bail. If we affirm the judgment, he is not likely to appear to submit to his sentence. If we reverse it and order a new trial, he will appear or not, as he may consider most for his interest. Under such circumstances, we are not inclined to hear and decide what may prove to be only a moot case."

There is not any difference in principle between a defendant appearing by counsel in an appellate court in his absence and a defendant appearing by counsel in a justice court in his absence, both being permitted by the Penal Code; nor is there any distinction between the right of a defendant who has escaped and is no longer in actual custody to appear by counsel and a defendant who has "jumped his bail" and is no longer in constructive custody. It therefore follows that the defendant in the criminal case here, having placed himself without the constructive custody of the court, had no authority to appear either by his own counsel or by counsel substituted for him—at least not until he had surrendered to the actual or constructive custody of the court.

[4] We agree with appellant that where the consideration for a contract is valid and such contract has several distinct objects of which some are lawful and others unlawful, the contract is valid as to the lawful objects. Civ. Code, § 1599; Hedges v. Frink, 174 Cal. 552, 163 P. 884; Mack v. Jastro, 126 Cal. 130, 58 P. 372; McCahan v. McCahan, 47 Cal. App. 176, 190 P. 460. Here, however, there is no provision in the contract authorizing plaintiff to institute search for Simon or agreeing to reimburse him for money so expended. "It is elementary that a guarantor cannot be liable beyond the express terms of the contract of guaranty. San Francisco Theological Seminary v. Monterey Co. Gas & Electric Co., 179 Cal. 166, 175 P. 693. A surety has all the rights of a guarantor (Civ. Code, § 2844), and cannot be held beyond the express terms of his contract." Murphy v. Hellman Commercial, etc., Bank, 43 Cal. App. 587, 185 P. 489. "There is no escape from the principle declared in the sections of the Civil Code, above cited [sections 2819, 2840, 2844], that sureties have the right to stand upon the very terms of their contract." Michelin Tire Co. v. Bentel, 184 Cal. 321, 193 P. 773. There being no express provision in the contract under which defendant agreed to indemnify plaintiff for the expense incurred for services of detectives, traveling expenses and long-distance telephone tolls, such payments, if so made by plaintiff, were purely voluntary and cannot be recovered.

[5] As to the item of $135 alleged to be due and owing on account of premiums and service fees and which are alleged to have been paid by plaintiff, it may be said that we are unable to determine from the record whether any amount is unpaid or when the bonds were declared forfeited. The application for the bond was made on June 24, 1926, and on June 28, 1926, Simon was arraigned and released from custody, the defendant having paid the first annual premium and first semiannual service fee, which latter sum he agreed to continue to pay every six months and the premium annually until the company and Tischhauser should be discharged from liability—that is, during the life of the bond. Then follows an allegation that the time for trial on one charge and the preliminary examination on the other were regularly fixed by the court, but Simon failed to appear and the bonds were declared forfeited. Of course after the bonds were forfeited there was no further obligation on defendant to pay the annual premiums or the semiannual service fees. It is unlikely that the misdemeanor trial and the preliminary examination were set by the justice of the peace later than six months following the arraignment, at which time the bonds were declared forfeited, and, if not, no further sum as premium or service fee is due and owing according to the contract. In the absence of any allegation in the complaint or anything in the record showing additional sums due as annual premiums or semiannual service fees, it will be presumed that no such additional payments are due or owing, as "every intendment and presumption not contradicted by or inconsistent with the record on appeal must be indulged in favor of the orders and judgments of the superior court." 2 Cal. Jur. 852; Finkelstein v. Cosgrove, 83 Cal. App. 203, 256 P. 609.

The judgment is affirmed.

BALTHES v. BOGIGIAN et al. (Civ. 6484.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 24, 1928.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing, Jan. 23, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 21, 1929.

Banks and banking 🔑154(8)—Evidence sustained finding that money deposited with bank holding mortgage on fig crop was only for application on purchase price of figs.

Evidence held to sustain finding that money was deposited with bank only for application on purchase price of figs at certain specified rate per ton, and not otherwise, so that bank was not authorized, after repudiation of contract, to apply deposit on chattel mortgage which it held on the fig crop.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Gustaf A. Balthes against Lusentak B. Bogigian and the First National Bank in Fresno on a written contract of sale of figs. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant bank appeals. Affirmed.

Cosgrave & Barstow, of Fresno, for appellant.

Lindsay & Gearhart, of Fresno, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to recover $1,000 paid by her into the defendant bank in connection with a written contract between plaintiff and defendant Bogigian for the sale of a quantity of figs. Plaintiff had judgment against the bank for $862.50, and against Bogigian for $137.50. The bank alone has appealed from the judgment on a typewritten transcript under section 953a et seq., Code of Civil Procedure.

The contract called for the sale to the plaintiff of the entire 1925 crop of figs grown on Bogigian's land at a stipulated price and provided that, upon the execution of the contract, the plaintiff should pay to the defendant bank the sum of $1,000, "which sum shall be applied to the purchase price as follows: The second party (Balthes) shall pay on each ton $50.00 less than the amount owing under this contract until the said deposit is exhausted, that is to say, the deposit shall be applied to the purchase price at the rate of $50.00 per ton."

The first delivery of figs under the contract was quarantined as unfit, and the defendant Bogigian thereupon repudiated the contract and refused to make any further deliveries. The plaintiff then notified the bank of the breach by Bogigian and demanded the return of the deposit. The bank applied the deposit upon a chattel mortgage on the fig crop which it held against the defendant Bogigian.

The trial court found that the bank received the money in order that it might be applied to the purchase price of the figs at the rate of $50 per ton and not otherwise. On this appeal the bank contends that this finding is not supported by the evidence. The contract itself discloses that the payment was intended merely as a deposit to be applied to the purchase price on delivery, of each ton of figs at the rate of $50 per ton, and this agreement was made with the full knowledge and consent of the bank. No evidence is cited tending to show that there was any uncertainty in the intention of the parties as expressed in this contract or that there was any misunderstanding on the part of the bank of its position in the transaction.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re CASSIDY'S GUARDIANSHIP.

LERIGER v. CASSIDY.

(Civ. 5998.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 21, 1928.

1. Insane persons 🔑12—Petition for appointment of guardian sufficiently alleged mental incompetency to give court jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1763, 1764, 1767).

Petition for appointment of guardian of incompetent person, alleging that by reason of old age and weakness of mind such person was unable to properly manage himself and property and was likely to be deceived by designing persons, held sufficient to give court jurisdiction to appoint guardian and sufficiently to allege mental incompetency of such person to manage property as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1763, considered in connection with sections 1764 and 1767, though petition did not specifically allege incompetent was insane or mentally incompetent to manage property.

2. Insane persons 🔑30—Guardian may be appointed when mental weakness exists making incompetent easy prey for designing persons, it being unnecessary to wait until loss occurs (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1763, 1764, 1767).

In proceeding for appointment of guardian for incompetent person, it is not necessary to wait until actual loss or damage has been suffered before provisions of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1763, 1764, 1767, are invoked, but it is sufficient if mental weakness exists which makes such person easy prey for designing persons.

3. Insane persons 🔑33(1)—Evidence of alleged incompetent's willingness to enter into strange business and inability to understand transactions supported finding for appointment of guardian.

In proceeding for appointment of guardian over alleged incompetent person, evidence of willingness of incompetent to accept statement of others and rely on their promises of big money in building business in which incompetent was not experienced, and testimony that incompetent was unable to understand various business and general transactions and was unable to carry on complete conversation, held sufficient to support finding that guardian should be appointed.

4. Insane persons 🔑34—Stepdaughter held under no statutory disability to act as guardian of stepfather.

Stepdaughter held under no statutory disability of disqualification to act as guardian of stepfather.

5. Insane persons 🔑34—Court has broad discretion in appointment of guardian.

Court has broad discretion in appointment of guardian.

6. Insane persons 🔑34—Stepdaughter shown to be proper person held not disqualified from being guardian of stepfather because she was guardian of estate of her mother (Code Civ. Proc. § 1763).

Stepdaughter held not disqualified under Code Civ. Proc. § 1763, from being appointed guardian of stepfather because she was also guardian of estate of her mother, under evidence showing she was proper person familiar with affairs of stepfather and his wife and was possessed of ordinary business ability.

7. Insane persons 🔑34—Selection of person as guardian for incompetent is within discretion of court, not required to give any weight to wishes of ward.

Court has authority to select proper person as guardian for incompetent, and selection of person is within its discretion, court not being required to give any weight to wishes of ward.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Petition by Helen Leriger for appointment as guardian of Andrew Cassidy and wife, incompetent persons. From an order appointing the petitioner as guardian, Andrew Cassidy appeals. Affirmed.

James F. Sheehan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Jordan L. Martinelli, of San Rafael, for respondent.

BARNARD, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from an order appointing Helen Leriger as guardian of the person and estate of her stepfather, Andrew Cassidy. The petition of the respondent stepdaughter seeks the appointment of herself as guardian of the persons and estates of both her mother, Catherine Cassidy, and her stepfather, Andrew Cassidy, who are husband and wife, and each alleged to be 73 years of age. The petition alleges: "That both said Andrew Cassidy and Catherine Cassidy, his wife, by reason of old age and weakness of mind are and each is unable, unassisted, to properly manage and take care of himself or herself and of their respective property, and by reason thereof they are each likely to be deceived or imposed upon by artful or designing persons." (Italics ours.) In his answer the appellant denies all the allegations of the petition going to show the necessity for the appointment of a guardian, and in addition requests the court, in the event a guardian is held to be necessary, to appoint the Crocker First Federal Trust Company of San Francisco as such guardian, in lieu of respondent. Respondent was appointed guardian of the persons and estates of both Andrew Cassidy and Catherine Cassidy, but Andrew Cassidy alone appeals.

The trial court, among other things, found "that all of the allegations contained in the petition are true"; and further: "That Andrew Cassidy is seventy-three years of age * * * and that by reason of old age and weakness of mind said Andrew Cassidy is unable unassisted to properly manage and take care of himself and/or his property and estate, and by reason thereof is likely to be deceived or imposed upon by artful or designing persons." Three points are raised by the appellant as reasons why the order complained of should be reversed.

The first point urged is that, upon the petition as filed, the court had no jurisdiction to hear or determine the matter or appoint a guardian, for the reason that the petition absolutely fails to allege or "represent" to the court that Andrew Cassidy was "insane, or from any cause mentally incompetent to manage his property" as required by section 1763 of the Code of Civil Procedure, nor does it state facts fully equivalent to the words "mentally incompetent" required by said section.

[1] While it must be represented to the court that such a mental condition as is described in section 1763 of the Code of Civil Procedure exists in the person for whom guardianship is sought, the specific language used in that section is not essential. That section is to be considered in connection with sections 1764 and 1767 of the same Code. Section 1764 of this Code provides that a guardian shall be appointed when it appears to the court that the person in question "is incapable of taking care of himself and managing his property." And section 1767 furnishes a definition of the terms used in sections 1763 and 1764 and involved in this proceeding. These two sections, in effect, provide a test by which the condition of the alleged incompetent is to be measured. This test is whether or not he "is, by reason of old age, disease, weakness of mind, or from any other cause unable, unassisted, to properly manage and take care of himself or his property, and by reason thereof would be likely to be deceived or imposed upon by artful or designing persons."

While the petition in this case does not allege the mental incompetency of appellant in the exact words of section 1763 of the Code, the language of the petition and of the order appealed from is almost identical with the definition of these words furnished by section 1767. It would seem reasonable that no stronger language is requisite in the petition for appointment of a guardian than is sufficient in the order appointing such a guardian. This appointment is provided for in section 1764 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is partially quoted above. And the kind of "incapability" referred to in this section is defined in section 1767. The petition herein uses, in this respect, practically the language of sections 1764 and 1767 of this Code. As was said by the Supreme Court of Michigan, in Re Storick, 64 Mich. 685, 31 N. W. 582, and referred to in Re Colburn, 11 Cal. App. 604, at 608, 105 P. 924, 926: "The statute does not say merely 'incompetent' but 'mentally incompetent.' * * * Unless the petition either follows the words of the statute, or uses language and states facts fully equivalent, it can not give jurisdiction." (Italics ours.) In our opinion, the petition herein does use language and states facts fully equivalent to the words of the statute, and the mental incompetency to manage property required by section 1763 of the Code of Civil Procedure is sufficiently alleged to give the court jurisdiction of the proceedings.

In his second contention, the appellant claims the evidence is not sufficient to support the findings of the court which are hereinabove quoted. The claim is that the evidence is not sufficient to show that appellant is, by reason of mental weakness, incompetent to care for himself or his property. Among other things, there is evidence as follows: That appellant has about $7,000 in the bank, and also owns jointly with his wife a home worth $3,500 or thereabouts, a lot and barn in San Francisco, value not shown, and a promissory note for $3,000. That he was at the time of the hearing seventy-three years old, and at that time had been ill and confined in a hospital for about four months. That he had periods of crying when there was no apparent occasion, and would cry on being asked a question. That on one day he would offer to sell his home for $1,400, and send people to look at it, and the next day would change the price to $4,500. That he was constantly talking of going into different lines of business, first the trucking business, and soon thereafter the business of building and selling cheap houses, stating that he was just as good a carpenter as men in the business who had learned the trade, and next he would plan to get a job in the Crocker bank. That he was constantly planning to get into some business and get some one to go into partnership with him. That he had a loan of $3,000, and insisted he was to receive only $210 interest thereon for three years, instead of $210 a year, and was unable to understand the difference when it was explained to him. That in making a loan he gave a check for $3,000 to a stranger before receiving any papers. That many people were trying to get loans from him. That he was unable to understand certain ordinary transactions with a bank. That more recently he could not carry on a complete or connected conversation. Appellant himself testified:

"Q. If some one told you you could make double your money by building houses and selling them, would you do that? A. Of course I would, you would, too.

"Q. Have you had any experience in building houses, Mr. Cassidy? A. Not a bit, not a bit."

[2, 3] In cases of this kind it is not necessary to wait until actual loss or damage has been suffered before the beneficient provisions of these statutes may be invoked. It is sufficient when the mental weakness exists, which makes the unfortunate one an easy prey for the designing. The willingness of appellant to accept the statement of other and perhaps interested parties and rely on their promises of big money in the building business, in which he was not experienced, was, in his apparent condition, a dangerous symptom, and this alone, but especially in the light of the other testimony, may well have convinced the trial court that appellant would be easily imposed upon by artful and designing persons. The trial court had, in addition to the other testimony, the opportunity of hearing and observing the appellant. Without quoting more of the testimony, the above facts are sufficient to show there was evidence to support the findings of the court, and the well-known rule applies.

[4-6] As a third ground for reversal, appellant claims the appointment of the stepdaughter was erroneous, for the reason that respondent is disqualified, since she is also the guardian of the estate of her mother, the wife of appellant; that her interests would thus be conflicting; and that she is not a relative or friend of appellant, but is actually hostile to him. Respondent is under no statutory disability or disqualification to act as such guardian. The court has a broad discretion in the appointment of a guardian. In re Crocker, 174 Cal. 660, 163 P. 1015. There is nothing in the record to show any such conflict of interest as would disqualify her, and the court may well have considered it as an advantage that she was also the guardian of the estate of her mother, wife of appellant, in view of the joint ownership of some of the properties and the economy and convenience of having the interests of both handled by the same person. The evidence shows respondent is a proper person to act as guardian, that she is familiar with the affairs of respondent and his wife, and is possessed of ordinary business ability.

It is urged that respondent, being a stepdaughter, is not a "relative," and that she has shown such hostility toward appellant as precludes her from being considered a "friend" to him and, therefore, under section 1763 of the Code of Civil Procedure, she could not file a petition. While she is not a blood relative, the section itself does not specify a blood relative, and it might well be held that this fairly common relationship was within the purpose and intent of the statute. Whether or not this is true, we think the evidence shows she at least is such a friend as is contemplated by the section. Without quoting the scattered testimony on this point, we may say that it shows no hostility on the part of respondent toward appellant, and any slight conflict in the evidence, as to friendliness, has been resolved by the trial court in favor of the respondent.

[7] In connection with the matters just referred to, it is finally urged by appellant that, if a guardian is needed at all, the trial court should be required to appoint as guardian either the nominee of appellant, the Crocker First Federal Trust Company, or some competent person other than respondent. This is a matter within the discretion of the trial court. The court has authority to select a proper person as guardian, and under no existing provision is the court required to give any weight to the wishes of the ward, as is the case in appointing guardians for minors. Even the appointment of a stranger as such guardian, in preference to the nominee of the incompetent, has been held valid. Matter of Coburn, 165 Cal. 202, 218, 131 P. 352. No abuse of this discretion appears from the record.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

BRIDGES v. PRICE et al. (Civ. 6567.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 12, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 11, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 7, 1929.

1. Brokers ⇨4—Law in force at date of giving broker's bond held part thereof.

Law in force at date of giving broker's bond was a part of it as effectually as if provisions of the law were in words inserted in bond.

2. Evidence ⇨65—Surety executing broker's bond was presumed to know that statute had been amended (Corporate Securities Act, § 5).

Surety, executing broker's bond under Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) § 5, was presumed to know the law, and hence to know that the statute under which the bond was given had been again amended in 1925 (St. 1925, p. 967), where the statute, as amended in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 90), had ceased to exist.

3. Reformation of instruments ⇨30—Obvious mistake in contract can be corrected by court in action at law.

Where obvious mistake appears on face of contract, it can be corrected by court in action at law, and without recourse to equity.

4. Reformation of instruments ⇨30—Court in action on broker's bond could correct mistake reciting that bond was given under amendment which had ceased to exist, due to subsequent amendment (Corporate Securities Act, § 5).

Where broker's bond, given under Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) § 5, recited that it was given under the act as amended in 1923, whereas the statute as amended in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 90) had no existence, since superseded by an amendment of 1925 (St. 1925, p. 967), court was authorized to correct the mistake in an action on the bond.

Under Civ. Code, § 2837, it is only after the meaning of the surety contract has been ascertained, as provided in statute, that the rule of strictissimi juris comes into operation to prevent the extending of the obligation beyond the fair meaning so ascertained.

6. Brokers ⇨4—Broker's failure to account in sale and purchase of securities held covered by bond (Corporate Securities Act, § 5, par. 3, as amended by St. 1925, p. 967).

Broker's failure to account to plaintiff in the sale and purchase of securities for him held covered by bond executed under Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) § 5, par. 3, as amended in 1925 (St. 1925, p. 967), conditioned on broker's faithful and honest performance of all obligations and undertakings in purchase and sale of securities, irrespective of fraud.

7. Brokers ⇨4—Obligation of surety under broker's bond held not discharged because plaintiff took note as conditional payment for securities sold by broker (Corporate Securities Act, § 5, par. 3, as amended by St. 1925, p. 967).

Obligation of surety on broker's bond executed under Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) § 5, par. 3, as amended in 1925 (St. 1925, p. 967), conditioned on broker's performance of all obligations in purchase and sale of securities, held not discharged because plaintiff took promissory note from broker as conditional payment for securities sold by broker, and for which he had failed to account to plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by H. A. Bridges against E. L. Price and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Continental Casualty Company appeals. Affirmed.

J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Grant R. Bennett, of San José, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendant Continental Casualty Company from a judgment in favor of plaintiff upon a broker's bond given by appellant under the provisions of the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) as surety for defendant Price. The evidence showed that on September 29, 1925, respondent Bridges delivered to one Ormond, as agent for Price, 210 shares of capital stock of National Automatic Music Company, to be exchanged for 336 shares of Monolith Portland Cement Company stock. Subsequently Price admitted to Bridges that he had sold his Music Company stock and had not procured the Cement Company stock, and on November 19, 1925, Price persuaded respondent to take his (Price's) promissory note for the value of the stock, payable 27 days after date. The note was never paid, and after its maturity this action was brought on the original obligation, and appellant was joined as a defendant upon its bond. Judgment followed against both defendants.

The bond here in question recites that it is given as "required under the provisions of paragraph 3 of section 5 of said act [Corporate Securities Act] as amended in 1923." As a matter of fact, prior to the execution and delivery of the bond, that paragraph had again been amended in 1925 (St. 1925, p. 967), so as to enlarge the surety's liability on the bond. Because of this recital appellant insists that its obligations are to be measured by the provisions of the act as it read in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 90), and prior to the amendment of 1925. Under those provisions it clearly would not be liable in this action. Blumenthal v. Larson, 79 Cal. App. 726, 248 P. 681; Mitchell v. Smith (Cal. Sup.) 267 P. 540.

[1-4] This contention, in our judgment, is not tenable. The bond was a statutory bond, and the law in force at the date of its giving is a part of it as effectually as if such provisions were in words inserted in it. Milliron v. Dittman, 180 Cal. 443, 181 P. 779. Appellant is presumed to know the law, and hence to know that the statute under which the bond was given had been again amended in 1925. The statute as amended in 1923 had ceased to have existence. It was superseded by the amendment of 1925. Either the reference was intended as a reference to the statute of 1925, or the bond was a nullity, because no bond was any longer required or provided for by the statute of 1923. It has frequently been held, in construing amendments to statutes which were incorrectly referred to in the amending statute, that, if the court can clearly see that the reference was intended for a particular statute, the amendment will be construed to carry out its evident intent, in spite of the mistake in the reference contained in the amending act. People v. King, 28 Cal. 265; Estate of Campbell, 143 Cal. 623, 77 P. 674; People v. Bradford, 1 Cal. App. 41, 81 P. 712; People v. Camp, 42 Cal. App. 411, 183 P. 845; People v. Troutman, 187 Cal. 313, 201 P. 928. We can see no good reason why the same rule should not be applied in the construction of a contract. Where an obvious mistake appears on the face of a contract, it can be corrected by the court in an action at law and without recourse to equity. Wagenblast v. Washburn, 12 Cal. 208; Sprague v. Edwards, 48 Cal. 239; Wilcoxson v. Miller, 49 Cal. 193; Gray v. Maier & Zobelein Brewery, 2 Cal. App. 657, 84 P. 280; Black Eagle Oil Co. v. Belcher, 22 Cal. App. 258, 133 P. 1153; Hunt v. Barker, 27 Cal. App. 776, 778, 151 P. 165. The reference to the statute as amended in 1923 is so obviously a mistaken reference to the statute as amended in 1925 that it must be so read, under the authorities above cited, and as a matter of plain common sense. Further support for this construction of the bond is found in Town of Mill Valley v. Massachusetts, etc., Co., 68 Cal. App. 372, 229 P. 891.

[5] Appellant insists that, since surety contracts are to be construed strictissimi juris, it cannot be held beyond the express letter of the bond. It is a sufficient answer to this contention to refer to section 2837 of the Civil Code, which provides: "In interpreting the terms of a contract of suretyship, the same rules are to be observed as in the case of other contracts." It is only after the meaning of the terms of the contract has thus been ascertained that the rule of strictissimi juris comes into operation to prevent the extending of the obligation beyond the fair meaning so ascertained. Roberts v. Security T. & S. Bank, 196 Cal. 557, 566, 238 P. 673. Having determined that the measure of appellant's liability is to be determined from the provisions of the act as it read in 1925, when the bond was given, the language of that act must be construed in order to determine whether it fairly covers the facts of this case.

[6] Paragraph 3 of section 5 of the Corporate Securities Act provided, before its amendment in 1925, that "said bond shall be conditioned upon the faithful compliance with the provisions of law by said applicant and by all agents representing the said applicant." This language was construed in Blumenthal v. Larson, supra, and Mitchell v. Smith, supra, to limit the liability on the bond to cases where the broker was guilty of fraud in the sale of securities as defined by section 14 of the act. The 1925 amendment added to the language above quoted the following: "And the honest and faithful application of all funds received and the faithful and honest performance of all obligations and undertakings in the purchase or sale of securities." The purpose and effect of this amendment was obviously to extend the liability upon such bonds beyond that which was imposed by the statute before the amendment. Whatever may be meant by the word "honest," the "faithful performance of all obligations and undertakings" means no more than performance of those obligations and undertakings according to their terms. Bonds conditioned for the "faithful performance" of a contract have always been construed as being breached by any failure of performance in the principal contract. Garrett v. Dodson (Tex. Civ. App.) 199 S. W. 675, 682; General Bonding, etc., Co. v. Hill (Tex. Civ. App.) 195 S. W. 873; Lamson v. Maryland Casualty Co., 196 Iowa, 1185, 194 N. W. 70; Trinity Parish v. Ætna Indemnity Co., 37 Wash. 515, 79 P. 1097; Long v. American Surety Co., 23 N. D. 492, 137 N. W. 41; Hensley v. School District, 97 Kan. 56, 154 P. 253. In fact, such bonds are frequently referred to as "faithful performance bonds." Price having failed in the faithful performance of his obligation in the sale and purchase of securities for Bridges, appellant became liable to Bridges upon its bond.

[7] It is further argued by appellant that the taking of the promissory note from Price amounted to an extension of time on the principal contract, and hence discharged appellant from its obligation as surety. It is true that the taking of a promissory note for an indebtedness postpones the time of payment of the original obligation (Gnarini v. Swiss American Bank, 162 Cal. 181, 121 P. 726), and ordinarily an extension of time on the principal contract discharges the surety. (Tuohy v. Woods, 122 Cal. 665, 55 P. 683.) But appellant misconceives the nature of its obligation. Its bond is conditioned on "the faithful and honest performance of all obligations and undertakings in the purchase and sale of securities." When the original contract was entered into, the bond covered the performance of the obligations of that contract. When the promissory note was taken, it was in conditional payment for securities sold by Price for Bridges, and the bond likewise covered its performance. The legal effect of the taking of the note was that Price agreed to pay the note at maturity or to be liable upon the original obligation at the option of Bridges. 20 Cal. Jur. pp. 920-925, § 13. That was likewise an undertaking in the purchase and sale of securities within the meaning of the section, and so was covered by the bond. No matter how many successive agreements Bridges and Price might have made concerning their stock transaction, the bond would have covered each of them in turn. Appellant's argument would be good, if it had furnished an undertaking to secure the performance of a single obligation. It fails because, under the provisions of the statute, the bond was security for the performance, not of one, but of all, obligations in the purchase and sale of securities.

[8] Appellant's final contention, that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, is sufficiently answered by the fact that the evidence, which was introduced without objection, fully supports the judgment. If the complaint was defective the admission of this evidence without objection cured the defect. Slaughter v. Goldberg, Bowen & Co., 26 Cal. App. 318, 147 P. 90. A retrial on this ground could only result in an amendment to the complaint and a new judgment for plaintiff.

HEMMEON v. AMALGAMATED COPPER MINES CO. (Civ. 5005.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 12, 1928.

1. Contracts ⚷139—Purchaser of worthless notes, issued by foreign corporation without permit, held not in pari delicto (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963).

Purchaser of worthless notes, issued by foreign corporation without permit, must be presumed to have known that law required permit, but not that corporation had violated law, and hence is not precluded from recovering amount thereof on ground that she and corporation were in pari delicto; presumption being that law has been obeyed until contrary appears, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963.

2. Limitation of actions ⚷127(4)—One suing on corporation notes purchased by her could set up count for money had and received by amendment after expiration of limitation period (Code Civ. Proc. § 339).

One suing on contract for amount of corporation notes purchased by her held entitled to set up count for money had and received by amendment of complaint after expiration of two-year period of limitation prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 339; no different or additional relief being prayed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by Mary Elizabeth Hemmeon against the Amalgamated Copper Mines Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Clark & Law, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Ford, Bodkin, Watt & Herlihy, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The appellant was incorporated and had its principal place of business in the state of Arizona, and also maintained an office and conducted business in Los Angeles county, Cal. On January 15, 1920, at Phœnix, Ariz., there were issued by appellant for public sale generally $50,000 worth of its promissory notes of the denomination of $250 each, and on or about July 1, 1920, respondent purchased four of said notes, payable January 15, 1922, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum. On May 24, 1922, this action was instituted for the collection of all four notes, with interest. Thereafter and on April 17, 1923, an amended complaint was served and filed, containing an additional count or cause of action for money had and received. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount demanded, and the defendant appealed therefrom.

[1] It is first contended that the trial court could not award any judgment to the plaintiff, for the reason that said corporation had not obtained from the commissioner of corporations a permit to issue or sell said securities, and that since they were issued and sold in violation of law, they were void and unindorsable. In support of this proposition appellant cites authorities holding that while one who has received the benefit of an illegal private contract is estopped to plead its invalidity, such rule does not apply to contracts which are void as against public policy; that the plaintiff and defendant herein were in pari delicto, and should have been left as the court found them. The trial court found, and it is not denied by appellant, that the respondent had no knowledge of the failure to obtain a permit, but it is argued that she must be presumed to have known the law and that the notes were void; that, having failed to demand proof of the existence of a permit, respondent "passively if not actively became a participant in violating the law."

True, respondent must be presumed to have known the law requiring the possession of a permit as a prerequisite to the issuance and sale of securities, but it does not follow that she should be presumed to have known the fact that appellant had violated the law. The statute does not make it an offense innocently to buy securities issued without a permit first having been obtained by the seller, nor does it require that it shall be exhibited to the purchaser. Until the contrary appears, it will be presumed that a person is innocent of crime or wrong, and that the law has been obeyed. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963. Respondent was entitled to assume that the law had been complied with. We can conceive of no just theory upon which a corporation could be upheld in retaining moneys fraudulently obtained from an innocent member of the general public by asserting that he was equally guilty because he bought worthless securities which public policy forbade the corporation to sell as genuine. To so hold would be but to penalize those for whose benefit such laws are established. In Smith v. Bach, 183 Cal. 259, 191 P. 14, the same question was presented. The Supreme Court there said:

"There are authorities which, while not denying the general rule that an illegal contract cannot be enforced whether malum in se or malum prohibitum, hold that all the consequences which attend a contract contrary to public morals do not attend one which is purely malum prohibitum, and that in the latter case courts will take notice of the circumstances and will give relief if justice and equity require a restoration of money received by either party thereunder. 13 Corpus Juris, p. 411, § 341. In such a case the complaining party is protected, the prohibition being for his benefit, and not being in pari delicto he is entitled to relief. Id., p. 501, § 443. By the weight of authority where money has been paid in consideration of an executory contract which is illegal, the party who has paid it may repudiate the agreement at any time before it is executed and reclaim the money. In such a case it is the duty of the court in furtherance of justice to aid one not in pari delicto though to some extent involved in the illegality, but who, as here, is comparatively the more innocent, and to permit him to recover back money paid on a contract as the circumstances of the case may require"—citing authorities.

[2] It is next argued that the plaintiff was not entitled to set up her count for money had and received by amendment more than two years after the two-year period of limitation has expired. As we have observed, the plaintiff first sued for $1,000 and interest upon the contract, and thereafter added a cause of action, which, when filed, was barred by section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Had the plaintiff dismissed her action and attempted by a subsequent suit to recover by a common count the relief first sought by an action upon contract, doubtless the trial court would properly have declined to entertain the action. But such is not the case. No different or additional relief was prayed. The same relief was demanded in a different way. This question was presented in Cowell v. Snyder, 171 Cal. 291, 152 P. 920, and Union Lumber Co. v. J. W. Schouten & Co., 25 Cal. App. 80, 142 P. 910, and it was held that such amendments are not subject to the objection interposed, even though the amount demanded be increased by including items formerly overlooked. In the case last cited it was said, upon abundant authority:

"* * * Both causes of action had the same and identical purpose; hence the amended complaint cannot be held to have set forth a new cause of action. * * * As both complaints were for the recovery of the price of the same lot of goods, the action itself, irrespective of the theory on which the right to recover is based, must be regarded as having been commenced when the original complaint was filed. There is no merit therefore in defendant's point that the statute of limitations had run against the cause of action set forth in the amended complaint."

The judgment is affirmed.

GREGORIEV v. NORTHWESTERN PAC. R. CO. (Civ. 6257.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 13, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 11, 1929.

1. Railroads 🔑328(1)—Failure of stranger traveling along unfamiliar highway to stop, look, and listen at railroad crossing is not negligent, where track is obscured and there is nothing to indicate presence of crossing.

Stranger traveling upon highway crossed by railroad track is not guilty of negligence by reason of failure to stop, look, and listen, where track is obscured and there is nothing to indicate its presence or warn him of its existence, notwithstanding general rule that person approaching railroad crossing must stop, look, and listen for approaching trains.

2. Railroads 🔑348(9)—Evidence sustained jury's finding in automobile driver's action for injuries at railroad crossing that plaintiff was not contributorily negligent in failing to see obscured crossing.

In automobile driver's action for injuries sustained at railroad crossing, evidence held to sustain jury's finding that failure of plaintiff to observe railroad track obscured by orchard and not marked by crossing signs was not due to want of ordinary care on his part so as to prevent recovery.

3. Railroads 🔑350(22)—Contributory negligence of automobile driver failing to stop at obscured crossing held for jury.

Contributory negligence of automobile driver who failed to stop at crossing, in suit for injuries sustained as result of collision at railroad crossing, held question of fact for jury, under evidence that plaintiff was unfamiliar with road, that railroad maintained no crossing signs, and that crossing was obscured by trees so that it could not readily be seen.

4. Negligence 🔑136(9)—Contributory negligence is for jury, unless no fact is left in doubt, and no inference other than that of plaintiff's negligence can be drawn from evidence.

It is only where there is no fact left in doubt, and no deduction or inference, other than that of plaintiff's negligence, can be drawn from evidence, by reasonable minds, that court can say as matter of law that contributory negligence is established; question being generally one of fact for the jury.

5. Railroads 🔑350(2)—Value of photograph of railroad crossing as evidence held for jury in action for injuries in crossing collision.

Value of photograph of railroad crossing, introduced in action against railroad for injuries sustained in crossing collision, was question for determination of jury, together with other evidence.

6. Railroads 🔑350(5)—Presence of gate built by railroad at crossing did not, as matter of law, warn automobile driver of existence of crossing, where gate was permitted to remain open and signs thereon were not visible.

In action against railroad for injury sustained in crossing collision, presence of wooden gate, which defendant had built to extend across road, held not, as matter of law, sufficient to warn plaintiff driving automobile of existence of railroad crossing, where gate was allowed to remain open and sign thereon "private crossing" was therefore not visible to the public.

7. Witnesses 🔑392(1)—Letter written by witness to railroad urging the placing of sign at crossing held admissible to impeach witness testifying that view of crossing was unobscured.

In action against railroad for injuries sustained in collision at crossing, letter urging railroad to construct crossing sign at that point held competent for impeachment purposes, where witness at trial testified that view of tracks and crossing was not obscured.

8. Witnesses 🔑379(1)—Prior declaration of witness, though not directly contradicting a present statement, is admissible for impeachment, where belief of witness, as indicated by the respective declarations, reveals inconsistency.

Direct contradiction between former and present statements of witness is not essential to render former statement admissible for impeachment purposes, provided there is substantial inconsistency between belief of witness as to certain matters, as indicated by his previous declarations, and that which would naturally be shown by his testimony.

9. Witnesses 🔑392(1)—Letter to railroad urging construction of signs at crossing was not rendered inadmissible for impeachment purposes, in crossing collision case, by evidence of railroad's subsequent removal of obstructions at crossing.

Letter written by witness to railroad company, urging construction of signs at crossing, was not rendered inadmissible, in action for injuries at crossing, by virtue of railroad company's subsequent removal of obstructions near the scene of the crossing; evidence as to the effect of the removal of the obstructions was conflicting, removal of obstructions relating to weight and not to admissibility of the evidence.

---

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1060(2)—Improper use of letter introduced for impeachment purposes to persuade jury of defendant's negligence held not ground for reversal, where negligence was not claimed not shown otherwise.

Counsel's improper use of letter to railroad, urging construction of crossing signs, admitted for purpose of impeachment in an effort to persuade jury, in crossing collision case, that railroad's failure to erect signs was negligence, held not to require reversal, where other evidence as to defendant's negligent maintenance of crossing was in conflict, and no claim was made that evidence, aside from contents of letter, was insufficient to support finding in plaintiff's favor.

11. Trial 🔑296(8)—Instruction defining satisfactory evidence under repealed statute, if error, held harmless, where full and correct instructions on preponderance of evidence were also given (Code Civ. Proc. § 1835, repealed in 1923).

Instruction defining satisfactory evidence, under Code of Civ. Proc. § 1835, repealed in 1923, held not reversible error as to defendant, where court fully and correctly instructed jury upon subject of preponderance of evidence, especially where other instructions fully protected defendant, and error, if any, was favorable to defendant, as requiring plaintiff to establish his case by greater degree of proof than law required.

12. Trial 🔑295(1)—Charge, meaning of which, read as a whole, with reasonable construction of its parts, would be apparent to man of ordinary intelligence, cannot be held misleading.

Charge of trial court must be viewed in light of common understanding, and cannot be held misleading if its meaning as a whole, as determined from reasonable construction of various parts and their relation to each other, would be apparent to man of ordinary intelligence.

13. Railroads 🔑312(6)—Railroad was under obligation to sound warning at open crossing used generally by public as part of road dedicated and accepted by public, though railroad had not expressly consented to dedication (Civ. Code, § 486).

Where railroad crossing was open and was being used generally by the public as part of a road dedicated to and accepted by the public, railroad company was required to ring bell or sound whistle when approaching the crossing, under Civ. Code, § 486, requiring warnings to be sounded on all streets, roads, or highways, though there was no evidence to establish that railroad company expressly consented to the dedication and acceptance of the road.

14. Railroads 🔑351(9)—Instructing, that railroad was required to give warning signals at road crossings and that particular road was private way, held not erroneous in crossing collision case (Civ. Code, § 486).

In action against railroad for injuries sustained at crossing, action of court in giving instructions as to railroad's duty to sound warning at all crossings of public roads, and instruction that particular roadway was private way, held not erroneous as misleading or misconstruing Civ. Code, § 486, which requires warnings to be sounded on all streets, highways, or roads.

15. Appeal and error 🔑1004(1)—Award of damages may not be set aside, unless so grossly disproportionate as to shock sense of justice and indicate that award was result of passion or prejudice.

Award of damages may not be set aside, unless so grossly disproportionate as to shock sense of justice and indicate that award was result of passion or prejudice, and mere fact that amount is larger than that ordinarily allowed in such cases is not controlling.

16. Appeal and error 🔑1004(1)—Existence of passion or prejudice, requiring that verdict be set aside as excessive, may be determined only by comparing award with evidence, and question is one primarily for trial court.

Only means of discovering existence of passion or prejudice as influencing award of damages is by comparing amount of award with evidence, question being primarily for the trial court's determination.

17. Damages 🔑130(1)—$7,000 special damages to plaintiff, for destruction of automobile in crossing collision, medical and hospital expenses in treatment of plaintiff suffering punctured skull and of his family, and for loss of his earnings and services of daughter whose back was broken, held not excessive.

$7,000 award to plaintiff for special damages, including destruction of automobile in crossing collision, medical and hospital expenses in treatment of plaintiff who suffered puncturing of skull, and family loss of plaintiff's earnings, and loss of services of his daughter whose back was broken, held not excessive.

18. Damages 🔑132(1)—$10,500 general damages to plaintiff for injuries to himself and daughter, held not excessive where plaintiff suffered puncture of skull causing dizziness, headaches, defective hearing, and substantially postponing return to trade, and daughter's broken back required expensive hospitalization.

$10,500 for general damages resulting from injuries to plaintiff and his daughter in crossing collision held not excessive under evidence that plaintiff suffered puncture of skull causing dizziness, headaches, and defective hearing preventing him from following trade for some time, and that injuries to daughter, suffering broken back, required much expensive medical and surgical treatment and hospitalization.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Ben Gregoriev against the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Goodfellow, Eells & Orrick, R. W. Palmer, and Stanley Moore, all of San Francisco, and Geary & Geary, of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

Hilliard Comstock, of Santa Rosa, and Bell & Simmons, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Respondent's sedan automobile was struck and demolished by one of the appellant's trains on June 18, 1925, at a grade crossing between Guerneville and Rionido station, Sonoma county, and as a result of the collision respondent, who was driving the sedan at the time, sustained an injured skull, his wife was killed, and his two daughters and a son, aged 12, 11, and 6 years, respecttively, who were the other occupants of the machine, were more or less injured, one of his daughters having suffered a fractured spine. Thereafter respondent commenced this action for damages, and upon trial before a jury was awarded a verdict, the amount of which was reduced by the trial court on motion for a new trial, to which reduction respondent consented; whereupon judgment for the reduced amount was entered in respondent's favor, from which judgment the railroad company has appealed.

The complaint alleged and evidence on behalf of respondent was adduced at the trial to prove that the collision was proximately caused by the railroad company's failure to maintain said crossing in a safe condition, and by the negligent operation of its train thereover. Appellant makes no point on this appeal as to the sufficiency of the evidence relating to either of the foregoing issues, but contends that respondent took no precautions whatever to observe the approach of trains before attempting to cross the track, and therefore was shown to be guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

[1] It is doubtless a well-settled principle of law that a person approaching a railroad crossing is bound to stop and look and listen for approaching trains, because, as has been frequently stated, the track of a steam train is in itself a warning of danger, and a person about to cross the same must take precautions for his own safety (Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 P. 651; Loftus v. Pacific Electric R. Co., 166 Cal. 464, 137 P. 34); but the courts have also declared that this conceded rule is grounded upon the assumption that such person knew or should in reason have known that he was approaching a railroad crossing (Lawrence v. Southern Pacific Co., 189 Cal. 434, 208 P. 966; McClure v. Southern Pacific Co., 41 Cal. App. 652, 183 P. 248); in other words, as stated in the latter case: "It cannot be said as a matter of law that a stranger traveling upon a highway over which, unknown to him, a railway track crosses, is, by reason of his failure to stop and look and listen, guilty of negligence, where such track is obscured and there is nothing to indicate its presence or warn him of its existence." See, also, Rosenbloom v. Southern Pacific Co., 59 Cal. App. 109, 210 P. 53.

[2] The evidence here shows that respondent did not stop before attempting to cross the track, but it further shows without conflict that he was a total stranger to the regions where the accident occurred; and testimony was introduced which reasonably supports the inference that he was in fact unaware of the existence of the railroad crossing until he was too close to it to avoid being struck by the train. Indeed, appellant does not question the truth of such testimony, its position being, as stated in its brief, that it "may be true that plaintiff did not see the crossing, but," appellant asserts, "it cannot be said in the face of the record here that he could not have seen the same had he exercised any degree of care and caution."

The jury concluded, however, after hearing and considering all of the circumstances attending the accident, especially those relating to the physical conditions present at the scene thereof, that respondent's failure to observe the railroad track was not due to a lack of exercise of ordinary care on his part, and in our opinion the evidence is legally sufficient to support such conclusion.

The essential features of the evidence sustaining this view are as follows: Respondent, a resident of Contra Costa and Alameda counties for upwards of 15 years, was on his way to Fort Ross, Sonoma county, but was intending to spend the night at a camp on the Russian River, between Guerneville and Rionido, owned by a Mr. Coon. Accompanying respondent on the trip, besides the members of his family, but traveling in a separate automobile, were two others named Tsaregradsky and Sakovich. They had stopped at this particular camp the year before, and were driving a short distance ahead of respondent to show him the way. They proceeded along the main county highway out of Guerneville for some distance, and then turned into Bonita avenue, which led through Coon's property and to the camp grounds, and was the road on which the accident happened. Bonita avenue extended at right angles from the Guerneville highway southerly in a straight line for about 230 feet, and then crossed the railroad track squarely and continued on down into the Coon property. It was a narrow road having a traveled bed of only 7 feet in width, which lay in the center of a right of way 16½ feet wide. It had been constructed many years before, and originally was a private road, but long prior to the accident had been laid out and dedicated to the public on a recorded map of a subdivision of land, and formally accepted by the county, after which the road was maintained by the county and traveled generally by the public, and was the only road leading to Coon's camp grounds. The railroad company maintained no crossing signs along Bonita avenue, nor on its right of way, to call attention to the existence of the railroad crossing, nor were cattle guards constructed at the crossing, which might have indicated the presence of a railroad track. Neither was any kind of crossing signal operated at that point to give warning of the approach of trains, nor was any whistling post erected on the railroad right of way requiring engine crews to sound warning of the approach of trains, and evidence was adduced to prove that this particular train sounded no warning of any kind until instantly before the crash.

The automobile driven by Tsaregradsky and his companion was a delivery type Ford with a box back and a top. The road was dusty, and the automobiles were traveling approximately 9 miles an hour. The evidence fails to show with any degree of certainty how close behind the Ford respondent traveled down Bonita avenue, various witnesses having fixed the distance from 65 to 100 feet. But just before respondent's sedan reached the track the occupants of the Ford, having already crossed the track, suddenly saw the train approaching from the east, traveling, as the engineer afterwards testified, at a speed of 35 miles an hour. Tsaregradsky at once waved his hand through the broken window in the rear of the Ford top in an effort to warn respondent of the impending danger, but respondent did not understand the meaning of the signal. Immediately thereafter, however, he heard and saw the train, and instantly applied his brakes and turned quickly to the right in an effort to avoid being struck, but the projecting cross timber on the front of the locomotive caught the front end of the sedan, hurled it around, and it was crushed between the side of the locomotive and a large redwood stump standing in the railroad right of way a few feet from the track, with the result already described.

The physical conditions present, other than those mentioned, which respondent claims and the jury found obstructed the view of the railroad and obscured the crossing, were shown to be substantially as follows: Extending along both sides of Bonita avenue from the Guerneville highway to the railroad crossing was an apple orchard which grew close to, and some of the tree branches extended for a considerable distance over the fence on each side of, the right of way. The trees were fully matured, being 8 or 9 feet high, in good condition, and at this particular season of the year were dense with foliage; and standing among the trees, close to the right of way on the easterly side, were several large redwood stumps; and along and within both rights of way there was a considerable growth of weeds and wormwood brush, which along the fences grew fence high. Where the roadbed crossed the track the railroad company had laid planking between the rails flush therewith and with the grade of Bonita avenue, but more or less grass was growing between the planking and the rails, and between the ties; and dirt and gravel had been tracked upon and across the planks by the county road crew in scraping and grading the approaches to the railroad crossing shortly prior to the accident. In connection with the foregoing physical conditions, testimony was introduced to the effect that because of them the railroad right of way on both sides of the crossing could not be readily seen, and that the crossing itself was not plainly discernible to persons traveling from the Guerneville highway down to Bonita avenue toward said crossing.

[3, 4] Such being the facts and circumstances, we are not prepared to hold as a matter of law, contrary to the finding of the jury, that a reasonably prudent person, situated as respondent was, would have observed said crossing in time to have averted a collision. As often said, rarely is a set of circumstances presented which enables a court to say, as a matter of law, that negligence has been shown. It is usually a question of fact for the jury, an inference to be deduced from the circumstances of each particular case. Gregg v. Western Pacific R. Co., 193 Cal. 212, 223 P. 553; Seller v. Market-Street R. Co., 139 Cal. 268, 72 P. 1006. Even where there is no conflict in the evidence, if different conclusions upon the subject can be rationally drawn therefrom, the jury's determination is controlling. If only one conclusion is reasonably deducible from the evidence, then, of course, it becomes a question of law for the court, "but if one sensible and impartial man might decide that the plaintiff had exercised ordinary care, and another equally sensible and impartial man that he had not exercised such care, it must be left to the jury." Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., supra; Hoff v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., 158 Cal. 596, 112 P. 53. Therefore, it is only where no fact is left in doubt, and no deduction or inference other than negligence can be drawn by the jury from the evidence, that the court can say, as a matter of law, that contributory negligence is established; and, even where the facts are undisputed, if reasonable minds might draw different conclusions upon the question of negligence, the question is one of fact for the jury. Johnson v. Southern Pacific R. Co., 154 Cal. 285, 97 P. 520; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513; Seller v. Market-Street R. Co., supra. At most, the evidence here is such that reasonable minds might draw different conclusions therefrom, and, that being so, on appeal, the jury's determination cannot be set aside. Rosenbloom v. Southern Pacific Co., supra; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., supra;

Alloggi v. Southern Pacific Co., 37 Cal. App. 72, 173 P. 1117; Wing v. Western Pacific R. Co., 41 Cal. App. 251, 182 P. 969; Lawrence v. Southern Pacific Co., supra.

[5, 6] Appellant introduced in evidence a photograph of the railroad crossing taken from Bonita avenue at a point about 75 feet northerly of the crossing, which it claims constitutes "the most important piece of evidence covering this feature of the case, and settles without conflict the question of whether or not the rails were obscured." A similar contention was made with reference to a like photograph in the case of Vaca v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. App.) 267 P. 346, but was disposed of adversely in the following language: "The value * * * of a photograph as evidence is not for this court to determine, for, as was said in People v. Crandall, 125 Cal. 129, 133, 57 P. 785, 787: 'We may assume that everyone now understands the limitations upon the use of the photograph. It presents but one point of view, and may sometimes make an unfair representation of the points at issue. Like any other diagram, its value must be determined by the jury, from all the evidence.'" Much reliance is also placed upon the fact that the railroad company had built a wooden gate along the northerly side of its right of way to extend across Bonita avenue, and that on one side of the top board had painted a sign reading: "Keep This Gate Closed," and on the board next below had painted a smaller sign reading: "Private Crossing." But in this connection, the evidence reveals that for a long time prior to the accident, and on the day thereof, this gate, on account of being out of repair, was allowed to remain open, having been swung toward the railroad track so as to form a continuation in a straight line of the easterly right of way fence of Bonita avenue, and that as a consequence the signs were not plainly visible to persons traveling southerly along Bonita avenue; moreover, even though the signs were visible, there was nothing in the wording of them indicating the presence of a railroad crossing; and, as respondent explained, when he saw the machine ahead pass through the open gateway without stopping and proceed toward the house beyond, he believed the gateway simply marked the entrance to the camp ground. Under the circumstances stated it cannot be fairly held as a matter of law that the presence of the gate under the conditions above described was sufficient in itself to warn respondent of the existence of the railroad crossing.

Other evidence was introduced by appellant to prove that, after having entered the railroad right of way, a person was able to see approaching trains for a considerable distance down the track, but the testimony on this point was conflicting, other evidence having been adduced to show that the view was more or less obstructed by the wooden gate and by a growth of suckers approximately 7 feet high, which had sprouted from the stumps of the apple trees standing within the railroad right of way. In any event, the matters above referred to only added to the conflict already existing upon the question of whether respondent, as an ordinarily prudent man, should have observed the crossing, and are not sufficient of themselves to nullify the finding of the jury on that issue.

[7, 8] Appellant assigns as error a ruling made during the cross-examination of Mr. Coon, admitting in evidence, over appellant's objection, a letter dated July 26, 1922, written by Coon to the railroad company, which read as follows: "Would like very much to get a crossing sign placed at North side of Track on Bonita avenue, El Bonita Ranch, between Guerneville and Rionido. The crossing is being used more now than before, and believe for 'Safety First' would be the thing to do. Will be more than pleased to assist in any way for the general good of all." The letter was admitted as impeachment evidence, and we think the ruling proper. Mr. Coon was called as a witness for appellant and in part testified as follows: "Q. A person driving in an automobile turning into that roadway off the Guerneville-Rionido Highway could see at all times as they proceeded toward the railroad tracks the railroad crossing across the roadway? A. I think they could. * * * Q. Would you say, looking down that road, based upon your experience, all the time you used it, there was no obstruction between the rails and the county highway? A. Not to my knowledge. * * * Q. You say the view was quite open there, Mr. Coon? A. The view of the crossing? Q. Yes. A. It was."

The clear impression created by the foregoing testimony, and more to the same effect, was that at the time of the accident the railroad crossing was open and visible at all times to persons traveling south on Bonita avenue, and consequently was safe without the maintenance of a crossing sign thereat; whereas the plain effect of the letter, which apparently was written and sent for the sole purpose of having a crossing sign erected at that point, was that without such sign the crossing was not safe. A substantial inconsistency appears, therefore, between the testimony of the witness and the statements made in said letter which in our opinion justified the admission of the letter in evidence. Hanton v. Pacific Electric R. Co., 178 Cal. 616, 174 P. 61; Worley v. Spreckels Bros. Co., 163 Cal. 60, 124 P. 697. In the former case the court held that it was not necessary that there should be contrariety in terms between the testimony given and the asserted impeaching statement, but it was only necessary in order to render it admissible that the statement should have a tendency to contradict or disprove the testimony or any inference to be deduced from it. And in Worley v. Spreckels Bros. Co., supra, the court quoted approvingly the following rule from Wigmore, Evidence (vol. II, § 1040): "As a general principle, it is to be understood that this inconsistency is to be determined, not by individual words or phrases alone, but by the whole impression or effect of what has been said or done. On a comparison of the two utterances, are they in effect inconsistent? Do the two expressions appear to have been produced by inconsistent beliefs?" One of the cases cited by the author in support of the foregoing text is Foster v. Worthing, 146 Mass. 607, 16 N. E. 572, which seems particularly pertinent here. It is there said: "It is not necessary, in order to make the letter competent, that there should be a contradiction in plain terms. It is enough if the letter, taken as a whole, either by what it says or by what it omits to say, affords some presumption that the fact was different from his testimony. And in determining this question, much must be left to the discretion of the presiding judge." The rule stated in Cyc. is to the effect that there need be no direct contradiction between the two statements if they differ in any material particular, and that accordingly, "if there is an inconsistency between the belief of the witness as to certain matters as indicated by his previous declarations, and that which would naturally be indicated by his testimony, such prior declaration may be shown, although not directly contradictory of any specific statement made on his examination. * * * 40 Cyc. p. 2701. It may be conceded that a somewhat narrower rule was declared in People v. Collum, 122 Cal. 186, 54 P. 589, upon which appellant seems to rely, but the rule as there stated was in effect disapproved in Worley v. Spreckels Bros. Co., supra, in the following language: "We are aware that there are some expressions in the opinion in People v. Collum, 122 Cal. 186 [54 P. 589], that may appear inconsistent with our ruling on this question. In so far as that opinion may be construed as holding that notwithstanding the natural effect and impression of inconsistency, nevertheless if both statements (the one on the trial and the prior statement) may be literally true on some conceivable hypothesis, the prior statement may not be shown, we think it goes too far and does not state the correct rule."

[9] Appellant claims also that the letter was inadmissible, because subsequent to its date and prior to the accident the railroad company removed some of the obstructions near the scene of the crossing, and thus avoided the necessity of erecting a crossing sign. But there is a conflict in the evidence as to the effect of the removal of said obstructions, and, aside from such conflict, the point mentioned would have relation only to the weight which should be given to the letter as impeachment evidence, and would not affect its admissibility.

[10] Appellant further complains that, although the letter was admitted for the purpose of impeachment, respondent afterwards wrongfully used it in his argument in an effort to persuade the jury that the railroad company had negligently failed to erect a crossing sign after having been warned of the increased travel on Bonita avenue. Even though such use of the letter was improper, the impropriety would not call for a reversal of the judgment, because, when put to such use, the letter only added another circumstance to the already existing conflict bearing upon the question of the negligent maintenance of the crossing, and appellant makes no contention on this appeal that, aside from the contents of said letter, the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the jury on that issue.

[11, 12] The court instructed the jury in part as follows: "In civil cases the affirmative of the issue must be proven. In this case the affirmative rests upon the plaintiff, and he must establish every material allegation of his complaint by a preponderance of the evidence, except as to the question of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, which must be proven by the defendant railroad, unless the evidence of plaintiff affirmatively shows such contributory negligence. Preponderance means, not the greater number of witnesses, but the greater weight of evidence. You are not compelled to decide in accordance with the testimony of any number of witnesses unless their evidence carries conviction to your minds. The direct evidence of a single witness, who is entitled to full credit or legal presumptions which may apply or any other competent evidence which is adduced, may be convincing or satisfactory to you as to the truth of the particular issue. Evidence is satisfactory which ordinarily produces moral certainty or conviction in an unprejudiced mind; such evidence alone will justify a verdict. It is unnecessary for your minds to be free from all doubt. It is your duty to decide in favor of the party on whose side the weight of evidence preponderates, and according to the reasonable weight and effect of the evidence adduced." (Italics ours.)

Appellant contends that the instruction as given violated the fundamental principle that the affirmative of the issue in civil cases shall be established by a "preponderance of the evidence," and gave to the jury an erroneous definition of that term, citing People v. Miller, 171 Cal. 649, 154 P. 468, and In re Estate of Ross, 179 Cal. 629, 178 P. 510.

The italicized portion of the instruction is doubtless a restatement in exact language of the definition of "satisfactory evidence" set forth in section 1835 of the Code of Civil Procedure which was repealed in 1923, apparently for the purpose of preventing continual confusion of the definition of satisfactory evidence with that of the preponderance of evidence. For that reason it would seem that the italicized portion of said instruction should have been omitted. But, as will be observed, preceding and following the italicized portion defining satisfactory evidence, the jury was fully and correctly instructed upon the subject of preponderance of evidence, and was given a correct definition of that term. Therefore, as held in the cases hereinafter cited, the insertion of the matter relating to satisfactory evidence does not constitute reversible error. Boa v. San Francisco, etc., Terminal Rys., 182 Cal. 93, 187 P. 2; Lawrence v. Goodwill, 44 Cal. App. 440, 186 P. 781; Fidelity Co. v. Paraffine Paint Co., 188 Cal. 184, 204 P. 1076. Besides, the jury was instructed that there "can be no recovery for damages for injuries sustained by a person who was struck by a railroad train at a grade crossing where a preponderance of the evidence shows that even though the train might have been moving at an excessive rate of speed without warning that the proximate cause of the accident was the negligence of the injured party in approaching such crossing without exercising the care and caution which the law requires"; and it was also instructed repeatedly, at appellant's request, that, if it found that plaintiff was guilty of negligence "which contributed in any manner or even in the slightest degree directly or proximately to the injuries sustained by him," he could not recover, and that the verdict should be in favor of the railroad company. It would seem, therefore, that the jury could not have been misled by the insertion of the former code definition of satisfactory evidence. As held in Hayden v. Consolidated Min. Co., 3 Cal. App. 136, 84 P. 422, the charge must be viewed in the light of common understanding, and the practical administration of justice should not be defeated by a too rigid adherence to close or technical analysis of the whole or any part thereof; and if, by taking the charge by its four corners and placing a reasonable, unstrained construction on each of its several parts as viewed in the light of the general context and the relation of each part to the other, a man of ordinary intelligence, reading the charge intended for his guidance, would be able to ascertain its meaning as a whole, the instruction cannot be said to be misleading.

Moreover, even though it be assumed that the instruction be subject to the criticism appellant makes against it, the ill effect thereof doubtless operated more to the detriment of respondent than it did to appellant, because, if given the construction appellant contends for, it required respondent to establish his case of negligence against appellant by a greater degree of proof than the law demanded.

The instruction given in the present case is easily differentiated from those given in the cases cited and relied upon by appellant. People v. Miller, supra, and In re Estate of Ross, supra. In each of those cases, as will be noted by comparing the former code definition of satisfactory evidence with the objectionable instructions given in those cases, the trial court, in defining the term preponderance of evidence, gave virtually the code definition of "satisfactory evidence"; and in neither case was any other instruction given upon the subject of preponderance of evidence. It is evident, therefore, that the juries in those cases must have been misled as to the law relating to the degree of evidence necessary to warrant a finding on the facts. Here, as pointed out, in the forepart of its instructions, as well as in the latter part thereof, the term preponderance of evidence was correctly defined, and the jury rightly instructed upon that subject. Therefore, under the authority of the cases hereinabove cited, even though it be deemed that the insertion of the former code definition of satisfactory evidence was improper, a reversal of the judgment on that ground is not warranted.

[13, 14] The court also gave certain instructions relating to the duty imposed upon a railroad company by the provisions of section 486 of the Civil Code to ring a locomotive bell and sound a whistle, a certain distance from the place where the railroad crosses "any street, road, or highway," etc. In this regard the court stated, among other things, that such requirement applied not only to crossings of "roads or highways which have been dedicated to the public, and are regularly maintained as county roads, but applies to all public roads, upon which the public generally are entitled to travel"; furthermore, that "wherever a road which crosses a railroad is apparently open to the public and is used by it with the assent and acquiescence of the railroad company, if you find such to be the facts, it is its duty to give signals for the benefit of travelers on the road when approaching such crossings; and that this is true whether or not the road has been legally established by dedication, prescription, or acquiescence." At appellant's request the jury was further instructed "as a matter of law that the roadway known * * * as Bonita Avenue was at the time of the accident * * * a private way over and cross the right of way of the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company." (Italics ours.) But the court refused to give another instruction proposed by appellant to the effect that Bonita avenue was not a "public highway," and that consequently appellant was not compelled by said code section "to give any warning of the approach of the train at a crossing of the character involved in this case." Appellant contends that the instructions as given were not only conflicting, but that the evidence shows that the Bonita avenue crossing was merely a "farm crossing" and not a "street, road or highway" crossing within the meaning of the said code section; and that therefore no duty was imposed upon the railroad company under said section 486 to ring a bell or sound a whistle when approaching said crossing, and that the jury should have been so instructed. We find no merit in either contention. Summarizing the instructions, the plain meaning thereof was that, even though Bonita avenue was a private way "over and across the right of way" of the railroad, the company was nevertheless obliged to comply with the requirements of section 486 if the jury found that the crossing was open to and used generally by the public "with the assent and acquiescence of the railroad company. * * *" As thus interpreted the instructions appear to be in entire harmony with appellant's construction of said code section, as stated in its brief, for it is there said: "The statute (Civil Code, section 486) provides that the warnings be sounded at all streets, highways, or roads and does not specifically state that such streets, highways or roads be public thoroughfares. This statute has been construed in this state in Orcutt v. Pacific Coast Ry. Co., 85 Cal. 291, 24 P. 661, and Vance v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 9 Cal. App. 20, 98 P. 41, and both of these cases hold that, if the crossing is an open one and the road is one in general use by the public, the statutory warnings should be sounded, regardless of whether or not there had been a formal dedication of the road to public use." The evidence here establishes a legal dedication and acceptance of Bonita avenue, and a constant use of it thereafter by the general public; and, although there is no evidence to show that the railroad company expressly consented to such dedication and acceptance, it does appear, without substantial conflict, that, since the acceptance of said road, work has been done by Sonoma county along the entire length of it, including the portion which crosses the railroad right of way; also that the crossing was an open one because of the fact that, for a long time prior to the accident, appellant allowed its gate to fall into disrepair and to stand open continuously; that standard crossing planking was placed between the rails, and that appellant's train crews had knowledge of the increased use of the road by the general public, particularly during the summer months, at which time this accident occurred. Therefore, even assuming, as the court instructed at appellant's request, that the particular portion of Bonita avenue where it crossed the railroad's right of way remained "a private way," nevertheless, the evidence shows that the crossing was an open one and was being used generally by the public as part of a road dedicated to and accepted by the public; consequently, even under appellant's construction of the law, the status of the crossing has been brought within the provisions of said code section.

The jury awarded damages in the sum of $25,000, but, by court order, acquiesced in by respondent, the amount was reduced to $17,500; and appellant contends that even as reduced the amount is excessive. The evidence supports an allowance of approximately $7,000 for special damages, including destruction of property, medical and hospital expenses necessarily incurred up to the time of trial in the treatment of respondent and his family; loss of respondent's earnings up to the time of trial, and loss of services of his daughter, whose back was broken. This would leave $10,500 to be accounted for in general damages, which would include those necessarily flowing from respondent's personal injuries and the expenses to be incurred by him in providing necessary medical and surgical treatment, and hospitalization for his injured daughter.

With reference to respondent's injuries, the evidence shows that they were severe, painful, and some of them doubtless permanent. The outer shell of his skull, protecting the sinus, was punctured, the wound being three inches long on the surface and two inches long where the sinus was penetrated; and he suffered numerous lacerations about the forehead and face, some of which will leave permanent scars. The injury to the sinus developed a case of chronic sinusitis, causing dizziness, headaches, defective hearing, and a constant discharge through the nose. He also sustained a nervous shock, which the testimony shows would prevent him for some time at least from following his trade as a shoemaker, out of which he had been making clear earnings of $300 a month for more than 10 years. His daughter's injuries, it was shown, would necessarily require much expensive medical and surgical treatment and hospitalization. Her back was broken by being "jackknifed" or crushed forward, thereby also injuring certain internal organs and paralyzing one leg. Since the accident she had been compelled to wear a steel jacket to prevent further deformity and to allow the bones of the spine to "become solid," and her doctor testified that when the bones reach that stage certain operations would be necessary, the object being "to take out the gristle from between these bones and let the bones come together, and take a portion of the bone and strap them and lay them down close so they all become one solid mass, bridging the broken bone in the middle to the good bone above and the good bones below"; and that for at least two months following the operation the girl would be compelled to lie on her back in a specially arranged bed, with her body covered with a plaster cast extending from her chest to her hips, during which period she would require the attention of special nurses.

[15, 16] The rule is well settled that awards for personal injuries cannot be declared excessive, as a matter of law, merely because the amount may be larger than is ordinarily allowed in such cases. James v. Oakland

Traction Co., 10 Cal. App. 785, 103 P. 1082. It is only when the award is so grossly disproportionate as to shock the sense of justice and indicate that the award was the result of passion or prejudice that it may be set aside (Averdieck v. Barris, 63 Cal. App. 495, 218 P. 786; Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 156, 47 P. 1019; Martin v. Shea, 182 Cal. 130, 187 P. 23; Anstead v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co. [Cal. Sup.] 265 P. 487), and the only means of discovering the existence of passion or prejudice as influencing the award is by comparing the amount of the award with the evidence, the question being primarily one to be determined by the trial court (Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., supra).

[17, 18] After having heard all of the evidence relating to respondent's personal injuries, and having had the opportunity to observe his physical and mental condition while testifying in court, and having also heard the evidence as to the future medical and surgical treatment required to be given respondent's injured daughter, the trial court reduced the amount awarded by the jury to such sum as it believed was fair and just; and, in view of the facts above narrated, we cannot say as a matter of law that the amount finally allowed is unwarranted and unreasonable.

The judgment is affirmed.

GREGORIEV v. NORTHWESTERN PAC. R. CO. (Civ. 6530.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 13, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 11, 1929.

1. Death ⇨64—Evidence of permanent afflictions of child existing at death of parent, as result of which a child has right to expect greater measure of care and assistance, is admissible to aid in determination in action for parent's death.

Evidence of permanent afflictions of child existing at time of death of parent, by reason of which child had right to expect from parent greater measure of care and assistance, is admissible to aid jury in determination of appropriate damages, and is proper element to be considered in determining value of parent's life to child in action for death of parent.

2. Death ⇨64—In death action, evidence of crippled condition of daughter, resulting from same accident which brought about subsequent death of mother, held admissible in question of damages.

In father's action, as administrator of mother's estate, to recover damages on behalf of himself and minor children on account of death of wife in crossing accident, in which daughter was permanently crippled and mother received injuries which later caused death, evidence of child's crippled condition at time of death of mother held admissible in determining extent of her pecuniary loss, in view of likelihood that mother would supply greater measure of care and assistance than otherwise.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1052(5)—Admission of evidence of crippled condition of child held harmless in action for mother's death, where trial court's written opinion showed no extra allowance was made on that ground.

Where it appeared from written opinion, filed by trial court in action for death, that trial court made no extra allowance for damages to children because of crippled condition of one child, admission of evidence, that such child was permanently crippled, for purpose of increasing award of damages, if error, was not prejudicial.

4. Appeal and error ⇨533(1)—Trial court's written opinion, though not part of record on appeal, may be cited by counsel.

While written opinion of trial court constitutes no part of record on appeal, counsel may cite in argument, and it may sometimes aid the court in the solution of question which it is cited.

5. Railroads ⇨347(9)—Recorded map, showing way on which crossing collision occurred had been dedicated to public use and accepted by county and treated as open crossing by railroad, was admissible to show necessity of railroad companies sounding warning (Civ. Code, § 486).

In action for death resulting from crossing collision, recorded map, which showed that road on both sides of boundaries on railroad's right of way had been dedicated to public use and accepted by county, and that railroad treated crossing as an open one, held admissible to show that the way was a street, road, or highway within Civ. Code, § 486, requiring railroad companies to sound warning at crossings by locomotive bell or whistle.

6. Railroads ⇨312(6)—Railroad was required to sound warning at crossing on way dedicated to public, where it recognized crossing as an open one, though railroad may not have expressly joined in dedication (Civ. Code, § 486).

Way which had been dedicated to public use by owners of land and accepted on behalf of county was "street, road, or highway," on crossing, which railroad was required to sound warning by locomotive bell or whistle, under Civ. Code, § 486, where railroad treated crossing as open one with knowledge of its general use by the public, though railroad may not have expressly joined in dedication of that part of way lying within its right of way.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Ben Gregoriev, as administrator of estate of Ksani Gregoriev, deceased, against the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Goodfellow, Eells & Orrick and R. W. Palmer, all of San Francisco, and Geary & Geary, of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

Hilliard Comstock, of Santa Rosa, and Bell & Simmons, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. This is an action for damages, and is a companion case to one entitled Gregoriev v. Northwestern Pacific R. R. Co., Civil No. 6257, 273 P. 76, wherein the judgment in favor of the plaintiff has been this day affirmed by this court. The actions arose out of a collision which occurred between Gregoriev's automobile and the steam train of appellant at a grade crossing, near Guerneville, Sonoma county. At the time of the accident Gregoriev was driving his own automobile, a seven-passenger sedan, and riding with him were his wife, two daughters, aged 12 and 11 years, respectively, and a son, aged 6 years. As a result of the collision, Gregoriev's wife sustained injuries from which she died within a few hours after the accident, and Gregoriev and the children were all more or less severely hurt, one of the girls being permanently crippled by having suffered a fractured spine.

The companion action was commenced by Gregoriev in his own right to recover damages which he claims to have sustained on account of his personal injuries, the destruction of his property, expenses incurred by him in providing medical treatment and hospitalization for his family, and loss of his daughter's services. It was tried before a jury, and a verdict was rendered in respondent's favor; and from the judgment entered thereon the railroad company appealed, with the result above stated. The present action was brought by Gregoriev, as administrator, to recover damages on behalf of himself and minor children on account of the death of his wife. It was tried before the court sitting without a jury, and judgment was given in respondent's favor, from which the railroad company also appealed.

The two main grounds urged for reversal here are that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, in that he drove upon the railroad crossing, as appellant claims, without taking precautions for his own safety and that of his family; and that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence, over appellant's objection, a letter, dated July 26, 1922, written by R. S. Coon to the appellant company, requesting the erection and maintenance of railroad crossing signs at the crossing where the collision occurred.

The evidence adduced at both trials as to the circumstances leading up to and attending the accident was substantially the same, and the two identical points now urged for reversal were fully presented on the other appeal upon the same argument and authorities now submitted; but it was there held that the same were not maintainable. Therefore, in accordance with our decision in that case, and upon the grounds and for the reasons set forth in the opinion rendered therein, it must be held here that said points are without substantial merit.

[1] Appellant urges also that the trial court erred in allowing respondent to introduce testimony concerning the injuries received by respondent's daughter, and in admitting in evidence a map which will be hereinafter referred to. With respect to the admissibility of said testimony, the well-recognized rule is that evidence of permanent afflictions of a child, existing at the time of the death of the parent, by reason of which the child had a right to expect from the parent, had the parent lived, a greater measure of comfort, care, and assistance than had such affliction not existed, may be introduced to aid the jury in its determination of the appropriate damages, and is a proper element to be considered in determining the value of the parent's life to the child, and as measuring the child's pecuniary loss. 8 Cal. Jur. p. 1036; Simoneau v. Pacific Electric R. Co., 166 Cal. 264, 136 P. 544, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 737. Appellant does not question the foregoing rule, except that it contends that such evidence is admissible only where the permanent afflictions existed at the time of the commission of the tortious act, and not where the same arose subsequent thereto, even though they may have existed at the time of death. Appellant cites no authority to support its contention, and the rule as stated in Simoneau v. Pacific Electric R. Co., supra, appears to be otherwise, for it is there said: "The cause of action of the family of the deceased arose immediately upon his death and the defendant became then responsible to them in damages for the probable pecuniary loss suffered by them in being deprived of the future support, care, comfort, and society of the deceased. But this pecuniary loss was to be determined by conditions existing at the time of the death of the deceased, taking into consideration in measuring it these prospective benefits which the members of the family were deprived of by his death." (Italics ours.)

[2-4] In the case at bar the daughter's affliction did not arise subsequent to the death of her mother. She was permanently crippled by the identical blow which brought about the subsequent death of the mother, and this condition continued up to and existed at the time of such death, at which time only did the cause of action in favor of the child, as an heir, arise. If, therefore, as declared in the case cited, the pecuniary loss to the child is "to be determined by conditions existing at the time of the death of the deceased," the evidence was admissible. Moreover, the main reason given by the courts for the exclusion of evidence of permanent afflictions of an heir, which occurred after the death of the deceased, is that it has a tendency to "arouse the sympathy of the jury to the end that they might improperly enhance the amount of damages to be awarded beyond what the competent evidence in the case would have permitted" (Simoneau v. Pacific Electric R. Co., supra; Green v. Southern Pacific Co., 122 Cal. 564, 55 P. 577); but it is evident that in the present case the testimony in question, even if erroneously admitted, did not operate to appellant's injury, for the reason that it appears from the written opinion filed by the trial court that, in measuring the probable pecuniary loss which it believed the three children sustained on account of their mother's death, it treated the condition of all three children on an equal basis, as being normal, and made no extra allowance because of the crippled condition of this particular child; and although, as appellant suggests, a written opinion of the trial court constitutes no part of the record on appeal, still, as has been held, counsel may cite it in argument, as they may any other opinion given at nisi, and it may sometimes aid the court in a solution of the question upon or to which it is cited. White v. Merrill, 82 Cal. 14, 22 P. 1129.

[5, 6] The map which appellant claims should have been excluded is the recorded map referred to in our decision in the other case. It was offered and received in evidence in the present case with relation to the issue as to whether Bonita avenue crossing, where the accident occurred, was of the character contemplated by the provisions of section 486 of the Civil Code, which requires railroad companies to sound warning by locomotive bell or whistle, upon the approach of its trains at the crossing of "any street, road, or highway"; and we are of the opinion that for such purpose the map was clearly admissible. It showed that Bonita avenue, on both sides of the boundaries of the railroad's right of way, had been dedicated to public use by the owners of the land over which it was laid out and built, and duly accepted on behalf of the county by the board of supervisors many years prior to the happening of the accident; and it was further shown in connection therewith that, although the railroad company may not have expressly joined in the dedication of that portion of Bonita avenue lying exclusively within the confines of the railroad's right of way, it nevertheless treated said crossing, for a considerable length of time prior to the accident, as an open one, and had knowledge of its general use by the public. Therefore, under the authorities cited in our decision in the companion case, Bonita avenue was to all intents and purposes a "street, road, or highway" within the meaning of said section 486 of the Civil Code, irrespective of whether the particular portion thereof lying within the boundaries of the railroad's right of way was a public highway, as found by the trial court, or a private way, as appellant contends.

The judgment is affirmed.

CHADWICK v. CHADWICK. (Civ. 3659.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 21, 1928.

1. Divorce 🔑236—Irrespective of validity of wife's agreement releasing all claims against husband, trial court held authorized to award permanent alimony in subsequent divorce action (Civ. Code, §§ 139, 159).

Irrespective of validity as property settlement under Civ. Code, § 159, of written agreement between husband and wife, who had previously separated, and which agreement merely purported to relinquish all wife's claims against husband, his heirs, executors, and administrators, without making any provision for support of wife, trial court had power under section 139 to make provision for support of wife by granting permanent alimony in subsequent divorce action.

2. Husband and wife 🔑30—As to consideration for property settlement, "illegality" implies moral turpitude, "invalidity," legislative prohibition, and "inadequacy," something rendering settlement unenforceable (Civ. Code, § 159).

As applied to consideration for property settlement between husband and wife under Civ. Code, § 159, word "illegality" implies that instrument is not only contrary to law, but contains some element of moral turpitude, while instrument may be "invalid" simply because in interests of society Legislature has prohibited making or entering into such agreement, and "inadequacy" imports nothing of illegality, but may be of such minor quantity as to render instrument invalid or unenforceable.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Illegality; Inadequacy; Invalid.]

3. Divorce 🔑236—Rigor of rule as to confidential relations is somewhat lessened when husband and wife are separated and negotiating at arm's length for property settlement (Civ. Code, §§ 158, 159).

Under Civ. Code, § 158, rule as to confidential relations exists as between husband and wife, but rigor of its application is somewhat lessened when husband and wife are separated and particularly where they have been separated for a considerable period of time and, though still husband and wife, are negotiating more or less at arm's length for property settlement under section 159.

4. Divorce 🔑236—Wife could not complain in divorce action because she failed to read instrument making property settlement, where she was represented by attorney (Civ. Code, § 159).

Wife cannot complain in divorce action because she failed to read terms of instrument purporting to be a property settlement within Civ. Code, § 159, executed after she separated from husband, where she was represented in transaction by an attorney.

5. Divorce ⚷236—Wife's written release of all claims against husband, from whom she was separated, for $1,850 held valid in absence of showing of unfair advantage.

Written instrument whereby wife, who had previously separated from husband, conveyed realty to him and any right, title, or interest she might have in his property, or property which he might thereafter acquire, in consideration of husband's cash payment to her of $1,850, held based on adequate consideration, in absence of showing that husband took unfair advantage of marital relation to secure execution of instrument.

6. Divorce ⚷236—Husband and wife who had separated could contract with each other for property settlement (Civ. Code, §§ 158, 159).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 158, 159, husband and wife were not prohibited from contracting with each other respecting property settlement, where they had previously separated.

7. Divorce ⚷236—Invalidity of one of two instruments relating to property settlement executed between husband and wife at same time did not affect validity of other relating to different matters.

Where wife's release of all claims against husband from whom she was separated and another instrument purporting to make property settlement between parties related to different subject-matters, invalidity of one of such instruments did not affect validity of the other, though they were executed at same time and as part of same transaction.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

Divorce action by Ida Chadwick against William J. Chadwick, for whom on his death was substituted his executor, Richard W. Chadwick. From the judgment, both parties appeal. Affirmed.

Crouch & Sanders and F. G. Blood, all of San Diego, for plaintiff.

Sweet, Stearns & Forward, Richard M. Kew, and Sherman Lacey, all of San Diego, for defendant.

PLUMMER, J. In this action both parties have appealed from that portion of the judgment considered adverse to the interest of the party appealing. Both appeals are presented upon the same transcript and argued in the same briefs. For convenience, we will refer to the parties as "plaintiff" and "defendant," just as the title to this cause appeared in the trial court.

The action was brought by the plaintiff to secure a divorce from the defendant and division of alleged community property, and involves the question of the validity of two certain agreements dated May 23, 1908. The action for divorce was begun on July 10, 1924. The trial court found one of the instruments, designated as "Exhibit Number 1," valid, as being simply a property settlement, and determined that the instrument designated as "Exhibit Number 2" was invalid in that it violated the provisions of section 159 of the Civil Code. The decree awarded the plaintiff a divorce and $50 a month as permanent alimony. The appeal of the plaintiff involves the instrument designated as "Exhibit Number 1," while the appeal of the defendant relates to that part of the judgment declaring Exhibit No. 2 invalid. Exhibit No. 1 is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"I, Ida Chadwick, the wife of William J. Chadwick, of the County of Los Angeles, State of California, for and in consideration of the sum of Eighteen Hundred and Fifty Dollars, United States Gold Coin, to me in hand paid this day by said William J. Chadwick, do, by these presents, grant, bargain, sell and convey unto the said William J. Chadwick, of the City of San Diego, County of San Diego, State of California, all those certain pieces or parcels of land situated in the City of San Diego, County of San Diego, State of California, and described as follows, to wit: Lots numbered twenty-three and twenty-four, in Block numbered Seven, of Cleveland Heights Addition, in the City of San Diego, County of San Diego, State of California, according to map thereof No. 621, filed in the office of the County Recorder of said County of San Diego, February 4th, 1890. Also any right, title, interest, and estate, of every name and nature whatsoever which the said grantor, Ida Chadwick, now has, in or to any and all property of the said William J. Chadwick, which he now has or which he may hereafter acquire, whether the same be located in the State of California, or in any other state in the United States of America, and whether the same be real property, mixed property, or personal property. In Witness Whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 23rd day of May, 1908. [Seal.] Ida Chadwick."

This instrument bears the certificate of H. E. Doolittle, a notary public in and for the county of San Diego, setting forth that it was duly acknowledged by the said Ida Chadwick on the 23d day of May, 1908, the date of its execution.

Exhibit No. 2 is in these words:

"This Indenture made this 23rd day of May, 1908, between Ida Chadwick, of the County of Los Angeles, State of California, the wife of William J. Chadwick, hereinafter described, party of the first part, and William J. Chadwick, of the County of San Diego, State of California, party of the second part, Witnesseth: That the said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of ten dollars, to her in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, as well as for other valuable considerations to her moving and by her received, does hereby release and forever discharge, for herself, her heirs, executors, and administrators, the said William J. Chadwick, his heirs, executors, and administrators, of and from all debts, dues, sums of money, accounts, agreements, promises, damages, judgments, executions, claims and demands whatsoever, in law or in equity, against the said William J. Chadwick, which she, the said party of the first part now has, or which she ever had, or which she, or her heirs, executors or administrators can, shall, or may have, in, upon or by reason of any matter, cause or thing whatsoever, by virtue of being his wife, or otherwise. In Witness Whereof, the said party of the first part has hereunto set her hand and seal this 23rd day of May, 1908, [Seal.] Ida Chadwick. Witness: H. E. Doolittle."

This instrument also bears the certificate of H. E. Doolittle, notary public in and for the county of San Diego, reciting that it was duly acknowledged by the maker thereof, before him on the said 23d day of May, 1908.

The transcript shows that the plaintiff and defendant intermarried at Council Bluffs, Iowa, on or about the 11th day of May, 1904, both parties having been previously married. No children were born of this marriage, though both the plaintiff and defendant had children by a prior marriage. For a time after the marriage of said parties they lived in South Omaha, Neb., where the defendant conducted a grocery store and meat market. Later, they moved to Sioux City, Iowa, where, according to the testimony set forth in the record, the defendant deserted the plaintiff on or about October, 1905. From that time until about 1908, it appears that the plaintiff had no knowledge of the whereabouts of the defendant, but having learned from some source that the defendant was in California, came to Oakland in the year 1908 and was informed by friends that the defendant was in San Diego. The plaintiff then returned to Los Angeles, where she had been living for some time, and employed an attorney to ascertain the whereabouts of the defendant. The record shows that through the efforts of this attorney the defendant was located in San Diego in the year 1908. The attorney for plaintiff then demanded of the defendant some monetary settlement, or that some provision be made for the plaintiff, who appears, at that time, to have been in ill health. Upon receipt of such demand, the defendant employed an attorney, and through the attorneys thus retained by the respective parties, negotiations were carried on which finally culminated in the signing of the instruments which we have hereinbefore set forth, on the day mentioned, and the payment by the defendant, through his attorney, to the attorney for the plaintiff, of the sum of $1,850. Of this sum it appears that plaintiff's attorney delivered to the plaintiff the sum of $1,500, apparently retaining $350 to cover his fees and expenses. The negotiations were entirely carried on by the attorneys for the respective parties. The record shows that not a word was exchanged between the plaintiff and defendant; they not only did not discuss the terms and conditions of the instruments set forth herein or the consideration therefor, but they did not even speak to each other. In fact, the record shows practically no communication of any kind between the plaintiff and defendant, after October, 1905, although it appears that after the execution of the instruments herein referred to, the plaintiff moved to San Diego, and resided there until the beginning of this action.

The plaintiff's complaint, among other things, alleges that the defendant willfully deserted her on or about October, 1905, and then attacks the instrument designated as Exhibit No. 1, as follows: "That upon locating the said defendant in the City of San Diego, the said defendant stated to plaintiff that he only owned two lots in the City of San Diego, and that he would sell them and give her $1,850.00 if she would give him a property settlement and deed releasing all of her claim upon his estate, and that he, the said defendant, could not sell the said property unless the said plaintiff signed the said deed in settlement; that said statement by the defendant was false and fraudulent, and made wilfully and maliciously and with an intent to deceive the plaintiff and to procure her signature to an agreement releasing her interest, as defendant's wife, in the community property of plaintiff and defendant." It is then alleged that the defendant had other community property than the lots referred to. No mention is made in the plaintiff's complaint of the instrument designated as Exhibit No. 2. The complaint further sets forth that the defendant is possessed of property of the value of $175,000. The answer of the defendant denies the allegations of misrepresentation, etc., sets up the two instruments referred to, and alleges that they were executed as a full, final and complete settlement of all differences and property rights between the parties; also, denies that the defendant is possessed of property of the value of $175,000, or of any property of a greater value than $42,000. The finding of the trial court was, in this respect, that the property possessed by the defendant at the time of the trial was of the value of $40,884.89. The trial court likewise found that there was no fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the defendant, and also that the defendant had exercised no duress or undue influence over the plaintiff in order to induce her to sign the two instruments referred to herein. As to the value of the property possessed by the defendant on the 23d day of May, 1908, the trial court found the same to be $3,700, and that it was not true that the defendant possessed any other community property than the two lots mentioned in Exhibit No. 1. The trial court likewise found that the plaintiff did not sign either of said agreements on account of any representations made by the defendant or by the defendant's attorney. At the time of the trial, the attorneys representing the respective parties on May 23, 1908, were deceased, and therefore what took place between them does not appear in the record, save and except that the record does show that the plaintiff was represented by an attorney by the name of Kemp, and the defendant was represented by an attorney by the name of Doolittle, from which the conclusion would be justified that both the parties to this action had independent advice. The record likewise shows that the defendant is now deceased, and that Richard W. Chadwick, executor of his last will and testament, has been substituted as the party defendant in this action. The trial court found that both of the documents herein set forth were executed at the same time, as a part of the same transaction, and for the same consideration.

[1] For convenience we will first consider the defendant's appeal from that part of the judgment which holds invalid Exhibit No. 2, as violative of the provisions of section 159 of the Civil Code, in that it does not contain an agreement for an immediate separation of the parties, nor make any provision for the support of the wife. That section provides that a husband and wife cannot, by any contract, alter their legal relations, except as to property, and except that they may agree in writing to an immediate separation and make provision for the support of either of them, etc. The defendant, in support of his appeal, calls attention to the fact that the agreement in this case was made long after the separation; that it is not controlled by the conditions set forth in section 159 of the Civil Code relative to making provision for the support of the wife; and cites a number of authorities having to do with agreements based upon section 159 of the Civil Code, making provision for support of the wife, and also containing stipulations relative to divorce. These cases, however, are not strictly in point. In this action the plaintiff was seeking a decree of divorce, and, irrespective of whether the instrument referred to as Exhibit No. 2 is or is not valid, the court had power, under section 139 of the Civil Code, to make provision for the support of the wife where there existed no such provision by reason of any agreement of the parties. It cannot be questioned that Exhibit No. 2 makes no provision for the support of the wife. So far as that instrument is concerned, the wife is left absolutely penniless. Even though the instrument had been drawn strictly according to the terms of section 159 of the Civil Code, the trial court in the divorce action had jurisdiction to either adopt the instrument as making an equitable provision for the support of the wife, or to disregard its terms and make such suitable allowance as the necessities of the case required. The defendant has entirely overlooked section 139 of the Civil Code, and also the cases which hold that in a divorce action where an agreement is presented to the trial court purporting, in terms, to make provision for the support of the wife, the trial court may add thereto or subtract therefrom, as the circumstances and conditions shown by the testimony may require. In the recent case of Smith v. Smith, 270 P. 463, decided by this court, and a hearing thereafter denied by the Supreme Court, the power of the court in a divorce proceeding to make an additional allowance to the wife, other than that mentioned in an agreement, was considered at length, and it was there held that a husband and wife executing an agreement for the support of the wife prior to divorce, are "presumed to have contracted with reference to the power of the trial court to modify the agreement." It was likewise held that the power of the court, under section 139 of the Civil Code, is not limited to community property rights in making provision for the support of the wife. The case of McCahan v. McCahan, 47 Cal. App. 176, 190 P. 460, was relied upon, wherein it is said:

"Such pretended agreements, if they are to have any force, must be subjected to the examination of the divorce court, and derive their sanction from a decree made by the court with a knowledge of the facts."

The opinion also cites, with approval, the case of Hughes v. Hughes, 68 Cal. App. 195, 228 P. 675, where the court, in considering the powers that might be exercised under section 139 of the Civil Code, held as follows: "The superior court, in an action for divorce, has jurisdiction to make, on the application of a husband, an order modifying an interlocutory decree by reducing the amount of maintenance awarded thereby, notwithstanding the fact that the parties have previously made an agreement settling their property rights wherein the husband agreed to pay to the wife a stipulated monthly sum," etc. This court then said: "If this is true, where provision has been made by the agreement for the support of the wife by the husband, with stronger reasoning must the rule apply that the court has power to act under section 139, Civil Code, where no provision has been made and the circumstances equitably require such action." In the case at bar, as we have stated, no provision is made for the support of the wife. It does not purport to follow the terms of section 159, Civil Code. It simply stands out as a paper executed by the wife alone, purporting to relinquish all claims of the plaintiff against the defendant, his heirs, executors and administrators, and from all debts, dues, sums of money which he now has, or may have, etc., and does not reach the standard of an equitable provision considered in any of the cases cited and relied upon in Smith v. Smith, supra, where the power of the court to disregard such agreements is set forth and upheld. In the recent case of Moog v. Moog (Cal. Sup.) 264 P. 490, cited in Smith v. Smith, supra, the power of the court to disregard agreements which in fact have made provision for support of the wife, is clearly and explicitly set forth, and its exercise held proper when the circumstances require the equitable interposition of the court. The court in that case held as follows (we quote from the syllabus): "In actions for divorce there is a very large discretion vested in the trial court to allow permanent support for [the] wife where she is granted [a] divorce, even in the face of contracts of settlement between the parties, and such contracts must be subjected to the court's examination and derive their sanction from a decree made by the court with knowledge of all the facts."

Irrespective of whether Exhibit No. 2 was correctly held invalid by the trial court, the decision of this court in the case of Smith v. Smith, supra, and the cases there cited, is conclusive against the defendant upon his appeal from the order awarding the plaintiff permanent alimony in the sum of $50 a month. No question is raised as to its being excessive, and, in view of the finding of the court as to the property possessed by the defendant, it is quite evident that no such contention could be made.

[2] The plaintiff's appeal tenders the question of the binding force and effect of Exhibit No. 1. Before considering the plaintiff's argument in support of her appeal it may be stated that there is a distinction between the terms "illegality," "invalidity," and "inadequacy" of consideration. To be illegal carries with it the idea that the instrument is not only contrary to law, but contains some element of moral turpitude, while an instrument may be invalid simply because, in the interests of society, the Legislature has prohibited the making or entering into the same. Inadequacy of consideration imports nothing of illegality, but may be of such a minor quantity as to render the instrument invalid or unenforceable. We mention this because the plaintiff has called our attention to a number of cases where the instruments under consideration before the court in the cases cited were in most instances either based upon a previous gambling debt or an instrument constituting a renewal of an instrument based upon such a transaction, or a transaction tainted with a like moral turpitude. In so far as Exhibit No. 1 is concerned, we find nothing illegal in any of its terms. Whether it was or was not based upon an adequate consideration was not tendered to the trial court, and, so far as the record is concerned, no effort was made to show any such lack. The complaint alleges the possession by the defendant of property elsewhere than the two lots named in Exhibit No. 1, but there is no testimony of the existence of any such property, and we think there is sufficient testimony in the record to support the finding of the trial court that the defendant possessed only the two lots in question, and also, that their value was not in excess of that found by the trial court. Under such circumstances, the conclusion is well supported that on the 23d day of May, 1908, the defendant delivered to the plaintiff, or to the plaintiff's attorney, a sum of money which equaled one-half of the property owned by him on that date. On the part of the plaintiff, the only question really presented to the trial court, and as we have shown by the record, was that the instrument had been secured to be executed by the wife by reason of fraud and willful misrepresentation on the part of the defendant, and as we have stated heretofore, the record shows that the defendant absolutely said nothing; that the transaction was entirely conducted by his counsel, with counsel representing the plaintiff.

[3-5] Upon this appeal it is urged that the defendant did not make a full disclosure, and that confidential relations existed between the plaintiff and defendant which necessitated a full and complete statement on his part of the property possessed by him. The rule as to confidential relations does exist as between husband and wife, but the rigor of its application is somewhat lessened when the husband and wife are separated, and, as in this case, had been separated for a considerable period of time, and, though still husband and wife, were negotiating, more or less, at arm's length. In the recent case of Dale v. Dale (Cal. App.) 262 P. 339, it is said:

"In transactions between a husband and wife, the rule with respect to confidential relations obtains (Civil Code, § 158), and precludes either from obtaining an unfair advantage of the other through fraud, mistake, or undue influence. Such transactions are considered subject to the rules which affect the relationship between a trustee and beneficiary; their relationship is in fact presumed to be confidential (13 Cal. Jur. 860, § 54; Estate of Cover, 188 Cal. 133, 143, 204 P. 583), and, where either obtains an advantage over the other, the transaction is presumed to have been without adequate consideration and to have been secured through undue influence, and the burden is then cast upon him who has the advantage to show that it was fair and free from fraud or undue influence. [Citing a number of cases.] But where dissension exists between a husband and wife, and they have become estranged on that account, the execution of a conveyance of property from the husband to the wife, which is free from fraud or undue influence, made as an inducement for reconciliation, harmony, and the renewal of marital relations, constitutes a sufficient consideration for the execution of the instrument."

The court, further, in the consideration of that case, dealing with an objection which is urged here, that the plaintiff did not read Exhibit No. 1, held as follows:

"Under the facts of this case the respondent may not complain because he failed to read or understand the terms of the instruments. This duty was imposed upon his attorney whom he employed to draw the documents. A grantor who executes a deed of conveyance, in the absence of a showing of fraud or mistake, will not be relieved from the effect of the clear terms of the instrument, merely because he neglected to read it, or even if he is unable to read or understand it. Reasonable prudence requires one to either read the document he proposes to execute, or, if he is unable to do so, to procure the assistance of some one who can read and explain its terms. [Citing a number of cases.]"

Again, in the case of Hensley v. Hensley, 179 Cal. 284, 183 P. 445, the Supreme Court, in considering the subject of confidential relations and the extent to which it affected negotiations between husband and wife who had been living separate and apart for some time, used the following language:

"The husband and wife had been living apart for years. That they were in hostility the suit for maintenance sufficiently proves. The transactions for settlement of her claim were conducted through her agents and his, so there was no chance for personal influence to be exercised by him upon her. There was no presumption of confidential relation such as was found to exist in cases like Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525 (7 Am. St. Rep. 189, 17 P. 689), and Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323 (27 P. 186). The parties to the contract were dealing 'at arm's-length' [citing cases]. The language used in the decision in Dimond v. Sanderson, 103 Cal. 97, 102 (37 P. 189), in which it was contended that a wife declaring on a note given by her husband must overcome a presumption of fraud seems applicable to the facts in this case. 'It must appear upon the face of the transaction, or by proof, that there was no consideration, or that the marital confidence was used to take an unfair advantage, or that this confidence was subsequently violated, before the burden is cast upon the plaintiff of sustaining the fairness and the consideration of the transaction against the presumption invoked by appellant.'"

Thus, to apply the language to the present case, it would have to appear that there was no consideration or that the marital relation was taken advantage of by the husband to obtain from the plaintiff an unfair advantage and secure the execution of an instrument without adequate consideration. As we have stated, no testimony was introduced showing inadequacy of the consideration. The instrument purports to be based upon a consideration of $1,850 in cash. The testimony shows that this sum was paid. Out of this sum the plaintiff remunerated her own counsel.

[6, 7] It is further contended on the part of the plaintiff that Exhibit No. 1 is violative of the terms of section 159, Civil Code, in that it was not made in contemplation of an immediate separation. If the instrument in question were an agreement at all, which it is not—it is simply a conveyance executed by the wife to the husband for an expressed consideration—the case of Brown v. Brown, 83 Cal. App. 74, 256 P. 595, would be a complete answer to the plaintiff's contention. In the case of Brown v. Brown, supra, this court had before it the question of the validity of an agreement between husband and wife relative to a settlement of property rights, executed after the separation of the parties. It was there held that section 158, and not section 159, of the Civil Code, applied. This court there said (quoting from a previous opinion): "The plain terms of the statute authorize the husband or the wife to convey to the other all title and interest in either separate or community property." We do not need to enter into a consideration of the cases cited and applied in Brown v. Brown, supra, but will content ourselves with citing that case in which a hearing was denied by the Supreme Court, as a full and complete answer to the plaintiff's contention, in so far as it is argued that the instrument is violative of either section 159 or 158 of the Civil Code. While executed at the same time and as a part of the same transaction, the two exhibits which we have considered herein show conclusively that they relate to different subject-matters, and therefore the validity of either does not depend upon the validity of both. Even though we read both exhibits as one instrument, the conclusion that Exhibit No. 2 is void does not necessitate a like result as to Exhibit No. 1. It has been held several times that agreements between husband and wife which contain an invalid provision, if the invalid provision can be read out of the instrument without violence as to the remainder thereof, such provision will simply be disregarded. A case in point where two instruments were executed between husband and wife, one held valid and the other held void, appears in Estate of Sloan, 179 Cal. 393, 177 P. 150. Other cases might be cited, but this one is sufficient. Some of the cases not cited ruled that a property settlement which contains a provision awarding counsel fees in the event of a divorce, may be upheld, even though that portion of the agreement relating to counsel fees must be disregarded.

Some minor contentions have been made by the plaintiff as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support certain of the findings. What we have said shows that the court found sufficient to dispose of the case, and the fact that some of the immaterial findings are not technically supported by the evidence, if such is true, may be disregarded, such as the finding of the court that the plaintiff went to San Diego for the purpose of effecting a full, final and complete settlement of their property rights. It is wholly immaterial for what purpose the plaintiff went to San Diego on May 23, 1908. All that is material is what was done at that time. If the plaintiff executed Exhibit No. 1 on that date, making the conveyance therein set forth, for a valid consideration, it is of no moment for what purpose the journey was taken to San Diego. What was accomplished or what was done is all that need to have been found by the trial court, and, as we have stated, the record shows no attempt to establish inadequacy of consideration at the time of the execution of the instrument. The extent of the defendant's property possessions at the date of the trial constituted a basis only for determining the allowance to be made to the plaintiff for her support. The extent of this property, whatever it was, accrued and was acquired after the date of the execution of Exhibit No. 1.

It follows from what we have said that the judgment of the trial court must be affirmed in whole, including that part appealed from by the plaintiff, as well as that part appealed from by the defendant. Neither party to recover costs.

We concur: HART, Acting P. J.; JAMISON, Justice pro tem.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter J. Desmond, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Emmason C. Rose, also known as E. C. Rose, deceased. From an order of the probate court denying the petition of Beatrice S. Rose, also known as Betty S. Rose, to probate the will of deceased, proponent appeals. Order affirmed.

Bordwell, Mathews & Wadsworth, Ray W. Bruce, and John H. Mathews, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joseph N. Owen, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KEETCH, Justice pro tem. Emmason C. Rose, the husband of appellant herein, died June 10, 1927, in the city of Los Angeles. Prior thereto he executed two holographic wills, one dated April 16, 1927, and the other June 4, 1927—the latter six days prior to his death. The will of April 16th reads as follows:

"I, Emmason C. Rose, being of sound and disposing mind and healthy body, herewith declare this my last will and testament and declare all others null and void.

"First: I direct that my wife, Betty S. Rose, be appointed executor and administrator of this my last will and testament and that she serve without bond and that my wife, Betty S. Rose, be given power to mortgage, sell, lease, or dispose of all or any part of my estate without first obtaining consent of court, but subject to approval of court thereafter.

"Second: I direct all my just debts be paid.

"Third: 'I direct my funeral expenses be moderate in cost and that my remains be placed in a burial vault at Forest Lawn.

"Fourth: I appoint my wife, Betty S. Rose, guardian of my son, Watson S. Rose.

"Fifth: I direct my wife, Betty S. Rose, to place Five Thousand ($5000.00) Dollars in at least four different preferred stocks or bonds, and hold same in trust and administer the same in trust, my wife to receive the income thereof until my son, Watson S.

Rose, becomes twenty-one years of age, when I direct the principal so invested, be given to Watson S. Rose, for his possession to have and hold. Should, however, Watson S. Rose not attain the age of twenty-one, then this trust becomes the possession of my wife, Betty S. Rose, to have and hold.

"Sixth: I herewith give and bequeath to my wife, Betty S. Rose, all my remainder possessions, both real and personal, wherever situated, to have and hold as her separate and own possession.

"Seventh: Should, however, my wife, Betty S. Rose, die before my death, then I request the Court to appoint the Farmers and Merchants National Bank of Los Angeles as my executor and I direct them to administer my estate for the benefit of my son, Watson S. Rose, giving him the interest my said estate until he reaches the age of twenty-one years, when Watson S. Rose is to receive the entire possession of the principal and interest without any trust whatever, and for his own possession.

"I herewith subscribe my name to this document on the sixteenth day of April, 1927, at Los Angeles, California.

"Emmason C. Rose."

The will of June 4th reads:

"I, Emmason C. Rose, herewith declare this my Last Will and Testament, and that all others are null and void.

"I direct that my just debts be paid, and I desire to be interred in Forest Lawn, and I request that my wife, Betty S. Rose, be made executor and administrator of this my last Will and Testament.

"I herewith give my wife, Betty S. Rose, all my possessions, both real and personal, and request that she serve without bond and that she be permitted to execute deeds and transfer any property.

"I herewith place my hand and seal this 4th day of June, 1927.

"Emmason C. Rose."

The deceased left surviving him his wife, the appellant herein, and Watson S. Rose, a son, 17 years of age.

The last will was admitted to probate on July 5, 1927. Thereafter and on October 20, 1927, the appellant, Mrs. Rose, petitioned the probate court to admit the will of April 16th to probate as a part of the last will. Probate was denied by the judge of the probate department of the superior court of Los Angeles county upon the ground that the will of April 16th was revoked by the will of June 4th. It is from this order denying probate to the first will that the appeal is taken. No question is raised respecting the capacity of the testator, the form or the execution of the documents by him. The sole question to be decided is, Did the last will revoke the prior will?

It will be noted that in the first will the testator provided that the sum of $5,000 be set aside in trust for his son, Watson S. Rose, the wife, if she survived, to receive the income from this sum until Watson became 21, at which time the principal was to be given him. In the last will the son is not mentioned, the effect of which is to give to him that share in the estate to which he would have been entitled had his father died intestate.

It is urged by appellant that the two documents should be read together as constituting the last will and testament, and as one of the reasons therefor it is suggested that the law does not favor intestacy—citing Le Breton v. Cook, 107 Cal. 410, 416, 40 P. 552, and Estate of O'Gorman, 161 Cal. 654, 658, 120 P. 33. Counsel for respondent—who was appointed guardian ad litem by the court upon the commendable request of the appellant in order that the question might be presented in justice to all concerned—also suggests that "it would also in all fairness from an inspection of the two writings seem true that by failing to read the two wills together and to consider them as one document that the last expressed intent of the testator would be thwarted simply because of his ignorance of or other failure to observe the plain mandate of the law." At the same time counsel, after a full, fair and able presentation of his points and authorities in behalf of the respondent, reaches the definite conclusion that the two wills cannot stand together, for the reasons: (1) That the second will is a complete, separate document and not a codicil; (2) that it is a formal holographic will; (3) that it is an attempted (although ineffectual) disposal of all of the property of the decedent; and (4) that it was expressly intended to revoke, cancel, and make void all other wills. From our perusal and consideration of the language of the two documents we are forced to the same conclusion, and in so doing we are not unmindful of the suggestion that wherever reasonably possible wills should be construed to avoid intestacy.

[1, 2] It is, perhaps, unnecessary to say that it is always the intention of the testator that must govern, and where that is clearly expressed it must operate. That is the sole question here, and the language used admits of but one answer. Both wills are complete, if taken separately, and comply with all the formalities required by the law in the making of such wills. Paragraph 1 of section 1292 of the Civil Code provides that a written will may be revoked "by a written will, or other writing of the testator, declaring such revocation or alteration, and executed with the same formalities with which a will should be executed by such testator." Section 1296 of the same Code provides that "a prior will is not revoked by a subsequent will, unless the latter contains an express revocation, or provisions wholly inconsistent with the terms of the former will." (Italics ours.) In the will of June 4th the language of the revoking clause, which is a part of the will itself, reads: "I, Emmason C. Rose, herewith declare this my last will and testament and that all others are null and void." He may or may not have known the legal effect of his failure to mention his son in his will, but as a clear and unambiguous expression of his intent to revoke "all other" wills it leaves nothing to question or argument. In such a case the prior will is revoked eo instante.

In the case of Estate of Iburg, 196 Cal. 337, 238 P. 74, the court says: "In Re Edward Fisher, 4 Wis. 254, 65 Am. Dec. 309, 312, it was said that a man cannot have two independent wills at the same time, each acting upon the same subject matter and each professing to make a distinct and full disposition thereof. Therefore, the court held that where each of two testamentary instruments is a distinct, substantive will of itself, and one is not in the nature of a supplement or codicil to the other, and the later in time is competent to make, and does in fact make a different and full disposition of the testator's property, it revokes the earlier, and is the will of the deceased."

In 40 Cyc., at page 1177, it is said that "an express revocatory clause will operate as such notwithstanding certain devises or legacies in the subsequent will fail to take effect on account of the incapacity of the devisee or legatee to take, or on account of the illegality or indefiniteness of the bequests"—citing cases. "As a general rule, the presence of a revoking clause in a later writing is accepted as conclusive proof of an intention on the part of the decedent to nullify the provisions of an earlier instrument." 26 Cal. Jur. 811, § 144, citing Estate of Holloway, 195 Cal. 711, 235 P. 1012. "If the later writing purports to make disposition of all of the decedent's property the earlier instrument is deemed to be revoked." Estate of Bassett, 196 Cal. 576, 238 P. 666; Estate of Scott, 141 Cal. 485, 75 P. 44.

In the case of Lasier v. Wright, 304 Ill. 130, 136 N. E. 545, 28 A. L. R. 674, it is said: "The word 'declare' means primarily to make known, to make manifest, to make clear, so that a will properly executed, and stating that it is the last will and testament of the testator, declares a purpose to revoke." In the same case the court further says: "Upon the question of revocation of a former will by a later will, the English courts established, and have universally followed, two rules of construction which have never been departed from by those courts so far as we have been able to ascertain, and both rules prevailed before and since the enactment of the English Statute of Frauds and the English Wills Act of 1837. The first rule is that, where the testator has in the later will used express words in terms revoking the former will or wills, such words are to be taken to mean what he has expressed, and that such words will be operative, although the later will contained no inconsistent disposition of the property. This rule is the rule both at law and in equity."

In Page on Wills, the author, in section 267, says: "If that later will contains an express clause of revocation, the earlier will is thereby rendered invalid, irrespective of the disposition of the property made by the second will; and this is true even if the other provisions of the revoking will proved ineffectual."

[3] It is also urged by counsel for respondent that in addition to the express revocatory clause of the last will its depository terms are wholly inconsistent with those of the prior will, and therefore the latter is subject to revocation under section 1296, supra. As already stated, the will of April 16th, the prior will, provided for a specific legacy to the son of the testator, the residue going to the wife in the event she was alive to take it, otherwise all of the estate was to go to the son. As stated by respondent, under this will, after payment of the debts of the estate and the legacy referred to, the wife might not have received anything. On the other hand, by the provisions of the will of June 4th, the subsequent will, it is apparent from the language of the testator that it was his intention to make his wife the principal and sole beneficiary—in other words, a complete disposal of his property wholly inconsistent with the prior will.

We have considered the cases cited by appellant, but they all have application to some other circumstances or conditions than that of a subsequent will expressly revoking a former will, or where the two wills are wholly inconsistent, as in the present case.

The order denying probate to the will of April 16th is affirmed.

SCOTT v. LOS ANGELES RY. CORPORATION. (Civ. 3554.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 21, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 19, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 18, 1929.

1. Street railroads ⇨114(9)—Evidence held to show negligence of street railroad in operating engine pushing cars ahead, resulting in collision with plaintiff's automobile.

In action for damages sustained by automobile driver in collision with engine on street railroad pushing flat cars ahead, evidence held to show defendant's negligence.

2. Street railroads ⇨117(24)—Whether driver of automobile colliding with engine on street railroad pushing flat cars ahead was contributorily negligent held for jury.

Whether driver of automobile colliding with engine on street railroad pushing cars ahead, where tendency of headlight of engine shining over cars was to obscure them and any red lights from view of driver, was guilty of contributory negligence held question of fact for jury.

3. Negligence ⇨65—Defendant cannot impute to plaintiff want of care produced by defendant's own negligence.

Defendant cannot impute to plaintiff a want of care or vigilance which has been produced by defendant's own negligence.

4. Street railroads ⇨117(24)—Whether driver colliding with engine and cars on street railroad was contributorily negligent for violation of act requiring driving near right-hand curb held for jury (Motor Vehicle Act, § 122).

Whether driver of motor vehicle colliding with engine pushing cars ahead on street railroad was guilty of contributory negligence for violation of Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517) § 122, requiring motor vehicles to be driven close to the right-hand edge of the curb of the highway, where driver drove at all times well to the right of the medial line of the street, held for jury.

5. Street railroads ⇨99(5)—Driving automobile upon car tracks of street is not negligence per se.

It is not negligence per se to drive automobile upon the car tracks of a street.

6. Street railroads ⇨118(3)—Instruction that street railroad's maintenance of dangerous situation constituted negligence unless warning was given to approaching vehicles held not erroneous as submitting issue not tendered by complaint.

In action for damages sustained by automobile driver in collision with engine and cars on street railroad, instruction that maintenance of alleged dangerous situation constituted negligence unless defendant exercised ordinary care in warning approaching vehicles held not erroneous as submitting to jury an issue not tendered by the complaint but to be based on specific allegations of negligence therein.

7. Appeal and error ⇨1170(9)—Inaccurate instruction as to street railroad's duty to keep lookout for approaching vehicles did not require reversal in view of another instruction (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In action for damages sustained by automobile driver in collision with engine and cars on street railroad, instruction as to defendant's duty to keep lookout to avoid injuries to others, while not accurately worded, held not to require reversal, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, in view of another instruction requiring plaintiff to exercise ordinary care in maintaining a lookout.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Millard Scott against the Los Angeles Railway Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles (Philip C. Sterry, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

R. T. Walters and R. Goer, both of Whittier (Arthur G. Wray, of Whittier, of counsel), for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff was given judgment for damages sustained in a collision of an automobile driven by him with one of the defendant's cars. The defendant has appealed.

The collision occurred in the city of Los Angeles, on Whittier boulevard, which extends east and west and is 75 feet wide. The defendant maintains double tracks along the middle of the boulevard. The accident occurred about 2 o'clock in the morning. Immediately prior to the accident, a work train of the defendant, consisting of an electric engine and three flat cars, had been moving westerly on the south track, the three flat cars being pushed ahead of the engine, which had a bright headlight on the north side thereof shining "over and above the flat cars." The evidence is conflicting as to whether the train was moving at the moment of the accident, but it was moving slowly, if at all. There was at least "a little bit of an oil light, a little red oil light that they had on the end of the flat car * * * on the left side," the north side. The plaintiff testified:

"Going out Whittier boulevard, * * * you come up over a rise; the street is more or less up and down there for 6 or 7 blocks. * * * You can see down the slope, down to where I seen this big headlight. I was proceeding eastward, the left side of my car just on the inside of the south rail. I noticed at the time that the bright light was on the north track, * * * that was the impression given to me. It appeared the same to me until after the accident occurred a block and a half further down the street. I would not say the light was brilliant, but there was a fog that was on; it just kind of penetrated in the fog in such a way it just blinded me from seeing anything near the light; that is what it seemed to me. * * * As we proceeded down the street * * * I never knew anything about flat cars or any cars whatsoever between the light and myself until I heard a crash. I never took my foot off the throttle. * * * I did not see anyone give any warning before I struck the corner of the flat car. * * * I never seen a light on the flat cars until after I was hit. * * * I had been using Whittier boulevard every day, and I knew that the street car tracks were being repaired down along there. * * * At the time of the collision, I was going just about 20 or 25 miles an hour. * * * The light did not dazzle my vision so I could not see in front; it gave me the impression that it was on the other track so there was nothing for me to be alarmed about. Of course I know now that the light dazzled my eyes so I could not see. My vision must have been blinded by the light because I never realized at the time I ran into those big flat cars in that light. I could see about 60 feet in front of me. * * * It was foggy the night of the accident. It was not so foggy that under the circumstances I felt I would be in danger if it was not for something caused me to be in danger."

A witness who was riding with the plaintiff at the time of the collision testified that the headlight seemed to be on the north track; that "it was a very bright light. * * * I did not see the flat cars before we struck them. I was looking in the direction of the street car track and the headlight at the time. * * * It was foggy that night, but there was no mist on the windshield; just a little bit, but he had a swipe. I could see out of my side and that didn't have any swipe—on my side. The mist did not obstruct my vision very much. * * * There was nothing to prevent our driving over near the curb only there was a sort of a little viaduct, but it was * * * darker on either side, and it was easier to run just along the tracks rather than run closer to the side. * * * The light (headlight) seemed to be coming toward us all the time. The street there is slightly down hill and the light seemed to be coming slow. * * * Before the collision * * * I saw no light on the flat cars, except the bright light on the engine. It was an electric engine. The flat cars were about three feet in height." The motorman who was in charge of the defendant's train testified: "The headlight on the motor shines over and above the flat cars. The headlight was on the right-hand side of the motor, going west." The defendant introduced testimony in contradiction of some of that quoted, but the question under consideration is whether there is sufficient evidence to warrant the verdict and judgment, not whether the preponderance thereof is on the one side or the other.

[1, 2] The evidence is sufficient to show negligence on the part of the defendant. The natural effect of placing the three flat cars, each 35 feet in length, in front of the engine, with its bright headlight shining "over and above the flat cars," was to obscure them and any red lights thereon from the view of the plaintiff. These facts were entitled to consideration by the jury in determining the question of the defendant's negligence and that of the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff. Simoneau v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 166 Cal. 264, 271, 136 P. 544, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 737. The placing of these flat cars ahead of the engine with the headlight turned in a westerly direction on the south track was as a matter of common knowledge, contrary to the usual practice. In Adamson v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. App. 256, 260, 225 P. 875, 876, in discussing a similar question, it is said: "Where * * * one of the parties has, to the discomfiture of the other, without notice, departed from the usual custom or practice, the courts have by an unbroken line of decisions held that the question of negligence on the part of the defendant, and the question of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, are both questions for the jury to determine in the light of all of the facts."

The fact that the headlight was on the north side of the engine, facing west and shining through the fog, may well have created the impression, as asserted by the plaintiff, that the engine was on the north track. Whether or not the plaintiff, under the facts and circumstances shown, was guilty of contributory negligence was a question of fact for the jury. Wurl v. Watson, 67 Cal. App. 625, 630, 228 P. 43; Adamson v. San Francisco, supra; Haynes v. Doxie, 52 Cal. App. 133, 135, 198 P. 39; Indemnity Co. v. Wasco Land & Stock Co., 51 Cal. App. 672, 675, 197 P. 390; Ham v. County of Los Angeles, 46 Cal. App. 148, 158, 189 P. 462. Appellant relies on Hatzakorzian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., 197 Cal. 82, 239 P. 709, 41 A. L. R. 1027. The facts of that case were essentially different from those of this, only one of which differences need be noticed. In that case the defendant, while blinded by the headlights of another automobile, drove his own machine forward until he struck and killed a pedestrian who was walking on the highway. The pedestrian, of course, had done nothing to obscure the defendant's view of him. In this case the confusion which misled the plaintiff was caused by the negligence of the defendant.

[3] In Thompson on Negligence, § 192, it is said: "The defendant cannot impute to the plaintiff a want of care or vigilance which has been produced by the defendant's own negligence." See, also, Ernst v. Hudson River Railroad Co., 35 N. Y. 9, 28, 90 Am. Dec. 761; Morrissey v. Wiggins Ferry Co.,

47 Mo. 521, 523; Pennsylvania Railroad Co. v. Ogier, 35 Pa. 60, 72, 78 Am. Dec. 322; Kinney v. Folkerts, 78 Mich. 687, 697, 44 N. W. 152. In Robinson v. W. P. R. R. Co., 48 Cal. 409, 421, it is said that it cannot be imputed as negligence that the plaintiff did not anticipate culpable negligence on the part of the defendant. The defendant's negligence, of course, did not excuse the plaintiff from the exercise of ordinary care. Whether he exercised such care is to be determined from all the facts and circumstances surrounding him at the time of the collision, one of which is that he was misled into a feeling of false safety by the negligent acts of the defendant, any want of vigilance on his part being induced by the defendant's own negligence. It cannot be held, therefore, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

[4, 5] Section 122 of the Motor Vehicle Act provides: "On all occasions, the driver of a vehicle shall drive the same upon the right half of a public highway and close to the right-hand edge or curb of such highway, unless it is impracticable to travel on such side of the highway." Stats. 1923, p. 517. Whether or not this provision was intended to apply to city streets and the meaning of the phrase "close to the right-hand edge or curb" need not be determined, because it was for the jury to decide whether the facts shown by the evidence rendered it impracticable to drive close to the edge or curb of the street. Appellant did not request the court to instruct the jury on that question, and it cannot be said as a matter of law that the plaintiff was negligent in that respect. The plaintiff drove his automobile at all times well to the right of the medial line of the street. It is not negligence per se to drive an automobile upon the car tracks of a street. Berguin v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 263 P. 220, 223.

"If you find that the defendant placed its train of cars upon the tracks as described in the complaint and answer in such a position that the servants, agents and employees of said defendant knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known that an accident was likely to result, and if you further find that said defendant failed to exercise ordinary care in giving warning to approaching vehicles, then I instruct you that said defendant was guilty of negligence."

Appellant contends that by this instruction the court submitted to the jury an issue not tendered by the complaint. The complaint alleges negligence generally and then alleges specifically that "the defendant carelessly, negligently, and recklessly maintained and had an electric light on said engine shining west and immediately over said flat cars, and that as a result of which plaintiff was blinded and was unable to see the flat cars." The instruction in question does not submit to the jury an issue not tendered by the complaint, but it is based on the foregoing specific allegations of negligence. In effect it states that the maintenance of the alleged dangerous situation constituted negligence unless the defendant exercised "ordinary care in giving warning to approaching vehicles."

[7] Similar complaint is made of another instruction to the effect that, under the circumstances alleged, "it was the duty of defendant's employees in charge of the electric motor and flat cars, * * * upon and along said Whittier boulevard * * * to exercise reasonable care and keep a careful lookout in order to avoid possible injury to persons or vehicles which might be on said Whittier boulevard. If you find from the evidence that the defendant's employees did not exercise reasonable care for the safety of persons and vehicles used on said boulevard, so as to avoid a collision with said electric motor and flat cars, and that by reason of such negligence of the employees of said defendant the plaintiff sustained injuries and damages as alleged in his complaint, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this case." Particular objection is made to the statement that it was the defendant's duty to "keep a careful lookout in order to avoid possible injury to persons or vehicles which might be on said Whittier boulevard." The court doubtless intended to say that it was the duty of those in charge of the train to "keep a careful lookout" when the train was in motion, and the jury probably so understood the instruction. It is the duty of those in charge of any moving vehicle to exercise such care at all times. In similar language, the court instructed the jury that it was the duty of the plaintiff "to exercise ordinary care in maintaining a lookout." The word "lookout," as used in both instructions, clearly means a looking or watching. While the instruction in question should have been more accurately worded, an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, does not lead to the opinion that the alleged error, or any error complained of, has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Complaint is made of the court's refusal to give a number of instructions requested by the defendant. These proposed instructions and those given by the court have been carefully considered and, while those refused are too numerous to be specifically discussed, it may be stated generally that it does not appear that the action of the court in relation thereto has prejudiced the rights of defendant. The instructions given by the court fairly and fully stated the law applicable to the facts proved.

The judgment is affirmed.

McCARTHY v. CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 6456.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 24, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 22, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 21, 1929.

Municipal corporations ⇐217(3)—Veteran in municipal service before July 1, 1920, held entitled to additional credits in promotional examination, though service had not been continuous; "shall have been" (San Francisco Charter, art. 13, § 22).

Petitioner, employed in municipal service from September, 1917, to March, 1921, except while in army, and who returned to service as hoseman in fire department in August, 1926, held entitled, under San Francisco Charter, art. 13, § 22, authorizing additional credits to veterans who "shall have been" in service before July 1, 1920, to additional credits in promotional examination for position of lieutenant in fire department because of status as veteran, he having been in municipal service before July 1, 1920, quoted words applying to past as well as future conditions.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Mandamus by Joseph F. McCarthy against the Civil Service Commission of the City and County of San Francisco and others. Judgment for petitioner, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., and Thomas P. Slevin, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Charles R. Boden, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Petitioner sued in the superior court for a writ of mandate requiring the defendants to award him three additional credits in a promotional examination for the position of lieutenant in the fire department, because of his status as a veteran. Judgment went for petitioner on the pleadings, and the defendants have appealed on a typewritten record.

The petitioner was employed in the municipal service of the city and county of San Francisco from September, 1917, until March, 1921, except for a period of one year, when he was in the service of the United States army. In August, 1926, he returned to the service of the city and county as a hoseman in the fire department, and, in February, 1927, participated in a promotional examination for the position of lieutenant in that department. As a result of this examination, the petitioner received such an average as to cause him to be placed No. 66 on the register of eligibles for promotion. His demand that he be awarded additional credits because of his status as a veteran is based upon that portion of section 22 of article XIII of the San Francisco Charter, which reads: "In the case of promotional examinations a credit of three points shall be allowed to veterans—who shall have been in the city and county service prior to July 1, 1920."

It is the contention of the appellants that the expression "shall have been" should be interpreted to apply only to such veterans who had been in the city service prior to July 1, 1920, and who had remained continuously in such service thereafter until the time of the promotional examination—that, because petitioner had severed his connection with the city service for the period from March, 1921, to August, 1926, he did not come within the class of those entitled to the veterans' preference. In support of the argument, appellants point out that the words "shall have been" are in the future perfect tense, and they argue that, if this continuous service had not been desired, the framers of the charter amendment would have used the past perfect tense with the words "had been."

The amendment was adopted by the electors of the municipality at the general election in November, 1920, and was affirmed by the Legislature in January, 1921. In providing that the preference should go only to those veterans who were in the city service prior to July 1, 1920, no reason has been given for the selection of that date other than that it was about the time when the supervisors of the city were considering submitting the proposal to the electors at the ensuing general election.

To determine the meaning of the amendment we must bear in mind that the words "shall have been" are applied to past as well as to future conditions. It is said in Chenoweth v. Chambers, 33 Cal. App. 104, 110, 164 P. 428, 431, "The expression 'during the term for which he shall have been elected' presents a question of more difficulty. In a strictly grammatical sense the phrase, standing alone, conveys the idea of futurity. Reading the section in its entirety it does not appear to us imperatively to demand a construction contrary to what we have the right to assume the electors, in voting on the amendment, understood to be its purpose and the class of officers to whom it was intended to apply. The phrase or its equivalent is frequently found in statutes and constitutions and the cases show that it is applied to past as well as to future acts or conditions. As was said in Norris v. Sullivan, 47 Conn. 474: 'The words "shall have levied" are susceptible of both past and future application; they furnish a convenient form for legislative use when it is desired to give all-inclusive force to a single expression. Therefore, as they may mean future, or past and future, it becomes a question of legislative intent in each statute.' "

If the framers had used the words "who had been," as suggested by appellants, the phrase would have been open to the interpretation that it applied only to one who had been in the city service prior to July 1, 1920, but who was not in the service on that date or thereafter. If they had used the word "was," it would have expressed a similar meaning. But the words "shall have been" included any person who was in the city service prior to July 1, 1920, and who may or may not have been in such service thereafter. It will be noted that the entire phrase relates to the veteran and not to the municipal employee. If it had been intended to require continuous city service on the part of the employee, some such expression would have been used as "who shall have remained continuously in the city and county service until the date of the promotional examination."

But there is no reason for reading such an expression into the amendment, if we were permitted to do so. The amendment related solely to preferences to be given to veterans. It was not concerned with the length of service to be required for promotion in any department. Other sections of the charter provide for promotional examinations, and provide for the award of credits for meritorious service in the department. But this section had to do with credits for service with the United States military forces. We can see no relation between awards for such service and the period or continuity of service in the city and county.

The petitioner's status as a veteran is conceded, and his service in the city and county employ prior to July 1, 1920, is also admitted. He has established the right to the preference, and the commission has failed to show any reason why the additional points should not be allowed.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: KOFORD, P. J.; STURTEVANT, J.

95 Cal. App. 711

PEOPLE v. FERUGIA. (Cr. 1514.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 22, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑531(3)—Phonographic reporter's testimony that defendant's extrajudicial statement was made voluntarily, and not induced by promises or threats, held sufficient foundation for admission of statement.

In prosecution for murder, testimony by phonographic reporter, who took defendant's extrajudicial statement, that defendant's statement was voluntarily given and that no promises or threats were given or made, which testimony was confined to what occurred in witness' presence, showed sufficient foundation for admission of defendant's statement in evidence.

2. Criminal law 🔑1168(4)—Refusal to strike portions of defendant's extrajudicial statement, referring to prior use of shotgun used in shooting and time witness came from Italy, held not prejudicial.

In prosecution for murder, refusal to strike portions of defendant's extrajudicial statement, referring to shotgun with which he shot deceased as having been used once before to shoot jack rabbits, and referring to time when defendant came to this country from Italy, held not prejudicial to defendant.

3. Criminal law 🔑696(7), 1168(4)—Portion of defendant's extrajudicial statement referring to quarrel with wife should have been stricken, but admission was not prejudicial in murder prosecution.

In prosecution for murder, portion of defendant's extrajudicial statement regarding quarrel between defendant and his wife, which resulted in police being called, but which was result of interference by neighbors, should have been stricken by court, but its admission in evidence was not so prejudicial as to require reversal of conviction.

4. Criminal law 🔑1129(3)—Assignment of error, merely citing court to places in record where requested instructions might be found with statement that they should have been given, held insufficient.

Assignment of error, on refusal to give instruction, merely citing court to places in record where such instructions were to be found together with assertion that they should have been given, held insufficient.

5. Criminal law 🔑1129(3)—Assignment of error to be considered should point out rulings complained of and reasons therefor with authorities.

Assignment of error should point out clearly and concisely rulings complained of as erroneous and reasons why they are so with reference to authority, if any, and, in absence thereof, court will deem matter as of not sufficient importance to merit notice in opinion.

6. Homicide 🔑250—Evidence that defendant killed deceased in quarrel when decedent refused to leave defendant's barn held not to show anything reducing homicide to manslaughter (Pen. Code, § 1105).

In prosecution for murder, evidence of quarrel between defendant and deceased concerning payment for horse collar claimed by defendant and shooting of deceased when he refused to get out of defendant's barn, together with statement by defendant that he did not intend to kill decedent but merely to scare him away, did not show anything which could reduce crime from murder to manslaughter under Pen. Code, § 1105, since homicide was not committed on sudden quarrel or heat of passion, nor in commission of unlawful act not amounting to felony, nor in commission of lawful act which might have produced death in unlawful manner.

7. Homicide 🔑309(3)—Refusal to instruct on manslaughter held proper, where evidence has no tendency to show manslaughter rather than murder.

Where evidence in homicide case fails to contain evidence having tendency to show that crime is manslaughter rather than murder, it is proper for court to refuse to give an instruction authorizing jury to find defendant guilty of manslaughter.

8. Criminal law 🔑1144(15)—Jury is presumed to have heeded court's instruction and performed duty in murder prosecution.

In prosecution for murder it is presumed that jury heeded court's instruction and performed its full duty.

9. Homicide 🔑341—Defendant cannot complain of failure to instruct on manslaughter, where jury, under instructions, would have acquitted defendant if homicide was manslaughter.

Where court in prosecution for murder instructed jury on ingredients necessary for first and second degree murder, that manslaughter is unlawful killing of human being without malice, and that defendant is presumed to be innocent, and to acquit in case of reasonable doubt that guilt was shown, jury, if not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that defendant was guilty of murder, but that killing was without malice, would have acquitted defendant, and hence defendant cannot complain of court's failure to instruct on question of manslaughter.

10. Criminal law 🔑1173(2)—Failure to instruct that conviction requires concurrence of 12 minds, and that juror entertaining reasonable doubt of guilt should not consent to conviction, held not reversible error.

In prosecution for murder, failure to instruct that law requires concurrence of 12 minds in conclusion of defendant's guilt, and that if one juror should entertain reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt such juror should not under oath consent to verdict of guilty, held not reversible error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Charles R. Barnard, Judge.

Sam Ferugia was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. D. Crichton, of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. Appellant was charged with the crime of murder. He was convicted of murder of the second degree, and from such judgment of conviction and from an order denying his motion for a new trial has appealed.

[1] Appellant urges as his points on appeal: (1) Errors of the court in receiving evidence over the objection of defendant; and (2) errors of the court in the giving and refusing certain instructions. Under the first objection appellant contends that the court erred in admitting in evidence an extrajudicial statement made by him in the county jail following his arrest. The phonographic reporter who took defendant's statement, which was made in response to questions propounded by the district attorney, was called as a witness and was asked in three preliminary questions whether promises or threats had been made to induce such statement, and whether it was voluntarily given, to which he answered that there were no promises or threats given or made, and that the statement was voluntary. The questions asked the reporter were in the usual form and were confined to what occurred in the witness' presence. Objection was made that they called for the opinion and conclusion of the witness. The court overruled the objections, stating that the defense might cross-examine the witness upon that point. Counsel for defendant, however, did not avail himself of such privilege. The question here presented is passed upon directly and the foundation laid for the admission in evidence of the statement held sufficient in People v. Rodundo, 44 Cal. 538, and reiterated in People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 350, 19 P. 161, and People v. Bateman, 80 Cal. App. 151, 251 P. 335.

[2, 3] It is contended that the court erred in allowing certain portions of the extrajudicial statement to be read to the jury, and that the court further erred in refusing to strike out such portions when requested to do so. The first portion of the statement objected to consists of a statement by the defendant as to how long he had owned the shotgun with which he had shot the deceased and what use he had made of it, be stating that months before he had used it to shoot jack rabbits which he fed to his chickens and to his dog. The second portion of the statement to which objection was made pertains to when defendant came to this country from Italy. The third portion of the statement objected to concerns a quarrel which defendant at one time had with his wife and which resulted in the police being called, but according to defendant's statement the quarrel was the result of interference by neighbors, which prompted his wife to try to whip him. "I got one slap in the face and I came back with a little blow. That is all the trouble I had and I got so mad the policeman come and I got a little whipping too. I got mad at my wife and I got mad at the neighbor because he told my wife, and blow come to the head and I don't know what happened and I got awful mad." The first two portions objected to could in no way prejudice the defendant, and while the objection to the last portion relative to the quarrel the defendant had with his wife should have been sustained, its admission in evidence is not of such a prejudicial nature as to call for a reversal of the judgment.

[4, 5] Appellant claims that the court erred in refusing to give eleven instructions requested by him. With the exception of two of the instructions, appellant has done no more than cite the court to the places in the record where such instructions are to be found and made the assertion that they should have been given. Such assignments of error are insufficient. "It is due to this court from the members of the bar to point out clearly and concisely the rulings complained of as erroneous and the reasons why they are so, with reference to authorities, if any. In case counsel will not take the trouble to do so, we shall deem the matter as of not sufficient importance to merit notice in an opinion." People v. Woon Tuck Wo, 120 Cal. 297, 52 P. 853; People v. McLean, 135 Cal. 309, 67 P. 771.

The first of the two instructions singled out by appellant for argument is requested instruction X, and the only material difference between the requested instruction and the one given by the court is that the court's instruction told the jury that they could find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, guilty of murder in the second degree, or not guilty; whereas, the requested instruction contained guilty of manslaughter between guilty of murder in the second degree and not guilty.

The omission to instruct the jury that it could find the defendant guilty of manslaughter might have constituted error if there were any evidence in the record which, if believed, would have justified such a verdict. But the record contains no such evidence. Section 1105 of the Penal Code provides: "Upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable."

The defendant did not take the witness stand, and he produced only one witness whose testimony was confined to the question of decedent's reputation for peace and quiet. It therefore follows that any evidence of record which would have justified the instruction that the jury might find the defendant guilty of manslaughter must be found in the prosecution's case. The case of the prosecution consists of the proof of the corpus delicti and an extrajudicial statement of defendant in which he admits he shot the decedent, together with the testimony of several witnesses which tended to corroborate various matters contained in such statement.

The story told by defendant is as follows: He was operating a small farm on the outskirts of the city of Fresno. On the 8th day of April, 1928, he was desirous of obtaining a horse collar so that he might do some plowing. On that day he asked a certain neighbor of his if he (the neighbor) had a horse collar of a certain size which he could spare for a time. The neighbor said that he had one about a size smaller and that it might do. The defendant and the neighbor and a third party left defendant's farm, got the horse collar and returned, tried the horse collar for size, and found it too small. At this juncture they discovered a second horse collar in defendant's farmyard. They tried that collar for size and found it suitable. About the hour of 8 o'clock p. m. the defendant was in bed, but not sleeping. He heard some one knocking at his front door. He called: "Who is there?" and received the answer: "This is Bill." He got up and went to the door and found the decedent, Bill Pearson, a negro, at the door. He said: "What do you want?" Bill Pearson replied: "I want money." Defendant said: "What do you want money for?" Decedent replied: "I want three dollars—I throw collar on your place." Defendant said: "What business you got throwing a collar on my place, who gave you that privilege to throw the collar on my place?" Decedent answered: "You give me three dollars or give me the collar." Defendant replied: "I don't buy anything. I don't want to buy anything that you steal." Decedent then said: "Give me that collar." Defendant replied: "I can't go to the barn, it is all full of mud. Please go home tonight and come tomorrow morning and talk like a gentleman. You go to bed. You lay down. Don't come here and make trouble. You are drunk. Get out of here and go to bed." Decedent replied: "No, I be damned if I get out of here." The defendant then stated that he and the decedent remained on the porch for about ten minutes; that he (the defendant) then went in the house and put on his trousers and returned to the porch, saying to decedent: "Please go home. Bill, you go home tonight, you come tomorrow." Decedent replying: "No, I want my money, give me my money. Give me the money or the collar." Whereupon defendant replied: "I ain't giving you no money or I ain't giving you no collar." That thereupon the defendant ushered decedent to the front gate, put him on the outside, and closed the gate, saying: "Please you go to sleep, go in the house and go to sleep." The defendant's statement was then to the effect that the decedent remained on the sidewalk in front of the house for a few minutes, and then went around the side of the house on the street and toward defendant's barn; that the defendant then went in the house and got his double-barreled shotgun and went out to the back of the house, where he waited 10 or 15 minutes; that he saw the decedent light a match; that at the end of that time decedent jumped up on the fence with his feet remaining upon the outside; that the defendant then called to the decedent to "get out of there," decedent making no reply; that then defendant shot the decedent. The language of the defendant is as follows: "He didn't say anything, then I shoot him. I never shoot him to kill him. I don't know what was going to happen. I never tried to kill him, I tried to scare him—he no answer me, and I shoot him."

[6] When viewed in the light most favorable to the defendant, there was nothing which could have reduced the crime from murder to manslaughter. The homicide was not committed "upon a sudden quarrel or heat of passion," and therefore it could not have been voluntary manslaughter. Nor was it committed "in the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony or in the commission of a lawful act which might have produced death in an unlawful manner or without due caution and circumspection." The fact that defendant in his extrajudicial statement stated that he did not intend to kill decedent did not tend to reduce the offense from murder to manslaughter. In the case of People v. Freel, 48 Cal. 436, the succinct statement is made: "Whether the homicide amounts to murder or to manslaughter merely, does not depend upon the presence or absence of the intent to kill."

"If the unlawful killing is done without the provocation and sudden passion which reduces the offense to manslaughter, or is done in the commission of an unlawful act, the natural consequences of which are dangerous to life, or is committed in the attempt to perpetrate a felony other than those mentioned in the description of murder in the first degree, or the circumstances of the killing show an abandoned and malignant heart, this is murder in the second degree, unless the facts prove the existence in the mind of the slayer of the specific intent to take life. Malice aforethought is implied from the absence of considerable provocation, the wanton recklessness, or the felonious purpose." People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 85; People v. Cox, 76 Cal. 286, 18 P. 332. In People v. Jones, 160 Cal. 367, 117 P. 180, the court approved an instruction containing the following, given in People v. Bruggy, 93 Cal. 476, 29 P. 26: "To reduce a felonious homicide from the grade of murder to manslaughter upon the ground of a sudden quarrel or heat of passion, the provocation must be of such a character as would be naturally calculated to excite and arouse the passions and it must appear that the party acted under the smart of this sudden passion and resentment. If, however, the provocation was of slight and trifling character of such a nature as would not be calculated to arouse the passion, or if sufficient time had elapsed between the provocation and the fatal blow for passion to subside and reason to resume its empire, the offense will not be mitigated, but the slayer will be guilty of murder."

[7] In the present case, according to appellant's extrajudicial statement—which is the only evidence on this question—there was no quarrel or heat of passion nor any facts which show or tend to show that the crime was manslaughter. Where the evidence in a homicide case fails to contain evidence having a tendency to show that the crime is manslaughter rather than murder, it is proper for the court to refuse to give an instruction authorizing the jury to find the defendant guilty of manslaughter. People v. Turley, 50 Cal. 469; People v. Fellows, 122 Cal. 240, 54 P. 830.

The jury was instructed as to the ingredients necessary to constitute murder of the first and second degrees; that manslaughter is the unlawful killing of a human being without malice; that the defendant is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved; and that in case of a reasonable doubt whether his guilt has been satisfactorily shown he is entitled to an acquittal.

[8, 9] It will be presumed that the jury heeded the court's instructions and performed its full duty. If it had not been satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was guilty of murder, but that the killing was without malice and was therefore manslaughter, under the instructions of the court it would have acquitted appellant, and he therefore cannot be heard to complain. People v. Brown, 3 Cal. App. 178, 84 P. 670; People v. Lopez, 135 Cal. 25, 66 P. 965.

[10] Appellant urges that the court erred in refusing his proposed instruction XI, in substance, that the law requires the concurrence of 12 minds in the conclusion of guilt; that before a verdict of guilty can be rendered each juror must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt, and if any one juror after having considered the evidence and consulted with the other jurors should entertain a reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt, such juror should not under his oath consent to a verdict of guilty. In support of this contention appellant has cited People v. Loomer, 13 Cal. App. 654, 110 P. 466; People v. Wong Loung, 159 Cal. 520, 114 P. 829; and People v. Singh, 20 Cal. App. 146, 128 P. 420. While each of these cases holds that such instruction is proper and should be given, in the Loomer and Singh Cases it is said that the refusal to give such instruction did not constitute reversible error, and in the Singh Case it is pointed out that the Wong Loung Case was reversed for other reasons. The following language of the court in People v. Singh is applicable here: "While the opinion of the Supreme Court as expressed in those cases (People v. Dole, 122 Cal. 486 [55 P. 581, 68 Am. St. Rep. 50]; People v. Howard, 143 Cal. 316 [76 P. 1116]; People v. Wong Loung, 159 Cal. 520 [114 P. 829]) is binding upon us, and should have controlled the trial court in its application of the law to the facts of the present case, nevertheless we are satisfied that the mere failure to charge the jury as requested was not, in and of itself, an error of sufficient gravity to warrant a reversal."

LENCIONI v. FIDELITY TRUST & SAVINGS BANK OF FRESNO et al.★
(Civ. 6261.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 15, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 12, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 11, 1929.

1. Chattel mortgages 🔑227—Finding that no agreement was made to reimburse mortgagor's wife claiming benefit of crop mortgage and trust agreement for advances held contrary to evidence.

In action involving right to funds held by trustee under crop mortgage and trust agreement, providing that any one making advances to mortgagor for purpose of harvesting crop should be repaid out of first proceeds of crop not exceeding a specified sum, finding that no agreement was made to reimburse mortgagor's wife for advances made by her, and used by mortgagor to develop crop on mortgaged land, held contrary to the evidence.

2. Husband and wife 🔑257—That farm, part owned by wife and part by husband, was farmed as unit, held not to affect wife's right to reimbursement for advances.

Where crop mortgagor owned one part of farm on which crops were raised and his wife owned the other portion, fact that whole farm was cared for as a unit, and that there was no segregation of receipts or expenses, held not to affect wife's right to reimbursement for advances to mortgagor for purpose of harvesting crop, under crop mortgage and trust agreement providing that any one making advances for such purpose should be repaid out of first proceeds of crop not to exceed specified sum, since profits of separate property are by law expressly declared to be separate property of owner of land or personalty whence they are derived.

3. Equity 🔑57—Under crop mortgage and trust agreement requiring mortgagor to give trustee notice of loan to mortgagor, maxim that that will be considered done which ought to have been done held applicable to lender's rights.

Where crop mortgage and trust agreement provided that any one making advances to mortgagor for purpose of harvesting crop should be repaid out of first proceeds of crop not to exceed specified sum, and required mortgagor to give trustee written notice of such loan, mortgagor's wife, who made advances to mortgagor for such purpose, held entitled to assume that required notice was given, and, neither trustee nor creditors having been injured by her failure to give notice until her relations with her husband became strained, at which time no distribution of funds had been made, maxim that equity will consider done that which ought to have been done applied.

4. Equity 🔑56—Equity looks beyond form of transaction to carry out parties' purposes.

Equity looks beyond the form of a transaction and shapes its judgment in such a way as to carry out the purposes of the parties, dealing with substance of transactions and treating their forms as of secondary importance.

5. Fraud 🔑16—That lender claiming benefit of crop mortgage and trust agreement failed to notify trustee held not fraudulent "concealment."

Where crop mortgage and trust agreement provided that any one making advances to mortgagor for purpose of harvesting crops should be repaid out of first proceeds of crop not exceeding specified sum, and trustee and creditors knew that their claims against proceeds did not come into existence until necessary moneys borrowed to produce crop had been repaid, failure of mortgagor's wife to notify trustee of her advances to mortgagor for such purpose held not a concealment of facts amounting to fraud, since "concealment" implies design or purpose, and not mere silence.

6. Estoppel 🔑95—To create "estoppel" there must be something culpable in silence which allows another to place himself in unfavorable position.

In estoppel, there must be something willful and culpable in the silence which allows another to place himself in an unfavorable position on the faith or understanding of a fact which the person remaining silent can contradict.

motion for nonsuit and proceed with the trial of the case. A petition for rehearing in the Supreme Court was denied, and the trial of the case was proceeeded with as directed by the Appellate Court in its order reversing the judgment of nonsuit. Defendant Fidelity Trust & Savings Bank filed a pleading, denominated "supplemental amended complaint," praying that the consignment creditors and the general creditors of the Setchel Fruit Company (the Setchel Fruit Company having gone into the hands of a receiver on October 3, 1921, and was adjudged bankrupt) might be made parties. Thereupon the consignment creditors intervened and filed a cross-complaint, and one of the general creditors, the Barrett-Hicks Company, on behalf of the general creditors, also filed an answer and cross-complaint against Minnie Helene Setchel. Appellant Minnie Helene Setchel, defendant and cross-complainant, duly answered the supplemental amended complaint of the bank, the cross-complaint of the intervening consignment creditors and the Barrett-Hicks Company. Judgment was rendered that Minnie Helene Setchel, cross-defendant and cross-complainant, take nothing by her several cross-complaints; that Fidelity Trust & Savings Bank retain $1,125 for its compensation and the further sum of $2,273.33 for its expenses and attorney's fees; that from the balance in its hands, being $23,045.20, the trustee bank pay to the estate of Monge, deceased, $11,673.14; to the estate of B. Lencioni, deceased, $1,313.40; to B. Lencioni and Company, a copartnership, $985.35; to O. Toccini, $3,567.66; to G. Schlichting, $1,739.33, being consignment creditors of the Setchel Fruit Company; and that the balance in its hands, $3,766.32, be paid to the general creditors to be divided among them in proportion to their claims.

[1] In Lencioni v. Fidelity Trust & Savings Bank, supra, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Langdon, then presiding justice of Division 2 of this court, the evidence supporting appellant's claim is fully reviewed. There the court says: "W. Flanders Setchel, from whom she [appellant] had been divorced at the time of the trial, testified: That the crops belonging to the appellant were handled in the years 1918, 1919, and 1920 by the Setchel Fruit Company 'on consignment' and 'the proceeds were credited on the books'; that the total amount credited to Mrs. Setchel for these years was 'some $200 or $300 short of $38,000,' and that no portion of that amount of money was ever paid in cash or otherwise to Mrs. Setchel; that in the latter part of 1920, he had a conversation with Mrs. Setchel with reference to the disposition of this money; that Mrs. Setchel was 'very insistent upon receiving payment of her moneys'; that 'he wanted the money to stay—so he could use it'; that he 'asked her if some arrangement could be made whereby it was not to be paid to her just at that time'; * * * that Mrs Setchel was induced by him to 'allow the money to remain there'; that at the time he requested Mrs. Setchel to let this money remain with the company, 'it was understood' that the money would be 'repaid out of the proceeds of the crops of the following year and in making the arrangements to secure certain creditors of the Setchel Fruit Company I made reservation in order to protect that money and induced her to agree to that.' 'What was to be done with this money which I retained in my hand was to take care of the property and develop the crops of 1921.' 'The Setchel Fruit Company's books will show the amount of money so belonging to Mrs. Setchel which was used for the purpose of making the crop of 1921.' * * * Mrs. Setchel's testimony appears in the record in the form of a deposition, wherein she says: 'I think it was in the early fall of 1920 that I made inquiries about the proceeds of these 91½ acres of the Carmelita, but I had been asking for money from my place the whole year. I never got any. * * * When I asked him for some money he came back and asked me to advance him—to let him use the money, rather, that he owed me, to crop the Carmelita now; he must have told me about the right amount then because he said it would cost something like $30,000. * * * I agreed that he could have the money to farm the Carmelita and he was to give a mortgage to the bank and there was to be a trust deed in which I was to be paid back first of all.' We are disposed to agree with the appellant that there is enough in the foregoing testimony to support Mrs. Setchel's claim that she had made advances to W. Flanders Setchel, within the meaning and intent of the mortgage and declaration of trust heretofore discussed upon a motion for nonsuit and with no evidence before the court to contradict or destroy the force of the foregoing testimony. It is to be remembered that the Setchel Fruit Company was not the owner of the land comprising the Carmelita Vineyard. Upon the company's books and in legal effect, the corporate funds were not used to develop a crop upon land not owned by said company, but such funds were used in reducing the company's indebtedness to one of its consignment creditors, Mrs. Setchel—a legitimate use of such funds—and then W. Flanders Setchel, individually, took this money, so paid by the company, to Mrs. Setchel, under a private arrangement with her, and used it to develop a crop upon the Carmelita Vineyard which he had mortgaged in advance for the benefit of the creditors of the Setchel Fruit Company. The fact that this was accomplished in one instead of in two steps surely cannot prejudice Mrs. Setchel in a court of equity. She is, obviously, a woman unacquainted with business methods and she had no voice in the selection of the method adopted in carrying out the scheme agreed upon. * * * However, the bank should have an opportunity to prove, if it can, its allegations regarding estoppel, and to disprove, modify, or explain, by other evidence, the matters heretofore stated which Mrs. Setchel has introduced into the record." The same facts summarized in the quotation from the opinion on the former appeal as given by Mrs. Setchel in her deposition were again testified to by her on the issues raised by reason of the appearance in the action of the interveners.

Although the facts are rather fully set out in the opinion in Lencioni v. Fidelity Trust & Savings Bank, supra, it is proper to restate a few of the salient ones here. W. Flanders Setchel owned all the stock of the Setchel Fruit Company with the exception of the qualifying shares issued to other directors. The Carmelita Vineyard comprised a tract of land of 323½ acres, 91½ of which were owned by Mrs. Setchel, and the remaining 232 acres stood in the name of W. Flanders Setchel. The entire tract was a fruit farm and vineyard and was farmed as a unit. Becoming heavily indebted in the year 1920 to various creditors, including growers who had consigned their fruit, and being threatened, Setchel contrived to pay these consignment creditors about half the amount due them and executed a mortgage to Fidelity Trust & Savings Bank for the balance due all creditors, covering the crops on his 232 acres for the year 1921, and at the same time executed a declaration of trust wherein he specifically set forth the conditions and purposes of the trust. By these instruments the consignment creditors were given a preference for the balance due them over the general creditors. Mr. and Mrs. Setchel, though subsequently divorced, were at that time living together. Foreseeing that he might not have money available with which to produce the 1921 crop, Setchel suggested to his creditors that he might have to borrow money and that he should be given authority to do so. This appeared entirely reasonable to the creditors, and it was accordingly provided in the crop mortgage and trust instrument that any one advancing money for this purpose, not exceeding $30,000, should have a preferred right to its repayment secured by the mortgage in advance of the other creditors.
